I have taken into account Kernebeck's testimonial confirmation of his statement in a pretrial affidavit that: "Work was getting slow. We were pretty much stocked up at Quick Find. Employees were sort of expecting a layoff." On later examination, he said that since they were getting close to the 150 units which had been in stock in May, he thought that Respondent would use that situation to combat the union effort by a total layoff.[37] It is understandable that the employees might foresee the possibility of a layoff in the near future, should the stock reach the 150-unit mark. There was also every reason for them, and for us, to suppose, however, that, in more ordinary circumstances, there would be no layoff at all until the same conditions existed—accumulation of 150 units—which had obtained in May, and that any layoff then required would only be partial.[38]

From the foregoing, I conclude that Respondent was acting in response to the union effort when it laid off five employees on November 6.[39] While it could be argued that the vice lay only in the failure to invoke a partial layoff rather than a total one, and that the remedy should be limited accordingly, I think that the evidence supports a more comprehensive finding. Given that Respondent allowed the stock to reach 150 units in May before concluding that it had run out of storage space, it must be inferred that space was still available at the 125-unit mark on November 6, and that the layoff was simply not warranted on that basis on that date.[40] Given, again, Fogel's testimony that he would not have considered a layoff on November 6 had there been room for storage, it must again be inferred that, in more normal circumstances, even assuming arguendo the initial propriety of the layoff, there would have been an earlier recall than December 26 once there had been a decline in inventory (such as, for example, when it had fallen to 78 units by the end of November 26). In these circumstances, it seems proper to conclude that a full backpay remedy is in order.

[35] Fogel testified elsewhere that the reason for eventually calling back the employees on December 26 was that "inventory had been reduced through my efforts of selling and it was time to go back into production." If reduction of inventory was the criterion, the record shows that on December 18, when Respondent wrote to the employees, the inventory stood at 64 units, a level higher than the 62 in stock at the end of the day on December 5.

[36] One might seriously question whether this rule was meant to be more than symbolic. Another rule reads, "Any employee not reporting for work by eight o'clock in morning has voluntarily quit." It seems doubtful that, on every occasion on which an employee failed to arrive by the appointed time, Respondent marked him down in the records as "quit" and "rehired." Furthermore, the two rules seem to be inconsistent. If an employee has "quit" by failing to report at 8 a.m., what would be the purpose or effect of waiting for 3 days of absence to "remove [him] from employees list"?

[37] Employee Charles Hoffman testified that he also "was looking for a layoff, but not that soon."

[38] While the record is silent on the question of whether Respondent could have anticipated its immediate future shipments as of November 6, I note that in the 3 workdays following that date, it shipped 20 items, reducing its stockpile to 110 units as of the end of the day on November 11. This latter figure evidently includes production of nine units by Emily during the 3 days, not too much below Respondent's normal daily production, as given by Fogel, of five or six units per day.

[39] I have considered the evidence, conceded by Gold, that 5 or 6 years before he fired the entire work force when the men refused to work ("a partial rebellion") because "they had some gripe or something." I do not believe his steadfast testimony that he did not "recall" what their grievance was, but I cannot say, on this record, that Gold has been shown to have a proclivity to react improperly to lawful concerted activity. Since there is no showing that the earlier activity was protected, Gold's reaction to it may have been legitimate.

[40] As earlier pointed out, there were 130 units in stock on the morning of October 30.

H. The Alleged January 9 Violation

The complaint alleges that on January 9, 1981, Fogel "threatened an employee with discharge if this employee refused to accept a supervisory position, in order to discourage the employee's union activities."

Shortly after the representation election was held on January 9, Fogel called Eugene Emily into his office and complained that the employees were bothering him about items that Emily should be taking care of. Fogel said that if Emily did not do his job, he would be discharged. Emily said that the question of whether he was supposed to be the foreman was then "in court." Later, after consulting his attorney, Fogel said he would let matters ride. Fogel testified that, since the union campaign, employees had been bothering him about problems which Emily used to handle, and that he wanted Emily to resume his control over these matters.

Having found above that Emily is a statutory supervisor, it follows that the admonition to Emily cannot be considered coercive. I might add that I suspect that, in an effort to shore up his claim of nonsupervisory status, Emily was refusing to perform functions which he had undertaken in the past. He testified that Fogel had been spending more time in the production area "since he asked me if I was going to [run the shop] and I said no." This at least suggests that Emily failed to perform some tasks he might normally have done, thus requiring Fogel to devote himself more to the production area.

III. THE ISSUES IN CASE 14–RC–9292

The Regional Director has ordered consolidation of the complaint case with certain unresolved issues in the representation case. Those issues are (1) the disposition of the ballot cast by Eugene Emily; (2) the disposition of the ballots cast by discriminatees Joseph Emily, Charles Hoffman, Robert Moore, and Michael Rangel; and (3) Respondent's objections to the election, based upon a claim that Emily's participation in the organizational effort "served not only to taint the original showing of interest, but also permeated the entire atmosphere in such a manner as to destroy laboratory conditions and frustrate the full enjoyment of the employees' choice in the election."

Since I have found that Eugene Emily occupied supervisory status at material times, I conclude that his ballot should not be opened and counted. Since I conclude that the four named employees were not on the payroll on the eligibility date only because of Respondent's unlawful discrimination against them, their ballots would normally be opened and counted. Atlantic Foundry and Pattern Corporation, 192 NLRB 745, 749 (1971).[41] The propriety of counting those ballots turns, however, on the validity of Respondent's objections to the election grounded on the extent of Emily's role in bringing in the Union.

The evidence shows that in August, Emily and the other employees spoke of getting organized by a union. Emily then made an appointment with a union agent, but when an employee was injured on the appointed day, the meeting was canceled.

In October, according to Emily, "we started talking about trying to get a union in and [Kernebeck] volunteered to call [the union agent] and set up an appointment. "Kernebeck did so, and all the employees went to the Teamsters hall, some in Emily's automobile and the rest in the car of another employee. After speaking with the business agent, and discussing it among themselves, all the employees signed authorization cards. The Union then filed a petition, using those cards as the 30-percent "showing of interest" which the Board requires as a prerequisite to the holding of an election.

Several early cases held that participation by a supervisor in the solicitation of authorization cards impairs a union's showing of interest pro tanto and may require dismissal of the petition. Desilu Productions, Inc., 106 NLRB 179 (1953); The Wolfe Metal Products Corporation, 119 NLRB 659 (1957); Southeastern Newspapers, Inc., 129 NLRB 311 (1960). Insofar as the Regional Director has referred to me the Respondent's election objection pertaining to the alleged "taint[ing of] the original showing of interest" by virtue of Emily's participation, I find myself in a peculiar position.

In Georgia Kraft Company, 120 NLRB 806, 808 (1958), the Board held that "allegations of supervisory participation in, or influence upon, a union's solicitation of a showing of interest" would thereafter be investigated only "administratively" by the Region, rather than litigated in a representation proceeding. It thus seems to have been the Board's intention that an employer was not to be permitted an opportunity to litigate this issue, but rather that the Regional Director was to make his own, presumably unreviewable, determination after an informal investigation. The issue has, nonetheless, been presented here as part of an adjudicatory proceeding, and it would seem pointless to ignore the body of testimony which has thus been developed.[42]

Emily undoubtedly made plain to other employees his preference for union representation. He very clearly did this in August when he contacted the union agent; he reiterated his interest in October when Kernebeck revived the effort. Although there is no evidence that Emily brought any direct influence to bear on the other employees when they signed the cards, considering that he may have seemed to them a person of some authority in the plant, his presence could have had an effect on their decision to sign the cards.

[41] Indeed, apart from the unfair labor practice finding, it might be said that the four employees were entitled to vote because of their "reasonable expectancy of reemployment" at the time of the direction of the election. Snap-out Binding & Folding, Inc., Automated Folding & Binding Co., 160 NLRB 161, 163 (1980); D. H. Farms Co., 206 NLRB 111 (1973). In so saying, I have considered the rule earlier discussed; even if it can technically be argued to apply to these employees, it would not preclude their having, very clearly, a sufficient "expectancy of reemployment" to warrant their enfranchisement.

[42] In LeBoe Tire and Rubber Company, d/b/a Mission Tire & Rubber Company, 208 NLRB 84, 93 (1974), a similar situation, the Administrative Law Judge suggested that his findings on the record made before him could constitute the "administrative" investigation called for by Georgia Kraft. The point was evidently not properly before him, as he acknowledged.

Insofar as Respondent's election objection refers to "taint[ing of] the original showing of interest," however, I think it has become a moot question in these circumstances. The requirement of a "showing of interest" is not jurisdictional or statutory; it is merely a self-imposed rule employed by the Board to determine whether there is a demonstration of enough genuine employee interest in a union to justify the expenditure of agency resources for an election. Once an election has been held, as here, that inquiry becomes pointless.

Respondent also argues, however, that Emily's participation "permeated the entire atmosphere in such a manner as to destroy laboratory conditions and frustrate the full enjoyment of the employee's choice in the election." That seems quite unlikely to me. Aside from his presence at the time the cards were signed, there is no evidence that Emily applied any pressure on the other employees with respect to their voting preference. After the cards were signed, and before the election, Respondent unlawfully terminated these employees, an act which, I would think, might have had two material consequences: first, any employee who did not care to be represented by a union before that happened might certainly have had independent reason to think thereafter that union representation would be desirable; second, the termination would have made it clear to them that Respondent did not favor the Union and, in the remote chance that Emily might seek to visit reprisals upon them for refusing to support the Union, that an appeal to Gold or Fogel would find sympathetic listeners.[43] Compare William B. Patton Towing Company and Tex-Tow Inc., 180 NLRB 64, 65 (1969), where the Board refused to set aside an election on the ground of supervisory participation because the employer had made it clear that it was opposed to the union and because of the nature of the perceived relationship ("fellow employees rather than management and rank-and-file") between the supervisors and the employees.

Accordingly, I recommend that the objections to the election be overruled.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, Quick Find Co., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Teamsters Local Union No. 688, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By laying off Michael Rangel, Joseph Emily, Charles Hoffman, Robert Moore, and Donald Dilschneider on November 6, 1980, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

4. By, in November and December 1980, impliedly promising to rectify employee grievances, coercively interrogating employees, informing an employee that selecting a union would not improve working conditions, impliedly threatening an employee with loss of benefits, impliedly threatening employees with loss of jobs, and granting a benefit to an employee, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. Except as set out above, Respondent has not violated the Act in any other respect alleged in the complaint.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent unlawfully laid off the five employees previously named on November 6, 1980, I shall recommend an appropriate remedy. It appears from the record that Respondent made a valid offer of reinstatement to all five employees, and the remedy as to them, shall, accordingly, be limited to the payment of backpay. It is recommended that Respondent make the five employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered from November 6, 1980, to December 26, 1980, in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[44]

I shall also recommend that Respondent be required to post the customary notices.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I issue the following recommended:

ORDER[45]

The Respondent, Quick Find Co., St. Louis, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

[43] I consider the possibility of Emily taking revenge to be "remote" simply because, in a secret-ballot election, as the employees would know, he would have no way of ascertaining which employees had voted against the Union unless all of them did; and in the latter case, I cannot imagine Emily attempting any reprisals.

There is, moreover, a clear indication in the record that the employees had no concerns about offending Emily. Both Gold and Fogel testified to an occasion, perhaps about November 13, when Kernebeck came into the office and proposed to abandon the Union if employee Hoffman was recalled to work; Kernebeck represented that Hoffman might also back down in that event. The record shows that Hoffman was recalled on Friday, November 14, and, although Respondent's testimony is that the recall was made because it was believed that Kernebeck would be jailed on November 13, the fact is that Kernebeck returned to work on November 14 and Hoffman was nonetheless retained on the payroll until Wednesday, November 19, when he left to work for his brother.

Kernebeck did not deny the testimony about this proposal to Gold and Fogel, and I believe that it occurred. Among other things, this episode indicates that Kernebeck, at least, exhibited a willingness to independently turn against the Union, regardless of Emily's desires.

[45] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(a) Discharging, laying off, or otherwise discriminating against employees because of any activities on behalf of the Union, or any other labor organization.

(b) Coercively interrogating employees, and, for the purpose of inducing employees to refuse to support the Union or any other labor organization, promising benefits to employees, granting benefits to employees, informing employees that they would not improve their working conditions by selecting a union, threatening employees with loss of benefits, and threatening employees with loss of jobs.

(c) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, to form, join, or assist any labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, or to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any or all such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Make Michael Rangel, Joseph Emily, Charles Hoffman, Robert Moore, and Donald Dilschneider whole in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary, or appropriate, to analyze the amount of backpay due under this Order.

(c) Post at its place of business in St. Louis, Missouri, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[46] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon recipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 14, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS ALSO ORDERED that those portions of the complaint found to be without merit are hereby dismissed.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the challenge to the ballot of Eugene Emily cast in the election held on January 9, 1981, in Case 14-RC-9292, be sustained, and that the ballot not be opened and counted; that the challenges to the ballots of Joseph Emily, Charles Hoffman, Robert Moore, and Michael Rangel cast in that election be overruled and that the ballots be opened and counted; and that a revised tally of ballots be issued.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Employer's objections to the aforesaid election are overruled.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice. We intend to abide by the following:

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or help unions

To bargain collectively trhough representatives of their own choosing

To act together for collective-bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from any or all these things.

WE WILL NOT discharge, lay off, or otherwise discriminate against any employees to discourage membership in Teamsters Local Union No. 688, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate employes about union matters, and WE WILL NOT, in order to affect their support for the Union or any other labor organization, promise benefits to employees, grant benefits to employees, tell employees that selection of a union would not improve their working conditions, threaten employees with loss of benefits, or threaten employees with loss of jobs.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, coerce, or restrain employees in the exercise of their rights under the National labor Relations Act.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, Michael Rangel, Joseph Emily, Charles Hoffman, Robert Moore, and Donald Dilschneider for the loss suffered by them because of their layoff from November 6 to December 26, 1980.

QUICK FIND CO.

[46] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

January 13, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS FANNING AND ZIMMERMAN

On August 7, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Richard A. Scully issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed a brief in support of the Decision of the Administrative Law Judge.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

---

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD A. SCULLY, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard by me in Nashville, Tennessee, on March 2 and 3, 1981. Pursuant to a charge filed on June 12, 1980, by Charging Party Franklin D. Gunter, a complaint was issued by the Regional Director for Region 26 of the National Labor Relations Board on July 30, 1980. The complaint alleges that Steiner-Liff Textile Products Co. (the Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act), by discharging Franklin Gunter because he engaged in union and/or other concerted activity protected under the Act. Additionally, it alleged that on several occasions the Respondent interrogated an employee concerning the union activities of its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Respondent's timely answer denied that it had committed any violations of the Act.

Upon the entire record, my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by counsel, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent admits that it is engaged in the business of recycling textile products at its facility in Nashville, Tennessee, and that annually in the course of that business it has sold and shipped from its Nashville facility directly to points outside the State of Tennessee products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The Respondent admits, and I find, that the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO (the Union), is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

For approximately 6 years the Respondent has maintained an employee representative program, wherein employees of the various shifts or departments of its Nova Fill Division have elected representatives to meet with company management and owners on a periodic basis, usually once a month, to present complaints, grievances, and suggestions concerning plant operations and to facilitate communications between management and employees. Although it does not appear that the employee representatives operated under a formal charter or bylaws, that they had any officers, or that they had any written agreement with the Respondent, it is clear that the employee representatives presented proposals to management concerning wages, hours of employment, and working conditions both at the monthly meetings[1] and through direct contacts with supervisors,[2] and that the Respondent took action on those proposals.[3] In addition, there was uncontradicted testimony from Franklin Gunter that, while acting in his capacity as an employee representative, he undertook to represent fellow employees in the presentation of grievances to the Respondent on at least two occasions.[4]

[1] Although minutes of all employee representative meetings were not maintained, the minutes of one such meeting which were typed up, indicate that the representatives' proposals involved, inter alia, adjustments in the payment of various bonuses, increasing accumulated sick leave, modification of existing vacation policies, modification of the existing profit-sharing program, modification of overtime policies, a general wage increase, modification of existing health insurance benefits, and monitoring of the way supervisors treat employees.

[2] Franklin Gunter gave uncontradicted testimony that upon being selected employee representative he was successful in having the maintenance department's lunch period extended from 10 to 20 minutes after raising the matter with Maintenance Superintendent Heinz Tews and Production Manager Hans Deligne.

[3] Respondent's vice president of personnel, Louis Gangi, testified that the majority of the problems brought up by the employee representatives have been corrected and that while the Respondent has not negotiated with the employee representatives, employee benefits have been expanded as a result of information received from them.

[4] Although the Respondent's production manager, Hans Deligne, denied that the employee representatives have any authority of any kind,

Continued

Section 2(5) of the Act defines the term "labor organization" as:

> . . . any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.

The Supreme Court has held that the term "dealing with" in this definition is not the same as and is broader than the term "bargaining with."[5] Consequently, the fact that the employee representatives did not engage in collective bargaining with the Respondent is not material. They did deal with the Respondent concerning such matters enumerated in Section 2(5) as grievances, wages, hours of employment, and conditions of work. This is sufficient to constitute a labor organization under the meaning of the Act.[6] Accordingly, I find the employee representatives to be a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Discharge of Franklin Gunter

It is alleged that Franklin Gunter, who is also known as "Dee Gunter," was discharged by the Respondent because he engaged in union and/or other concerted activities protected by the Act. The Respondent denies this and contends that Gunter was discharged because of his conduct on the job and because he threatened to beat up a supervisor at the plant. Inasmuch as there is evidence in the record tending to support the Respondent's position, this is a "mixed motive" case which must be analyzed in accordance with the Board's decision in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

During the spring of 1979, the Union began a campaign to organize employees at the Respondent's Nova Fill plant. Employee James Richardson began the campaign and enlisted the assistance of Gunter who obtained the signatures of day-shift employees on union authorization cards. During the campaign, Gunter and two other employees had a conversation with Production Manager Hans Deligne in which Gunter explained that their primary reason for supporting the Union was to get Maintenance Superintendent Heinz Tews, who Gunter described as constantly threatening to fire or cut the pay of maintenance employees, off of their backs. During this conversation, Deligne stated that he would resolve the employees' problems if they would "help to turn the election . . . the company way." Gunter agreed to work on behalf of the Company against the Union and immediately ceased his union support. He made a sign stating "Vote No Union," which he put up in the shop and told fellow employees that Deligne felt he could resolve their problems without a union and that he should be given an opportunity to do so. Gunter continued to campaign against the Union until election day and served as the Company's observer at the election. The Union was defeated in the election.

Gunter's testimony concerning the union campaign, his actions during its course, and his reasons for acting as he did is uncontradicted. Although there are other aspects of his testimony discussed below, which I do not credit, I find that the foregoing events occurred as described by Gunter.

The General Counsel contends that after having secured Gunter's assistance in defeating the Union, Deligne failed to fulfill his promise to resolve the employees' complaints. As a result, sometime in December 1979, Gunter again began to speak out in favor of bringing the Union into the plant. It was because of this renewed prounion activity, the General Counsel contends, that Gunter was discharged a short time later.

Respondent's letter of January 29, 1980, informing Gunter of his discharge states in pertinent part:

> Since your employment, your attitude toward the company, its supervisors and practices has taken different courses at different times. At one time, you were strongly opposed to the company and its practices. You then changed your attitude and became very cooperative with the company and agreeable with its practices.
> It now appears that you have again changed your attitude by your actions toward management, and your constant complaining and criticism of the company would indicate that you are a very unhappy person.

While it is arguable that what is being referred to in the letter is Gunter's changing position with respect to his support for the Union, other factors convince me that Gunter's support for the Union was not a factor in his discharge.

The discharge on January 29, 1980, was 7 months after the union election. During the campaign, preceding the election, Gunter had switched his allegiance from the Union to the Company, encouraged other employees to vote against the Union, and had served as the Company's election observer. There is no evidence that Gunter was ever one of the leading union advocates at the plant or that, apart from soliciting signatures on authorization cards, he was particularly active on the Union's behalf before he switched his support to the Company. There is also no convincing evidence in support of the contention that Gunter's prounion activity increased noticeably just prior to his discharge. Gunter testified that he went to Deligne in December 1979 and told him that he had had adequate time to correct the problems and that Gunter felt a union was needed. Although he was not questioned it appears that Gunter's presentation of grievances resulted in the reduction of an employee's suspension in one case and the reinstatement of a discharged employee in another. There was no indication that Gunter was ever criticized or told that he had overstepped his authority by having participated in presenting these grievances to the Respondent. There was nothing other than his position as employee representative that would have involved him in these grievances.

about this conversation, Deligne testified credibly that no one ever spoke to him after the election concerning Gunter's support for the Union. On the other hand, Deligne testified that he assumed from comments made to him by Gunter's coworkers to the effect that he "was on the rampage again," that Gunter was talking in favor of getting a union into the plant. According to Deligne, he heard such reports on several occasions going back to as soon as 4 weeks after the union election. Employee Thomas Frost testified that he went to work in the maintenance department at the Nova Fill plant in August 1979, and that Gunter began to talk to him about a union shortly after he arrived. He also testified that he has had conversations with three or four other employees about getting a union in the plant from the time he started work up until the time of the hearing. Although Frost testified that during a conversation in January 1980 Gunter had said he was going to work "extra hard" to get a union in, there is no evidence that Gunter at any time between the election and his discharge ever did anything more than discuss a union with other employees. It is not even clear in these discussions that Gunter was always necessarily in favor of a union.[7]

The evidence does not establish that Gunter's union activity was such that his discharge in January 1980 could be considered "a message" to other employees not to support a union or that union activity was a motivating factor in the Respondent's decision to discharge Gunter. I do not find that Gunter was discharged because of union activity.

In May or June 1979, Gunter was elected as the employee representative by the day-shift employees of the production and maintenance departments and served in that capacity until his discharge. It does not appear that the duties of the employee representatives were specifically delineated, but it is clear that Gunter took an expansive view of his role. In addition to his attendance at, and participation in, the monthly meetings with the owners and management, as discussed above, he also presented complaints and suggestions to Tews and Deligne and represented employees with grievances. Respondent's second-shift production superintendent, George Corbitt, Jr., testified that he had observed Gunter at employee representative meetings and that Gunter made more complaints and statements than other representatives. He stated that Gunter was "more vocal because to me he probably thought more of the employees" and described Gunter's attitude at the meetings as a "problem." Heinz Tews testified that Gunter often complained to him about the way he was directing employees in the maintenance departments. Hans Deligne also testified that Gunter complained to him about how hard Tews was working maintenance employees, showing favoritism toward certain employees, and his being unfair in the assignments of overtime.

The letter given Gunter at the time of his discharge refers only to his "attitude toward the company" as the basis for his termination. Complaints and criticism of the Company, if warranted, were obviously a part of the activities and responsibilities of the employee representatives and are activities protected under the Act. The Respondent has not offered any evidence which would establish that the complaints and criticism referred to in the letter were separate and apart from the complaints and criticism presented by Gunter in his capacity as an employee representative or that such complaints and criticism were completely lacking in foundation. Accordingly, I find that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that Gunter's protected conduct as an employee representative was a motivating factor in the Employer's decision to terminate him.[8]

Under Wright Line, supra, the burden now shifts to the Respondent to demonstrate that Gunter would have been discharged in the absence of the protected conduct. The Respondent contends that Gunter was discharged because he had become increasingly difficult to get along with at work, which had caused his immediate supervisor to threaten to quit, and because he had threatened to beat up another supervisor at the plant.

At the outset, the Respondent is faced with the fact that its January 29, 1980, letter, informing Gunter of his discharge and purportedly outlining the reasons, makes no reference to any threat and speaks only in general terms about his "attitude" and "actions toward management." Hans Deligne, who made the decision to discharge Gunter, testified credibly that once he had reached this decision he waited a few days before implementing it and was deliberately vague in assigning the reasons therefor because he was afraid of Gunter's violent nature and feared that if Gunter related his discharge to a specific incident or individual, he would retaliate against the person or persons involved. Gunter, while drunk had attempted to beat up both Deligne and Tews at a Christmas party in 1978, he was known to have carried a gun at work, and he had told Deligne about pouring paint on the car of a neighbor he had had trouble with and about getting even with someone who had shot a relative of his. Under the circumstances, I find Deligne's explanation of why the discharge letter was worded the way it was to be credible and his actions in handling the discharge to be reasonable and prudent.

[7] Henley Tatum, the first-shift production supervisor called as a witness by the General Counsel, testified that he had overheard Gunter making statements that a union was needed and, on other occasions, that a union was not needed and that he heard such statements within the last 2 months before Gunter was discharged. I found Tatum to be a credible witness and do not consider his statement in an affidavit given to a Board agent to the effect that he had heard Gunter speak in favor of a union during his last 2 months at the plant to be inconsistent with his testimony at the hearing. The affidavit does not say that he did not hear Gunter speak against the Union during that period.

The testimony of Kirk Swick, the first-shift production foreman called as a witness by the General Counsel, was that he knew Gunter was talking about a union within 2 or 3 months of his discharge but that he did not know, from what he had overheard, whether Gunter was for or against a union.

[8] In this regard, I do not find that Gunter's discharge was the result of his having complained about Heinz Tews or Hans Deligne at the employee representatives' meeting held on Friday, January 25, 1980. According to Gunter's testimony, he was asked by two employees to present their complaints against Tews at the meeting, and did so. He further testified that one of the owners, Abe Freeman, directed Deligne to personally investigate the compleint. Deligne and George Corbitt, who were present at the meeting, denied hearing Gunter make any such complaint. Thomas Frost, one of the employees who allegedly asked Gunter to present the complaint about Tews at the meeting, appeared as a witness at the hearing but was not asked about the incident. I do not credit Gunter's testimony which appears to have been fabricated in order to make it appear that this complaint resulted in his discharge 4 days later. There is nothing which would indicate that the complaint about Tews, if made, was any different than the complaints Gunter had been making about him all along, going back to before the union election.

Corbitt and Deligne testified that a criticism Gunter did voice at the January 25 meeting concerned Deligne and the way he was performing his job as production manager. Deligne denied that this criticism had any bearing on Gunter's discharge. In any event, I find, on the basis of the credited testimony of Elvis Pruitt, that the decision to discharge Gunter had been made prior to the time the employee representatives' meeting was held on the afternoon of January 25, 1980, because Deligne had told Pruitt about it that morning.

According to Deligne, he began to think seriously about terminating Gunter because of an incident involving Gunter and first-shift Production Supervisor Ray Morris. Gunter went to the parts room near Morris' office to get a gear for a machine he was working on and was observed by Morris crawling on his hands and knees and throwing things around. Morris asked employee Don Bryan whether Gunter was drunk or had been drinking and Bryan, in turn, told Gunter what Morris had asked him. Gunter encountered Morris outside the parts room and took exception to Morris' inquiry as to whether he was drunk. An argument ensued and Morris told Gunter to come into his office, where Deligne was present, "because he had heard enough." After entering Morris' office, the argument continued and intensified to the point where Gunter threatened to beat up Morris. George Corbitt, who was also present, stepped between Gunter and Morris. Things eventually calmed down and Gunter left after refusing to shake hands with Morris.[9] Deligne, Morris, and Corbitt remained in the office and Morris demanded that Deligne do something about Gunter, Morris having no authority over maintenance employees. Corbitt also questioned Deligne as to whether employees would be allowed to talk to supervisors in the manner Gunter had spoken to Morris. Deligne's response was to the effect that they should let things cool down.

The date of this incident has not been pinpointed. Corbitt and Deligne testified that it was a week before Gunter was terminated, while Morris placed it a approximately 2 weeks before. Elvis Pruitt testified that Gunter told him about the incident a week before his discharge and Morris mentioned it to him about 3 days before Gunter was terminated. I find on the basis of this testimony that the incident occurred approximately a week before Gunter was discharged.[10]

Deligne finally decided to discharge Gunter when Elvis Pruitt, Gunter's immediate supervisor, threatened to quit rather than to continue working with him. Pruitt had previously complained about Gunter to Deligne and Tews. Tews had suggested that Gunter be transferred from maintenance to production but Deligne would not do so. Pruitt, who I found to be a straightforward, convincing witness, testified that Gunter was a good worker, that he had no problems with Gunter personally, but that he was constantly needling and threatening to whip other maintenance workers so that nobody wanted to work with him.[11] This created problems for Pruitt in scheduling work and made working conditions such that he no longer wished to continue as maintenance supervisor. He had threatened to quit on several occasions due in part to the problems created by Gunter and in part because of the pressures of the job. The last time was within a week of Gunter's discharge when he told Tews and Deligne that he was "giving this foreman's job up because I can't put up with Dee Gunter anymore."

Gunter testified that Pruitt came to him immediately after he was notified of his discharge and told him he did not have anything to do with it, that he had signed the discharge letter only because Deligne wanted him to, and that Gunter should go to the Labor Board about it. According to Pruitt, after Gunter was discharged, he asked Gunter if he was "mad at him," Gunter said, "no," but turned to Deligne and Tews and said, "I'll be looking for you two." Sometime later when Gunter was picking up his toolbox he told Pruitt that he was thinking of getting a lawyer to do something about his discharge and asked Pruitt "do you blame me?" Pruitt responded, "Dee, I don't blame anybody for anything." I credit Pruitt's version of these conversations rather than Gunter's and find that Pruitt had threatened to quit as maintenance supervisor because of the problems Gunter was causing him. Rather than sympathizing with Gunter, as Gunter claimed, I find Pruitt's feeling about Gunter's discharge was evidenced in his response to Deligne upon being told that Gunter was to be let go. He stated, "the sooner, the better."

I find that Gunter's discharge was the result of his insubordinate conduct in threatening to beat up Supervisor Ray Morris and his conduct in the maintenance department which had driven Pruitt to the point of resignation and that he would have been discharged for these reasons even if he had not engaged in protected activities in his capacity as an employee representative. The General Counsel has described this case as one of "credibility" and contends that Gunter's testimony should be credited over that of the Respondent's witnesses. I am unable to credit Gunter's testimony concerning most of the significant matters for the reasons discussed above. While I agree that the Respondent's reasons for the discharge were not clearly articulated either in the letter of discharge or the affidavit Deligne gave the Board agent during the investigation of these charges, I believe the reasons for this have been satisfactorily explained and that there is other credible evidence establishing the factors leading to Gunter's discharge.

As noted above, the language in the discharge letter was purposely vague to lessen the possibility of retaliation by Gunter against specific individuals and also to avoid hurting Gunter's chances of obtaining new employment. As for Deligne's affidavit, several factors must be considered. Although he has lived in the United States since 1964, it is obvious that Deligne, who is a native of Germany, still has some problems in expressing himself clearly in the English language. Also, I believed his testimony that he did not spell out in detail the incident involving Gunter's threat to beat up Morris when he gave his affidavit because he did not want to ruin Gunter's record by stating that a threat to a supervisor was the reason for his dismissal.[12] In view of all of the foregoing facts, I find that the Respondent's discharge of Franklin Gunter did not violate the Act.

[9] My findings concerning what happened in Morris' office are based on the credited testimony of Morris, Deligne, and Corbitt. I do not credit Gunter's version of this part of the incident in which he denied being angry or upset and denied threatening to beat up Morris.

[10] I do not credit Gunter's testimony to the effect that the incident occurred prior to Christmas 1979, over a month before his discharge. This was apparently intended to support Gunter's version of the incident in which he described himself as merely explaining to Morris that another employee was spreading a false report that Gunter was planning on beating up Morris at the Company's annual Christmas party. I find that testimony to be a complete fabrication.

[11] Pruitt later stated that one maintenance worker, Thomas Frost, had no problems with Gunter and did not complain about him.

B. The Interrogation of Thomas Frost

Thomas Frost, who worked with Gunter in the maintenance department during Gunter's last months with the Company, testified that during the month before Gunter was fired, on two or three occasions, Heinz Tews asked him "what's Dee doing?" and "what's Dee stirring up?"; "what's he doing?" and "what's he trying to stir up?" He testified that during the same period Elvis Pruitt would send him and Gunter out on a job and when Frost would return Pruitt would ask, "what's Dee up to?" or "what's going on?"

Frost also testified that on two or three occasions Hans Deligne asked him "Tom, what's Dee up to?" and "what's he stirring up now?" He stated that on one occasion Deligne came up to him while he was installing gears on a machine and asked, "Tom, what's Dee doing? What's he trying to do, get the Union stirred up again in here or what?" This, he said, occurred within 3 weeks of Gunter's termination.

Tews, Pruitt, and Deligne each denied asking such questions of Frost. The only conversation that was identified by Frost with any specificity was that with Deligne while Frost was working on a machine and Deligne mentioned the Union. There was, however, no mention of Deligne asking about a union in the affidavit Frost gave a Board agent on June 30, 1980. Frost's explanation that at the time he gave the affidavit he was a "company man" and that he was trying to be nice and was not going to say anything against the Company was neither credible nor convincing. I also doubt that the other conversations he allegedly had with Deligne, Tews, and Pruitt, which were not identified in any detail as to time or place, ever occurred. However, there was evidence that Gunter had failed to return promptly from work assignments and it is entirely possible that what Frost described were inquiries by Gunter's supervisors as to his whereabouts. I do not find that the evidence is sufficient to establish any unlawful interrogations of Frost.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Steiner-Liff Textile Products Co., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2),(6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union and the employee representatives of the Respondent's Nova Fill Division are both labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has not violated the Act in any respect alleged in the complaint.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[13]

The complaint is hereby dismissed in its entirety.

[12] In this regard, there is evidence that Gunter had been a favorite of Deligne, who rehired him over the objections of other supervisors after Gunter had left the Company and was unsuccessful in starting his own business, because Deligne thought he "saw potential in the man" and that he "could make something out of him." Pruitt also testified that he never took any action against Gunter because he felt Gunter got special treatment from Deligne.

[13] In the event no exceptions ard filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

On September 19, 1975, the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Order in the above-entitled proceeding [1] finding, inter alia, that Respondents had violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, by discriminatorily discharging employees Guy Bourdo, Milan Mix, and Percy Williams. The Board ordered that they be reinstated and made whole for any loss of earnings suffered by reason of the discrimination practiced against them. Thereafter, on June 23, 1976, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit issued its judgment [2] enforcing the Board's Order.

On September 29, 1978, following a backpay hearing, the Board issued its Supplemental Decision and Order fixing the amount of backpay owed to the discriminatees.[3] The General Counsel subsequently filed with the Seventh Circuit a petition for enforcement of the Board's Order. On February 1, 1980, the court [4] remanded the case to the Board for a new hearing on Respondent's contention that the irregular nature of its operations "justif[ies] a reduction of the back pay award." The General Counsel subsequently filed with the Seventh Circuit a petition for modification of the court's opinion. On April 15, 1980, the court denied the General Counsel's motion. Thereafter, on July 10, 1980, the Board accepted the court's remand and ordered that the record be reopened to allow the parties to introduce evidence on the remanded issue.

On January 13 and March 18 and 19, 1981, pursuant to notice duly served, a hearing was held before Administrative Law Judge Irwin H. Socoloff for the purpose of determining the amount of money due under the amended backpay specification. On June 25, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Socoloff issued the attached Second Supplemental Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondents filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Second Supplemental Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Second Supplemental Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[5] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondents, United Contractors Incorporated and JMCO Trucking Incorporated, Joint Employers, Menomonee Falls, Wisconsin, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

IRWIN H. SOCOLOFF, Administrative Law Judge: On September 19, 1975, the Board issued a Decision and Order in the above-entitled proceeding (220 NLRB 463), directing Respondent, inter alia, to take certain affirmative action to remedy the unfair labor practices therein found, including the reinstatement of certain individuals and payment to them of backpay. Thereafter, on June 23, 1976, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit issued its judgment enforcing the Board's Order (539 F.2d 713, cert. denied 429 U.S. 1061 (1977)). Subsequently, a controversy arose concerning the amount of backpay due to discriminatorily discharged truckdrivers Milan Mix, Guy Bourdo, and Percy Williams and the amounts required to be paid on their behalf to contractually established fringe benefit funds under the terms of the Order. Accordingly, a supplemental hearing was held before me on September 12, 1977, in order to resolve those issues and, thereafter, I issued my Decision, recommending that Respondent be ordered to make certain payments to Mix, Bourdo, and Williams, and to the fringe benefit funds. On September 29, 1978, the Board issued a Supplemental Decision and Order (238 NLRB 893) adopting my recommended Order which, in essence, awarded backpay to the discriminatees for the entire backpay period.

[5] Respondents have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

On February 1, 1980, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit declined to enforce the Board's supplemental Order, holding that "the administrative law judge and the Board ignored uncontradicted evidence that the Board's backpay formula was inapplicable in this case" in that "economic factors may have prevented the discharged employees from working at JMCO during part of the layoff period" (614 F.2d 134). The court, noting evidence that work at JMCO was irregular and/or seasonal, and that "during slack periods driving was assigned to available employees according to seniority, regardless of whether the worker usually drove a truck, remanded the case to the Board for a new hearing, concluding (614 F.2d at 138):

> "[A]n employer may, without incurring back-pay liability, refrain from reinstating a discriminatorily discharged employee during a period when employment would not have been available for him even absent the discrimination." . . . The extent to which work at JMCO was seasonal is unclear. There is no doubt, however, that the work was irregular and that during slack periods newer employees were laid off. We remand this case to the Board for a new hearing on the company's contention that these factors justify a reduction of the back pay award.

On July 10, 1980, the Board accepted the court's remand and ordered that the record be reopened to allow the parties to introduce evidence on the remanded issue. Thereafter, the General Counsel moved to amend the backpay specification. That motion is hereby granted.

Pursuant to notice, a hearing in this matter[1] was held before me in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on January 13, and March 18 and 19, 1981, at which the General Counsel and Respondent were represented by counsel and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce evidence. Thereafter, the parties filed briefs which have been duly considered.

Upon the entire record in this case, and from my observations of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

In his initial backpay specification, as amended on September 2, 1977, the General Counsel sought backpay awards for Mix, Bourdo, and Williams, covering the entire backpay period, based upon the average weekly earnings of those discriminatees during the months preceding and following the layoffs. Subsequent to the decision of the court, the General Counsel, as noted, amended his specification. The amended specification is predicated upon the irregular and/or seasonal nature of Respondent's business, as found by the court, and seeks backpay and fringe benefit contributions based upon the hours actually worked by replacement drivers during the backpay period as reflected in JMCO payroll records.[2] Accordingly, the amended specification assigns the earnings of the replacement drivers, Van Roosenbeek, Franz, DuQuaine, Welda, and Watson, to the discriminatees on the basis of seniority. Under this method of computation there were no weeks during the backpay period in which work was available for Williams and, consequently, backpay is not sought for him.[3]

At this juncture, the issue to be resolved is a narrow one. Respondent concedes that the amended specification properly assigns to the discriminatees, for backpay computation purposes, the hours worked by Van Roosenbeek, Franz, and Welda during the layoff period. Thus, Van Roosenbeek and Franz were hired as replacement drivers following the unlawful layoffs. Welda, a nonbargaining unit employee, has less companywide seniority than Mix or Bourdo. However, Respondent contends that the hours worked by the other nonunit employees, DuQuaine and Watson, are not properly assigned to the discriminatees since both DuQuaine and Watson have more companywide seniority than either Mix or Bourdo. This argument is premised upon Respondent's claim that for layoff purposes it historically followed a companywide seniority plan under which during slack periods it would assign truckdriving work to senior nonunit employees able to perform the job, while laying off more junior unit employees.

In its decision issued on July 30, 1980 (No. 79-2062), the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in a case involving the same parties, rejected this very contention. There, the court, in enforcing a Board Order (244 NLRB 72 (1979)) which sought, inter alia, to remedy the subsequent illegal layoffs of Mix, Bourdo, and Williams, dismissed Respondent's argument that the layoffs were "caused by a lack of sufficient work and in accordance with a companywide seniority plan," holding:

> The timing of the layoffs and other testimony in the record supports the Board's inference of the illicit cause of the layoffs, and the employers' contention that the layoffs were caused by a lack of work and in accordance with the seniority plan is significantly undercut by testimony that during the period the bargaining unit employees were laid off, their trucks were driven by non-bargaining unit employees, at least one of whom had less seniority than Bourdo did. The employers' suggested interpretation of their seniority plan, one that would justify these layoffs,[7] is lacking sufficient evidentiary support in the record and would contravene a provision in the collective bargaining agreement between the parties that expired in May 1977.[8] In these circumstances, we believe the Board's inference of an anti-Union animus behind the layoffs is justified and supported by substantial evidence.

[1] This case was consolidated, for purposes of hearing only, with Cases 30-CA-4253, 30-CA-4264, 30-CA-4437, and 30-CA-4485 involving the same parties.

[2] The revised specification takes into account that period in early 1975 when Bourdo, due to illness, was unavailable for work.

[3] Likewise, the amended specification does not seek fringe benefit contributions for Williams for the layoff period but, rather, only for the period prior to the layoffs during which Respondent unlawfully refused to make fringe benefit contributions.

> This court's prior decision in N.L.R.B. v. United Contractors, Inc. and JMCO Trucking, Inc. (No. 78-2609, 7th Cir. 1980) is not inconsistent with this determination. In that case, this court had before it the Board's back-pay computation that required the employers to pay for the entire period of the prior illegal layoffs of Bourdo, Williams, and Mix. The computation was based upon the average weekly hours employees had worked in the months preceding and following the layoffs, and the employers complained that this computation failed to take into account the "seasonal variation" in the employers' business that would have resulted in a decrease in the hours the employees actually would have worked in the layoff period. This court agreed with the employers' argument and held that the Board's computation should have taken into account the evidence of these slack periods. That holding is irrelevant to the present issue, however, for we do not interpret the Board's argument here to be that such slack periods did not exist, but rather that the present layoffs were not caused by the occurrence of these periods and were not in accordance with the actual seniority plan.
> ---
> [7] Mr. Mews, JMCO president, testified that his interpretation of the seniority plan was that:
> > A man with one skill can have less seniority than someone else with less time on the job, if the person with less time on the job has a higher level of skill.
> [8] The provision read as follows:
> > The Employer . . . shall not direct or require its employees or persons other than the employees in the bargaining units here involved to perform work which is recognized as the work of the employees in said units. . . .
> The Board's order required the Company to honor and enforce the collective bargaining agreement expiring in 1977 "until a new agreement is reached."

The contract provision cited by the court has been in effect at all times material hereto. The clause, in full, provides:

> Work Assignments: The Employer hereby assigns all work involved in the operation of the Employer's truck equipment during the operation, loading and unloading thereof to the employees in the bargaining unit here involved. The Employer agrees to respect the jurisdictional rules of the Union and shall not direct or require its employees or persons other than the employees in the bargaining units here involved to perform work which is recognized as the work of the employees in said units. This is not to interfere with bona fide unions.

While there is record evidence that in the years preceding the unlawful layoffs of 1974 truckdriving work was at least occasionally performed by nonunit employees,[4] there is a lack of evidence demonstrating that that occurred during periods when unit employees were on layoff status. President Mews' testimony that Respondent has historically followed a companywide seniority plan, at least for layoff purposes, has not been supported by credible evidence showing that such a practice was in effect prior to the discriminatory layoff period.

Employee Frank Watson, a cement finisher and Respondent's most senior employee on a companywide basis, testified that Respondent has, indeed, maintained a companywide seniority system for layoff purposes. Watson, a qualified truckdriver, conceded that in the years preceding the discriminatory layoffs of 1974 he was laid off during the winter periods while Mix and Bourdo, with less companywide seniority, continued to drive. However, according to Watson, this occurred because he, Watson, would request a layoff each year in order to allow the unit drivers to continue to work.[5]

I found Watson to be a vague, argumentative, hostile, and evasive witness and, accordingly, I have accorded little weight to his testimony, particularly in light of certain credited, uncontradicted testimony of Bourdo. Thus, Bourdo testified that in the 1970 to 1974 period, during the fall and winter months while Watson was on layoff status, Watson would visit the jobsites and tell Mix and Bourdo: "You guys really got it good. I'm laid off and you guys are working." Such statements by Watson belie his claim that his layoff status was of a voluntary nature.

Respondent has again failed to demonstrate the existence of a companywide seniority plan under which, even absent the discrimination, Mix and Bourdo would have been laid off during the backpay period while nonunit personnel performed the customary work of those employees; that is, truckdriving. In reaching this conclusion, I rely upon the factors set forth by the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in its July 30, 1980, opinion; Respondent's practice prior to the discriminatory period of laying off during slack periods its most senior employee, Watson, a qualified truckdriver, while retaining the services of unit employees with less companywide seniority; and Respondent's use of Welda during the 1974-75 backpay period as a truckdriver, despite the fact that he enjoyed less companywide seniority than either Mix or Bourdo. I conclude that the amended specification seeking backpay based upon the hours actually worked by replacement drivers sets forth an appropriate measure of backpay.

Upon the foregoing findings and conclusions, and upon the entire record in this case, I hereby issue the following recommended:

[4] Respondent's president, James Mews, testified that by its inaction the Union had acquiesced in a practice, contrary to the cited contractual provision, of assigning driving work to nonunit employees. However, there is no evidence that the Union became aware of such a practice prior to the Board hearings in the instant matter which commenced early in 1975. On cross-examination, Mews conceded that since that time the Union has consistently protested the making of such assignments. At one point during his testimony, Mews appeared to deny the existence of a driver's unit, contending that "everybody in our company does everything, so everybody is in every unit." This answer was in conflict with Mews' response to a March 28, 1980, interrogatory, in which he stated that Mix, Bourdo, and Williams were the only employees in the drivers unit.

[5] In 1974 Watson was recalled from layoff status for a period of 2 weeks, to drive a truck, at a time when Bourdo was ill and unavailable for work.

ORDER[8]

The Respondents, United Contractors Incorporated and JMCO Trucking Incorporated, Joint Employers, Menomonee Falls, Wisconsin, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall make Milan Mix and Guy Bourdo whole by payments to them in the amounts set forth below, together with 6-percent interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), less tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws:

Guy Bourdo	1,678.42

Respondents shall make payments on behalf of Milan Mix, Guy Bourdo, and Percy Williams to the Milwaukee Area Truck Drivers Health and Welfare Fund and the Central States, Southeast and Southwest Areas Pension Fund, in the amounts set forth below, plus lawful interest accrued to the date of payment:

	H & W Fund	Pension Fund
Milan Mix	$445.50	$519.00
Guy Bourdo	412.50	480.00
Percy Williams	100.65	118.95

[8] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Carson International, Inc. and Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL–CIO, Petitioner. Case 13–RC–15655

January 15, 1982

DECISION AND DIRECTION

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Pursuant to authority granted it by the National Labor Relations Board under Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a three-member panel has considered the Petitioner's objections to an election held on January 19, 1981,[1] and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of same. The Board has reviewed the record in light of the Employer's exceptions[2] and brief, and hereby adopts the Regional Director's recommendations, with the following modifications.[3]

The election was based on a petition filed on December 23, 1980. Prior thereto, an earlier petition in Case 13–RC–15620 was filed on November 10, 1980, and withdrawn on November 21, 1980, by the Union. The only objection to which exceptions were filed alleges that when the Petitioner was distributing literature to employees, the Employer's supervisors took the literature away from the employees. It further alleges that supervisors retrieved union literature from nonwork areas. The Regional Director recommended that a hearing be directed on the issues raised by this objection.

The sole issue before us is whether the scope of the hearing should be extended to include the consideration of conduct which occurred prior to the filing of the petition in this case. The Regional Director concluded that it should be so extended because the critical period before the election began on November 10, 1980, the date of filing of the petition which was later withdrawn. The Employer contends that the critical period began on December 23, 1980, the date of the filing of the petition herein, and that the hearing should be limited to the issues raised by conduct which occurred during that period. We find merit in the Employer's contention.

In Ideal Electric,[4] the Board decided that the critical period during which conduct may be considered objectionable begins at the date of filing of a petition which culminates in an election. In adopting this rule, the Board adhered to the principle that equity and orderly administration require the establishment of a definite cutoff date applicable to the consideration of alleged objectionable conduct.[5] The Regional Director, however, would make an exception based, inter alia, on Monroe Tube Company, Inc., 220 NLRB 302, 305 (1975).[6] We find no basis for an exception. In Monroe Tube, the union filed a petition on August 16, 1973, which was withdrawn on September 5, 1973, and refiled the following day. The Board allowed an exception to the Ideal Electric rule, finding that where the first petition was filed a short time prior to the second petition and a petition was on file at the time the alleged misconduct occurred, it was proper to begin the critical period at the filing of the first petition. Further, the conduct at issue had been found violative of Section 8(a)(1) in a complaint case which was consolidated with the representation case. Here, the first petition was filed 43 days before the filing of the second petition. Further, there was a hiatus of 31 days between the withdrawal of the first petition and the filing of the second petition. Thus, in contrast to Monroe Tube, where the second petition came immediately on the heels of the withdrawal of the first petition, there is a significant period during which the Board's processes were not involved. Moreover, no conduct has been found violative of the Act. In these circumstances, we see no reason to deviate from the Ideal Electric rule.

Indeed, we have applied the Ideal Electric rule in cases virtually identical to the one before us. In R.

[1] The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election. The tally was 73 votes for, and 482 against, the Petitioner; there were 11 void and 26 challenged ballots, an insufficient number to affect the results.

[2] In the absence of exceptions, we adopt, pro forma, the Regional Director's recommendations to overrule Objections 4 and 7 and to hold a hearing on additional alleged objectionable conduct referred to by the Regional Director in his report as "Additional Objections"; and his acceptance of Petitioner's withdrawal of Objections 1, 2, 5, and 6.

[3] The Employer's request for oral argument is hereby denied as the record, including the exceptions and brief, adequately present the issues and positions of both parties.

[4] Ideal Electric and Manufacturing Company, 134 NLRB 1275 (1961), which reconsidered and modified the cutoff date for consideration of objectionable conduct in contested cases as previously established in F. W. Woolworth Co., 109 NLRB 1446 (1954).

[5] See R. Dakin and Company, 191 NLRB 343 (1971), enforcement denied 477 F.2d 492 (9th Cir. 1973), and on remand 207 NLRB 521 (1973), accepting the court's decision as the law of the case.

[6] Enforcement denied on other grounds 545 F.2d 1320 (2d Cir. 1976). The Regional Director also cites The Catholic Medical Center of Brooklyn and Queens, Inc., Mary Immaculate Hospital Division and St. Mary's Hospital Division v. N.L.R.B., 589 F.2d 1166 (2d Cir. 1978), on remand 245 NLRB 808 (1979), enfd. 628 F.2d 240 (2d Cir. 1980). That case, in which the employer refused to bargain to test certification, involved the filing and withdrawal of a petition prior to the filing of the petition which resulted in an election. In the underlying representation case the Board applied the Ideal Electric rule and refused to consider alleged objectionable conduct occurring prior to the filing of the operative petition. In reviewing the certification, the Second Circuit, without deciding the validity of the Ideal Electric rule in the usual case, directed the Board to consider evidence of objectionable conduct which occurred prior to the filing of the operative petition. The Board accepted the remand and followed the court's direction; however, it was clear that the Board was following the court's decision as the law of the case and was not establishing a rule of law to govern the disposition of future cases. Thus, the Regional Director's reliance on this case is misplaced.

Dakin and Company, supra, the union filed three petitions: One on October 14, 1968, which was withdrawn on November 4; a second on November 4 which was withdrawn on November 8; and a third which was filed on December 5 and culminated in an election. The contention was made that where a number of petitions are filed seriatim, the cutoff date for consideration of objectionable conduct should be the date of the filing of the initial petition. The Board rejected this contention, noting the hiatus between the withdrawal of the second petition and the filing of the third petition. Emphasizing the considerations of equity and orderly administration underlying the Ideal Electric rule, the Board held that it would be destructive of those considerations to consider conduct allegedly engaged in before the operative petition.[7]

Accordingly, we shall apply the Ideal Electric rule and date the critical period from December 23, 1980, the date of the filing of the second petition. The hearing on Objection 3 is, therefore, limited to the considerations of conduct which occurred within the critical period as a basis for setting aside the election. As it is clear from the Regional Director's report that material and substantial issues of fact exist concerning the above critical period,[8] we hereby deny the Employer's request that the case be remanded to the Regional Director not for purposes of conducting a hearing but rather to determine whether improper conduct occurred during said period.

DIRECTION

It is hereby directed that a hearing be held before a duly designated hearing officer for the purpose of receiving evidence to resolve issues raised by the Petitioner's Objection 3 as set forth in our Decision herein and by the allegation discussed in the Regional Director's report under the heading "Additional Objections."

IT IS FURTHER DIRECTED that the hearing officer designated for the purpose of conducting the hearing shall prepare and cause to be served on the parties a report containing resolutions of the credibility of witnesses, findings of fact, and recommendations to the Board as to the disposition of the said issues. Within the time prescribed by the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, either party may file with the Board in Washington, D.C., eight copies of exceptions thereto. Immediately upon the filing of such exceptions, the party filing same shall serve a copy thereof on the other party and shall file a copy with the Regional Director. If no exceptions are filed thereto, the Board will adopt the recommendations of the hearing officer.

IT IS FURTHER DIRECTED that the above-entitled case be, and it hereby is, remanded to the Regional Director for Region 13 for the purpose of conducting such hearing, and that the said Regional Director be, and he hereby is, authorized to issue notice thereof.

[8] Thus, the Regional Director stated that there was testimony that the Employer's supervisors took the Petitioner's literature away from employees as it was being distributed to them by the Petitioner, at times after the filing of the petition on December 23, 1980.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On June 23, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Giannasi issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions [2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, AMPAC, a subsidiary of Kane-Miller Corp., Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against our employees because they participate in a strike or engage in other protected concerted or union activity.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL offer to Stanley Karwaczka full and immediate reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights, and WE WILL make him and employees Frank Sekula, Jesus Gonzales, Juan Perez, Warren Mills, Alfonso Pineda, Joseph Wargacki, and Stanislaw Krycinski whole for any loss of earnings or benefits they may have suffered as a result of their unlawful discharge, with interest.

AMPAC, A SUBSIDIARY OF KANE-MILLER CORP.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GIANNASI, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard for 10 days in December 1980 and in February and March 1981 in Chicago, Illinois. The original complaint in Case 13-CA-19346 issued on January 16, 1980, and alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Board Act, as amended, by making proposals during bargaining negotiations with the Charging Party Union which were manifestly unacceptable to it. Those proposals were identified as follows: A 94-cent-per-hour wage reduction with no claim of financial inability to pay and the elimination of the cost-of-living allowance clause, the arbitration clause, the union-shop provision, and the union dues-checkoff clause from the contract of the parties which was to and did expire on December 20, 1979.

[1] The Charging Party has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] We adopt the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that an altercation between Supervisor Mojica and Union Representative Ramirez did not constitute a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. However, we find it unnecessary to rely on his additional comment that, even if the incident had been found to be coercive, the time and events that have elapsed since the incident make it doubtful that a violation should be found and a remedy ordered.

[3] We find no merit in the General Counsel's or the Charging Party's exceptions to the failure of the Administrative Law Judge to provide certain additional remedies. While the General Counsel excepts to the failure to order "unconditional" reinstatement of certain discharged strikers who have, in fact, been reinstated, he does not contend thct their reinstatement remains other than unconditional and complete. We also deny the Charging Party's request for attorneys' fees, bargaining expenses, and other costs incurred. See Wellington Hall Nursing Home, Inc., 257 NLRB No. 105, fn. 2 (1981), and cases cited therein.

In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

The complaint also alleges that Respondent, through statements by General Superintendent Albert Mojica, committed three violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. An amendment to this complaint alleges that a strike by Respondent's employees on and after January 18, 1980, was an unfair labor practice strike. A second amendment, dated May 29, 1980, alleges that Joseph P. Carey, an attorney and an officer of Kane-Miller, was an agent of Respondent.

A consolidated complaint in Cases 13-CA-19724, et al., which issued on June 2, 1980, alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by distributing letters to employees during the course of negotiations, describing Respondent's negotiating positions, and by encouraging the Union to engage in a strike. Also alleged as violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act are Respondent's failure, after February 25, 1980, to deduct and tender dues to the Union and its refusal to permit the Union to designate its own stewards and business representatives to administer a collective-bargaining agreement allegedly reached by the parties on that date. The consolidated complaint also alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by virtue of a physical assault by Mojica on a union business representative in the presence of employees and Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging a number of employees for engaging in the strike.

The two outstanding complaints were further consolidated by order dated June 2, 1980. A third amendment to Case 13-CA-19346 was issued on July 2, 1980, alleging that Respondent violated the Act by placing advertisements in local newspapers "seeking employees as permanent replacements for its striking employees who were engaged in an unfair labor practice strike" and by failing, since on or about December 20, 1979, to deduct and tender dues deductions to the Union pursuant to an orally extended collective-bargaining agreement. This amendment also alleges that Respondent violated the Act since December 20, 1979, by ceasing to recognize the Union as bargaining representative.[1]

Respondent dutifully and timely filed answers to all the above documents disputing the substantive allegations therein. After the hearing in this case the parties filed briefs which were received on or about May 4, 1981.

Upon the entire record herein, the testimony of the witnesses and my observation of their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, an Illinois corporation with plants and offices in Chicago, Illinois, is engaged in the slaughtering of hogs. During a representative 1-year period, Respondent purchased and received materials, valued in excess of $50,000, at its Chicago facilities directly from points outside the State of Illinois. Accordingly, I find, as Respondent admits, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Charging Party Union (hereafter the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Alleged Refusal To Bargain

1. The facts

a. Introduction

Respondent maintains two separate offices and plants in Chicago. One plant is located at 4277 South Racine Avenue; the other plant is located at 3946 South Normal Avenue. Respondent engages in the business of killing, cutting, and boning heavy hogs for sale to other firms which further process the meat. Although at one time nearly all of the commercial hog slaughtering in the United States was done in Chicago, Respondent is now the only entity in Chicago engaged in this business.

The purchase of livestock constitutes 58 percent of Respondent's cost of goods sold. The next largest factor is the cost of direct and indirect labor, which constitutes 5 percent of the total cost. Respondent has no control over the price paid for livestock, a commodity item; it does have some control over the cost of labor through the collective-bargaining process. When Respondent is able to achieve lower labor costs, there is more money available to compete in the marketplace for the purchase of livestock in a volume sufficient to operate its plants at optimum production levels. The meat industry, of which Respondent is a part, is a high volume industry with a typical return of profit on sales of about 1 to 2 percent.

In October 1978, and again a month or two later, officials of Respondent, including Lawrence Clark, Respondent's vice president, general manager, and chief executive officer, and Joseph P. Carey, Respondent's labor counsel, met with representatives of the Union, including Walter Piotrowski, the Union's secretary-treasurer. Clark told the union representatives that Respondent was losing money and asked the Union to agree to a waiver of the 34-cent wage increase due shortly thereafter to employees under the then-current collective-bargaining agreement and also two cost-of-living adjustments that were to become effective prior to the expiration of the agreement on December 19, 1979. Respondent produced financial statements in support of its request. Piotrowski denied the relief sought. Clark became quite upset and either he or Carey stated that Respondent would seek to obtain relief from what it believed were inordinately high wages in the next bargaining negotiations and that the Union could expect some "problems" when the current agreement expired.

b. The negotiations

Prior to the commencement of collective-bargaining negotiations for a new agreement in late October 1979, a

"management committee" comprising of certain of Respondent's representatives met to consider and adopt bargaining objectives in the forthcoming negotiations with the Union. The objectives were: (1) the reduction of labor costs through a "roll-back" of 94 cents in the wage rates existent at the time of expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement between the parties,[2] or, in the alternative, no increase in the level of wages in effect at the expiration of the current agreement; (2) elimination of the cost-of-living provision in such agreement; (3) substitution of an employer-sponsored pension plan for the existing union-sponsored multiemployer plan;[3] (4) substitution of Respondent's contribution to a union-operated clinic for an increase in health and welfare benefits for employees;[4] (5) elimination of the requirement to submit unresolved grievances to arbitration;[5] and (6) achievement of a "two-tier labor structure."[6]

On October 24, 1979, collective-bargaining negotiations between the parties commenced. The first and subsequent meetings through December 17 were each attended by Clark and Carey for Respondent and by Walter Piotrowski for the Union. In addition, Respondent and the Union were each represented in bargaining by a number of other individuals.

At the first bargaining session between the parties on October 24, Clark presented Respondent's proposals which incorporated, inter alia, the bargaining objectives formulated by Respondent's "management committee." Piotrowski objected to the proposed deletion of the arbitration clause in the old contract. Carey explained that arbitration was not guaranteed by statute and that Respondent did not mean "to undermine anyone's rights." Respondent's officials explained their position by referring to what they believed was the Union's uncooperative stand in failing to offer Respondent relief on wages the year before and its insistence on taking every case to arbitration. Piotrowski also objected to the proposed deletion of the existing union-security clause and dues-checkoff clause. Carey stated that Respondent was offering voluntary union membership rather than mandatory union membership and that its position on dues checkoff was prompted by the Union's position in involving Respondent in arbitration cases concerning employees who had engaged in criminal conduct. Piotrowski was told "that the obvious criminal aspects of [such] cases should have dissuaded [the] Union from pursuing them [so as thereby to relieve Respondent] of incurred arbitration expenses." Piotrowski defended the Union's position but Carey stated that the Union's "insistence [in] taking every case to arbitration, regardless of its merits, was a wrong way to solve union/management problems."

Respondent presented its wage proposal with a statement that it was not claiming inability to pay more than was offered. The Union proposed a general wage increase and a continuation of a cost-of-living clause. Respondent rejected these proposals. The parties reached agreement on several proposals including some of the Union's proposals.

At the second bargaining session, held on November 7, the Union accepted some 13 management proposals but objected to Respondent's proposal calling for a 94-cent reduction in hourly wages and a 2-year wage freeze. Clark stated that there were "plenty of people willing to work at these rates." At one point, Clark stated that "it was his responsibility to run the [Respondent's] business and because somebody in the past agreed to a contract injurious to the [Respondent's] best interest, he, as the responsible manager, had to correct it." Clark advised Piotrowski that "because my predecessor gave in easily, I must state again, this will not be the case with us. I have given you the reasons for the [Respondent's] request[s] and all we get is NO."

At this meeting, Respondent proposed a new pension plan to replace the multiemployer plan presently in existence. Respondent's officials stated that a company plan would ensure stability in employment and they would offer to match or improve existing benefits. Piotrowski promised to study the new plan. Thereafter the following exchange ensued as shown in the minutes of the meeting:

> Piotrowski said that [Respondent] threatened them with a strike and all that he is hearing are only negatives . . . . Carey interjected . . . that the [Respondent] did not threaten to strike, but [is] ready to take a strike . . . . Clark again repeated that the Union had better get used to hearing [a] tough stand by the [Respondent], jobs are not worth that much and he was not ready to pay for them . . . . Piotrowski said that the [Respondent's] employees are good and efficient and deserve better than what the [Respondent] is offering . . . . Clark [replied sarcastically], "I saw some of those good employees

[2] At this point the amount of the last two cost-of-living adjustments had been determined to amount in the aggregate to 60 cents per hour. This amount, when added to the final wage increase of 34 cents per hour under the then-current agreement, made a total of 94 cents per hour by which Respondent's labor costs had increased since the time the Union's representatives had denied Respondent the relief requested in the meetings held in the latter part of 1978.

[3] In preparation for collective bargaining, Respondent consulted with an actuary and the individual responsible for the administration of the private pension plan of Kane-Miller Corp. Respondent decided that the pension contribution paid to the Union-sponsored plan would, if contributed to Respondent's own pension plan, result in a 70-percent increase in benefits for an employee retiring after 20 years' service.

[4] According to Respondent, only five to six employees utilized the clinic and other employees found it too crowded and too far distant from where they lived.

[5] Respondent's position was that it had been advised by the Union at some time during the contract term that every unresolved grievance would be taken to arbitration. Respondent believed that it was forced to defend personnel actions in cases it felt should not properly have been submitted to arbitration. The record shows that two arbitrations particularly rankled Respondent. The first involved the discharge of an employee in the summer of 1979. After Respondent submitted its evidence, the case was resolved by virtue of the resignation of the employee. The other case involved three individuals who were discharged in early 1979 after an undercover investigation which Respondent felt overwhelmingly showed their guilt on charges of fraud, theft, and other misconduct. The Union sought arbitration and a hearing opened in October 1979. Criminal charges were brought against two of the individuals for kidnapping a witness of Respondent who testified on its behalf, and they were arrested during the initial stage of the arbitration proceeding. Those charges are still pending as is the arbitration case.

> at [the] last arbitration hearing." [Following argument regarding the last arbitration case] Carey said that the Union's lawyer told him that he [had] suggested to . . . Piotrowski to take every grievance case to arbitration and that . . . Piotrowski is following this advice. . . . Piotrowski again responded [there were] grave legal consequences brought to bear upon the Union were they not to defend their members in all cases.

In the third bargaining session, held on November 8, Respondent proposed withdrawal from the Union's clinic and utilization of the monthly contribution for a new and improved employee health and welfare plan. Agreement was reached on guaranteed hours of work and seniority.

At the fourth bargaining session, held on November 14, a commissioner of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service appeared at the request of Respondent. Some agreements were reached but, at one point Piotrowski asked that Respondent reconsider its proposals concerning "wages, length of contract, union shop, check-off and arbitrations." He threatened that "if [Respondent] insists on all of these points, then [the Union] is ready for a strike. Thereafter, Piotrowski charged that Respondent's operation was comparable to that of other packers who paid relatively high wages. Clark replied, "You are wrong as hell, we are different, different as night and day. You better listen to what I am saying." Subsequently, Clark warned, "You still want to take, but this time we are not willing to give." After Piotrowski asked that Respondent "give us something," Clark pointed out that "I just [offered] you an increase in [health and welfare] and [p]ension." At the conclusion of the session, the commissioner summarized the positions of the parties and stated, "I trust, maybe, between now and next meeting . . . both parties could review their positions and come up with some movement, and not just going over the same thing."

On November 15, 1979, Respondent wrote the first of many letters to employees describing its negotiating positions and summarizing the negotiating sessions. There is no contention by the General Counsel that these letters were inaccurate or inherently unlawful. In the November 15 letter, for example, Respondent pointed out that it had offered a pension plan and a health plan to replace the existing union-sponsored plans which contained substantially greater benefits in its view than the Union's plans. Respondent also set forth its position on a rollback in wages, the elimination of a cost-of-living provision, union security, dues checkoff, and arbitration.

In the fifth and sixth bargaining sessions the parties reached some agreements. The parties discussed the pension issue. Although Respondent's plan offered $15 per year of credited service as opposed to the Union's plan of $9 per year of credited service, Respondent's plan offered no credit for past service. This meant that some employees with past service under the old plan would not have any past credits under Respondent's plan although they would retain credits under the Union's plan. Clark explained that Respondent's proposal to eliminate arbitration from the new agreement was based on the "bad experience" Respondent had had with arbitration in the then-current agreement. Clark also insisted that the wage rates paid by Respondent were much higher than were the rates for the same work performed under contracts maintained by the Union with other employers, particularly the so-called Association contract. Piotrowski disagreed and a long discussion followed concerning wage rates.

At one point in the sixth negotiating session Clark asked what it would take to reach an agreement. Piotrowski replied, "dues checkoff, union shop and arbitration." Piotrowski was asked whether the Union would consider concessions to Respondent in regard to wages if the latter would withdraw its proposals concerning dues checkoff, union shop, and arbitration. Piotrowski answered no. Piotrowski stated that there would be no meaningful negotiations unless there was agreement on "dues checkoff, union shop and arbitration." Respondent's officials replied that its proposal to eliminate these features was based on the Union's willingness to defend "gangsters and thieves" and asked that certain pending arbitration cases be dropped. Respondent had also objected to the Union's failure to accommodate Respondent when it wished to exchange an existing contractual holiday for one during the Pope's visit to Chicago. The Union apparently declined the offer.

At the seventh negotiating session on November 26, 1979, the Union withdrew a number of its own economic and noneconomic proposals and Respondent agreed to the Union's 21-cent-per-hour night-shift premium proposal. At the eighth session on November 29, Respondent proposed a wage progression scale for newly hired employees with a starting rate of $4.50 per hour. The Union countered with one starting at $5.10 per hour together with any further increases negotiated by the parties. At this point the major unresolved issues included pensions, wages, dues checkoff, union security, arbitration, and continuation of the union clinic.

At the ninth bargaining session held on December 10, Clark stated that if a settlement were not reached "there will be no extension of contract or retroactive pay." The parties continued discussing wage rates and exchanged views as to whether the wage rates paid by Respondent were too high in relation to other jobs covered by other union contracts. At the close of the meeting, Carey asked Piotrowski to give some thought prior to the next bargaining session to "Clark's [proposed] trade of his proposal of compulsory union membership, dues checkoff and arbitration for the wage rollback and the elimination of COLA."

The minutes of the 10th bargaining session, held on December 12, show that a representative of the Union's International, United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO (hereafter called International Union), appeared for the first time in the negotiations between the parties. After discussion of the outstanding unresolved issues, which resulted in no significant changes in position, Clark restated Respondent's position that there would be no extension of the present agreement following its expiration on December 19 and no retroactive pay. Thereafter, he observed that an impasse had been reached, which left both parties free to exercise their "lawful weapon options." Clark also stated that Respondent had the right to continue to operate and hire permanent replacements in the event of a strike.

At the 11th bargaining session, held on December 17, another representative of the International Union, Clayton Sayles, was present. At the outset, the parties reviewed the unresolved issues remaining in the negotiations. The Union conditionally withdrew a number of its proposals and Clark objected to the conditional nature of the withdrawal. Clark also stated that in "check[ing] with his legal counsel . . . Carey [he, Clark] was advised . . . that the [Respondent] can act unilaterally to implement its wage cut proposal, upon expiration of [the] contract. [Respondent's] position [is] that come Thursday morning, December 20, 1979, the wage roll-back will go into effect." Thereafter, Sayles inquired whether Respondent intended to implement unilaterally its other proposals on December 20, to which Clark replied, "No, just the 94 cent wage rollback." Sayles next inquired whether the Union could assume that Respondent would permit employees to continue to work following the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement between the parties on December 19. Carey responded that, upon the expiration of the agreement, "conditions still exist." However, he advised there would be "no contract extension."

On December 18, Clark wrote Piotrowski a letter which was delivered to him at 9:40 a.m. In the letter, Clark stated:

> Because of the holiday season and contrary to our position at last night's bargaining session [Respondent] has changed its mind. The 94 cents/hour rollback will be postponed pending further negotiations.
> There will be no cut in pay [on December 20].

On December 18, Charles Hayes, a vice president of the International Union and regional director of its region 12,[7] the geographic jurisdiction of which includes the Union, contacted Carey to arrange a luncheon meeting with Clark. It was agreed that the three would meet on December 19 at Chez Paul Restaurant in Chicago.

On December 19, Clark, Carey, Hayes, and Sayles met for lunch at Chez Paul Restaurant. Hayes asked what could be done to reach a settlement in the current collective-bargaining negotiations between the parties. Clark explained he "could not live" with the high wage rates that Respondent had to pay its bargaining unit employees because the jobs involved were simply not worth such rates. He further explained that the Union had been successful in negotiating high wage rates with certain Chicago meat processors who were not in the slaughtering business, unlike Respondent. Clark stated that his predecessors with Respondent "gave away too much" when they agreed to the same high wage rates and that applicants for employment who had worked for nearby employers who slaughtered beef and lamb were paid substantially lower wage rates under contracts where Local 55, another local of the International, was the bargaining representative. Clark suggested that, if Hayes was really interested in reaching a settlement, he, in his position, could "switch the [Respondent] from Local 100 to Local 55 and he would be under less pressure to raise our rates in comparison to these [meat] processors in town." Hayes indicated he had no authority to do this, although the International Union's president did, and he suggested a meeting with Harry Poole, an executive vice president of the International Union.

After a short break, Hayes announced that he had arranged for a meeting to be held in Washington, D.C., on January 8, 1980, to permit discussion of Clark's proposal. Hayes also indicated that he had phoned Piotrowski to cancel the scheduled bargaining session following the luncheon meeting that day and "that the negotiations were going to be moved to Washington, D.C. to see if we could not reach an agreement there." Hayes added that Piotrowski would not be present at the Washington meeting.

In the course of conversation during the luncheon meeting, Hayes also said that he was aware that the agreement between Respondent and the Union was to expire at midnight and that Respondent had rescinded its position on the 94-cent-per-hour rollback. He inquired about Respondent's intention to pay the "holiday pay coming up." In response, Carey stated that all working conditions would remain unchanged following expiration of the agreement between the parties but, because the agreement was not extended, union security, dues checkoff, and arbitration of new grievances would not be continued. Hayes specifically asked if Respondent would continue to check off dues on January 1. Carey responded that checkoff cards become invalid at the expiration date of a contract and that, under Section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act, such cards were not valid after such date.[8]

[7] In this capacity, Hayes is responsible for the administration of his region while directing a staff of six International representatives, including Sayles. Among Hayes' duties are the negotiation of collective-bargaining agreements and the "policing" of such agreements.

[8] The above is based primarily on the credible testimony of Clark whose recital of the events of the December 19 meeting was clear and detailed. Hayes' version is not inconsistent with Clark's except in one respect. Hayes testified that "Charlie [presumably Carey or Clark] told me that [Respondent] would be prepared to extend the contract based on my request, but not sign an extension, contingent upon a meeting being scheduled in Washington . . . ." Clark specifically denied that Respondent agreed to such an extension and I credit Clark. First of all, the alleged extension makes no sense in the context of the bargaining positions of the parties and what happened in subsequent meetings. Respondent had made clear in prior bargaining sessions that the current agreement would not be extended. Secondly, even Hayes' account implies that Respondent was only "prepared" to extend the contract depending on the outcome of the meeting in Washington. There was no quid pro quo for the extension and it is implausible that Respondent would agree to such an extension without some significant concession such as an agreement to forgo the strike which loomed on the horizon. Finally, I observed in the demeanor of Hayes and in the way he testified a less coherent witness and one whose recitation of facts and memory for details was not as clear as Clark's. It seems to me that Hayes may have confused Carey's remarks about what was to happen at the expiration of the current agreement. For example, on cross-examination, he admitted that Carey told him that it was the policy of his company not to make dues-checkoff deductions in the absence of an extension of the contract and that "they were not going to make the dues deductions . . . and that they would let things remain, the status would remain until after we had a meeting in Washington." In short, nothing in the record either directly or indirectly supports Hayes' testimony that Respondent agreed to an extension of the old agreement.

On January 8, 1980, Clark, Carey, Hayes, and Poole met at the headquarters of the International Union in Washington, D.C. Clark explained that Respondent's wage rates were too high and that Respondent "just couldn't live with those rates." Clark suggested that, as a means of resolving the "differences" that existed between Respondent and Local 100, "we be put in Local 55." Poole flatly rejected this suggestion and added that he would not set a precedent by "switching companies from one local to another." Poole also stated that he did not think the wage rates paid by Respondent were too high.

On January 16, 1980, Clark, Carey, Hayes, and, possibly, Sayles met in advance of the 12th bargaining session held later that day between Respondent and the Union. In their meeting, Hayes stated that Piotrowski desired that, in the bargaining session to follow, Respondent offer a 1-year contract that would extend the expired agreement without change. Clark refused because Respondent wanted a new agreement with a 2-year term and because Piotrowski's suggestion did not comport with Respondent's bargaining objectives. Respondent's officials made clear that they would not sign a contract with a cost-of-living clause and without a cut in wages. Hayes warned that the Union was preparing for a strike vote.[9]

The minutes for the bargaining session show that Hayes and Sayles were both present, as well as one of the Union's attorneys. Clark began by relating that, since the last bargaining session held on December 17, 1979, he and Carey had met with representatives of the International Union in Chicago on December 19, and in Washington, D.C., on January 8. He stated a new proposal for an agreement. Respondent offered to continue the existing union-security and dues-checkoff provisions, to retain boning incentives as in the expired agreement, and to maintain wage rates under the expired agreement without change over a new agreement with a 2-year term. This represented a change from Respondent's position in prior bargaining sessions, wherein Respondent had rejected inclusion of dues checkoff and compulsory union membership in a new agreement while offering to increase boning incentives. Respondent had withdrawn its wage rollback proposal after the last bargaining session. Respondent's proposal also included all its previous positions such as pension, health plan, and the elimination of the arbitration clause.

Piotrowski responded that it was difficult to accept the 2-year wage freeze and the elimination of the Union's pension plan and the Union's clinic. International Representative Hayes stated that the Union could not agree to a 2-year contract without economic improvements and stated that this was a "gut" issue. The Union also responded that the arbitration position of Respondent was unacceptable. Hayes stated that the Union did not condone criminal activities but that the Union did not want to sit in judgment of members when considering their cases for arbitration. Hayes stated that "the union does not want to be judge and jury."

Later in this bargaining session, the Union countered that it was willing to accept a 1-year extension of the then-expired agreement with the retention of the Union's pension program, arbitration provision, and clinic. Following consideration of the Union's revised demands, Clark stated that Respondent would agree to a new agreement over a 2-year term with a wage reopener to determine second year wage rates, but Respondent's remaining proposals were basically unchanged from the preceding offer. Following the last change in Respondent's bargaining stance, Clark warned:

> [I]f this proposal fails to persuade you to sign the contract, we will maintain this position, even if it takes a strike to do it, as you have this right to do, but we will continue to operate and have a legal right to hire permanent replacements for anyone and everyone who strikes.

In response to Respondent's most recent offer, Piotrowski said he would place it before the Union's membership for a vote in a meeting on January 17. He said also he would phone Clark the following day to tell him the results of the meeting.

By letter dated January 17, 1980, Clark described to employees Respondent's proposal which he believed had been accepted by the Union in a 2-year contract. In that letter he detailed the contract stating that the employees would continue their same wage rate for 1 year and would be entitled to keep whatever union benefits they had already earned in past years. However, no new pension contribution would be made to the union pension fund. The letter also indicated that, on or about October 19, 1980, hourly wages for the second year of the contract would be discussed at the bargaining table.

The contract proposal was rejected and, on January 18, 1980, the Union commenced a strike at Respondent's facilities.

c. The strike settlement and the agreement of February 28, 1980

The minutes for the 13th bargaining session held on February 4, 1980, show that Sayles and an attorney for the Union were among those present. At the outset, Clark stated that the bargaining session scheduled for January 30 was canceled because of court proceedings held that day. Clark also complained about alleged misconduct on the picket line. The parties exchanged counterproposals but there was no agreement. Piotrowski ended the meeting by accusing Respondent of not bargaining in good faith.

On February 11, Clark, Carey, Hayes, and Sayles met again at Chez Paul Restaurant. Initially, they discussed the work stoppage then more than 3 weeks in progress. Clark again mentioned the possibility of "switching" Respondent from Local 100 to Local 55. Hayes reiterated that the International Union's president, Wynn, was the only one who had authority to do this, and that he was then attending a convention in Florida. Hayes suggested a meeting with Wynn "to see if we couldn't work out an agreement." Hayes left to phone Wynn and, when Hayes returned, he said that Wynn had agreed to a meeting in [9] Hayes did not dispute Clark's testimony on this point although his version did not mention the 1-year extension of the old contract.

Florida on February 13. Hayes also said he wanted Poole and Piotrowski present at this next meeting.

On February 13, Clark, Carey, Hayes, Sayles, Poole, Piotrowski, Wynn, and Jay Foreman, an executive vice president of the International Union, met in Wynn's suite at the Doral Hotel in Miami Beach, Florida. The Union's work stoppage was discussed, as were the respective positions of the parties in bargaining at that time. Also discussed by Clark was the possibility of a "switch of jurisdiction from Local 100 to Local 55." Wynn responded that he had heard Piotrowski was a good administrator and union leader, and that he saw no reason for such a switch which could, in any event, set an undesirable precedent. Wynn suggested that the parties attempt to reach a settlement with him. Wynn stated that he was not opposed to Respondent substituting its pension plan for that of the Union, and that he did not care if Respondent discontinued contributions to the union-sponsored clinic. However, he said there were "certain things" he wanted included in a new agreement between the parties, such as arbitration, union security, and checkoff.[10]

On February 21, Clark, Carey, and Hayes met again at Chez Paul Restaurant in Chicago. By this date, Respondent had replaced a significant number of striking employees and was operating both of its plants. Hayes said he wanted to "salvage the operations." He expressed concern that the bargaining unit would soon be lost since he had heard there was an "imminent back-to-work movement" among employees "on the [picket] line" and he did not wish to see this happen. He inquired whether it was possible to "work out a contract." Clark then proposed the following as alternatives to reaching a settlement: (1) A 1-year contract without a wage increase, cost-of-living adjustments, compulsory union membership, checkoff, or arbitration; or (2) a 2-year contract with region 12 of the International Union or its Local 55 that would include compulsory union membership, checkoff, Respondent's pension plan, and increased health and welfare benefits in place of a contribution to the union-sponsored clinic. Hayes saw a possibility of settlement and suggested another meeting with Wynn, who Hayes said had the authority to conclude a new agreement.[11]

On February 25, Clark, Carey, Hayes, Wynn, and William Orwell, another International Union vice president, met again in Wynn's suite at the Doral Hotel in Miami Beach, Florida. Clark reiterated the alternative proposals outlined to Hayes in Chicago a few days earlier. Wynn, who had been told by Hayes that the Union's situation was "almost a lost cause," said he was prepared to agree to a settlement in order to "salvage matters." After Wynn rejected Clark's proposal for a 1-year agreement, Wynn proposed a settlement in a contract over a 2-year term with: Wages "frozen" the first year and a wage reopener to establish wage rates the second year; a union-shop provision; a new employer-sponsored pension plan; increased health and welfare benefits in the place of contributions to a union-sponsored clinic; and a "two tier" wage structure.[12] Furthermore, Wynn stated that, in order to resolve the strike between Respondent and the Union and for the purpose of effectuating a settlement, the new agreement was to be "a joint contract with Local 100 and the International Union," with the latter to become "solely responsible for the administration of the contract." Wynn added that he did not want reference to the International Union shown on the face of the new agreement. Instead, he suggested that an appendix be affixed to the back of such agreement, which would be executed on behalf of the International Union. According to Clark, Wynn also stated that, if Respondent experienced difficulty with the new agreement, Wynn should be informed and Respondent could "switch jurisdiction" from Local 100 to another, although probably not Local 55. Clark stated that Wynn's proposal was satisfactory to Respondent as a basis for settlement of a new collective-bargaining agreement.[13]

Thereafter, a strike settlement agreement, dated February 25, 1980, was concluded to permit striking employees to return to work following Respondent's dismissal of the strike replacements hired since the inception of the Union's work stoppage several weeks earlier. Respondent preserved the right to discipline or discharge employees who engaged in strike misconduct. The terms of the agreement provided that the Union's strike against Respondent was to end on March 1, at 12:01 a.m.[14]

On February 28, Clark, Carey, Hayes, and Piotrowski met in Hayes' office where a new collective-bargaining agreement was executed for a term effective March 1, 1980, to December 19, 1981. The signers of this agreement were Clark, on behalf of Respondent; Hayes, on behalf of the International Union; and Walter Piotrowski, on behalf of the Union. The agreement expressly identified the parties as Respondent and the International Union "with its subordinate body, Local 100, Beef Boners and Sausage Makers Union (see attached Appendix A), hereinafter collectively referred to as the Union." Before the agreement was executed, Piotrowski had some second thoughts or reservations about the agreement. Hayes testified that Piotrowski's reservations dealt with that portion of the agreement and its appendix which stated that the agreement would be administered by the International Union. According to Hayes, he told Piotrowski that if he did not want to execute the agreement "along these lines" he did not have to do so. According to Clark, Hayes told Piotrowski if he did not sign he "might as well go back on strike again." Piotrowski acquiesced and executed the new agreements.

[10] The above is based on the credited testimony of Clark. Hayes' testimony on this meeting was rather conclusory but was compatible with Clark's version.

[11] In his testimony Hayes failed to mention any meeting on February 21, nor did he deny that such a meeting had occurred.

[12] Basically, this involved less pay for newly hired employees, who would thereafter never progress to the higher wage rates paid more senior employees. As a consequence, while new hires were to enjoy the same wage increase due other employees, there would thereafter always exist a spread in the wage rates between newly hired employees and other employees.

> Mr. Wynn said at that meeting that he was prepared in order to salvage what I had pictured to him to be almost a lost cause, he was prepared to execute an agreement with AMPAC along in conjunction with the local union, providing for, on behalf of the local union, I forget, either in conjunction with or on behalf of the local union, that would enable us to continue to operate, but he was not going to remove the members from that local into another local union.

[14] The strike settlement agreement also contained a provision ending Respondent's participation in the union-sponsored pension plan to which it had been committed during the previous contract. Respondent agreed to make a final contribution of over $15,000 to the plan to fulfill its entire liability to the plan for past benefits for its employees.

Attached to the new collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union was a single page captioned "Appendix A," which was made effective February 25. The appendix was executed on behalf of Respondent by Clark, and on behalf of the International Union by Hayes. In pertinent part, the appendix recited that it was a "[S]upplemental Agreement" and:

> WHEREAS [Respondent] and the International Union have, after Collective Bargaining, executed a Collective Bargaining Agreement;
> WHEREAS, the International Union's subordinate body, Local 100 . . . is also a party to said Collective Bargaining Agreement:
> NOW THEREFORE, the International Union and [Respondent] agree:
> 1. That notwithstanding that Local 100 is also a party to the above mentioned Collective Bargaining Agreement, the International Union will be solely responsible for the administration of [such] Agreement.
> 2. That in the event that it becomes necessary for the International Union to delegate routine items of such administration to staff representatives of Local 100, the International Union will give advance notice to the Respondent of that fact, stating the nature of such delegation and the probable duration of such delegated items.
> 3. The notice required by Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act for the collective bargaining that will occur . . . incident to the wage reopener, will be filed by the International Union, who will actually conduct such Collective Bargaining with [Respondent] and who will not delegate such responsibility to Local 100.

A day or so after the execution of the new collective-bargaining agreement and its Appendix A, the Union held a membership meeting at which Hayes was also present. He explained the content of the new agreement to the membership. He also read the content of Appendix A, and this was followed by his explanation of its content. He finished by recommending that the membership adopt and ratify the new agreement and Appendix A. Thereafter, Hayes' remarks were interpreted to the membership in the Polish and Spanish languages for the benefit of the members present who understood only one or the other of these languages. Subsequently, a vote was taken, which resulted in a majority of the members present voting to accept the new agreement, including Appendix A.[15]

d. Dealings under the agreement of February 28

On March 24, 1980, Hayes wrote Clark to relate that there were several grievances that required discussion "in compliance with Paragraph 2 of Appendix A of the existing agreement between [the] International Union and its subordinate body, Local 100." In his letter, Hayes designated Joseph Piotrowski and John Lassiter, officers of the Union, to represent the Union in the discussion of such grievances. Hayes also designated them "to make visitation to the plants at regular weekly intervals in order to fulfill the wishes of our members."

On March 27, Clark replied to Hayes' letter, indicating that the designation of more than one agent "was unnecessary and inappropriate." It was Respondent's position that the Union had only utilized one servicing representative to visit the plants in the past.[16] Clark also pointed out that there was an adequate number of the Union's stewards in Respondent's plants so that any need for Polish and Spanish interpreters was satisfied.[17] In conclusion, Clark noted that Hayes had named Joseph Piotrowski and Lassiter as servicing representatives, but that Respondent would agree only to the designation of Lassiter "since Joseph Piotrowski is unacceptable by reason of his behavior."

On March 28, Hayes wrote to Clark, stating that he was in "total disagreement with your interpretation of Paragraph 2, Appendix A of the existing agreement." He went on to protest that Clark had no right to select union representatives and he made the additional designation of Rueben Ramirez "so that we will have at least two representatives at all times to meet with the Company."

At some point, during this period, Clark and Hayes met and discussed the matter of servicing representatives for purposes of contract administration at Respondent's plants. In this connection, Clark said that he, of course, could not tell Hayes whom he could select to service such plants. However, Clark sought to persuade Hayes that he not insist on Joseph Piotrowski "because of the bad experience [Respondent] had with [him] in the past on handling grievances and arbitrations; it was hard to do business with him." Clark also sought to persuade Hayes not to designate Ramirez. In doing so, Clark referred to an altercation that had occurred between Ramirez and Albert Mojica, Respondent's general superintendent, during the recent strike. Clark expressed the view that it would be unwise to permit Ramirez into the plants because Labor Board and criminal charges had been filed over the altercation and some were still pending. Clark stated that, under the circumstances, Ramirez and Mojica would not "get along" in the plants "with these charges over their heads" when "[t]hey would have to interact daily."

[15] At some point during the final negotiations which led to the agreement of February 28, 1980, Hayes expressed misgivings to Clark that such agreement failed to contain a provision for arbitration. Clark assured Hayes that Respondent would be willing to submit disputes with the Union to arbitration on an ad hoc basis.

[16] Joseph Piotrowski testified that he was the servicing representative on behalf of his Union for Respondent's two plants since 1972. He was the only representative until about 1978 when he occasionally took Reuben Ramirez, who speaks Spanish, along with him to the plants. Piotrowski also occasionally brought along Lassiter or appointed him to service the plants if he was unavailable.

According to Clark, Hayes was not completely satisfied with Respondent's position, but he agreed that only Lassiter would be the servicing representative. Hayes did not dispute this testimony nor did he testify about any conversations he may have had with Clark about the problem of servicing representatives from March to September 1980. Clark subsequently conferred with Lassiter about his role as servicing representative. Clark assured Lassiter of Respondent's full cooperation in the performance of his duties. He was promised access to either of Respondent's plants "at any time," in the same manner as had servicing representatives in the past. Lassiter was also told that if he required an interpreter one would be provided him. Lassiter accepted the offer but stated that he would first deal with Spanish- and Polish-speaking stewards.

Lassiter testified that from the date—sometime in April—when he took over as servicing representative until early September 1980, when a new agreement with the Union was reached and Ramirez and Piotrowski took over as servicing representatives, he "had no problems" in servicing the needs of employees. He also had no problems with obtaining interpreters when they were needed.

On March 13, 1980, Clark wrote Hayes that checkoff authorization cards given to him that day were "invalid" because they named the Union as recipient of the moneys checked off. Clark reminded Hayes that, under Appendix A of the then-current collective-bargaining agreement, the International Union was "solely responsible" for the administration of such agreement. Further, Clark wrote that Respondent would only check off dues "to your office" and that:

> New authorization cards must be obtained which designate Region 12 of the International Union, in order for the check off authorization to be effective. How Region 12 disperses the funds is, of course, none of [Respondent's] affair.
> Please instruct the officers and agents of Local 100 concerning the effect of Appendix A because thus far they are attempting to operate . . . as if Appendix A does not exist.

On April 17, 1980, Hayes wrote Clark requesting and authorizing him to deduct dues in accordance with checkoff authorizations on behalf of the Union. He also asked that the dues be sent to the Union. In reply, Clark wrote Hayes that it remained Respondent's position that:

> Section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act must be strictly construed and therefore only the labor organization that is "solely responsible for the administration of the Collective Bargaining Agreement" is legally empowered to be the designee of such an authorization card and the recipient of funds therefrom. Therefore, I once again seek to persuade you to obtain authorization cards which designate only the International Union, whereupon [Respondent] will promptly remit such funds directly to your organization. You have then merely to endorse the check to Local 100.

Although Clark expressed Respondent's willingness to check off dues to the International Union pursuant to proper authorizations from employees, the International Union refused to provide Respondent with checkoff cards for this purpose. Respondent was provided only with cards naming the Union as recipient of the dues. The International Union also advised Respondent that it "had a problem, that [it] did not have any procedure that was set up for accepting these dues."

On July 1, 1980, Walter Piotrowski, on behalf of the Union, wrote its members requesting that they pay their monthly union dues directly to Local 100 inasmuch as Respondent had refused to "honor the dues check-off authorization cards which were signed by such members and furnished to [Respondent]." On July 14, Clark wrote employees that, while the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union required union membership, the Union had no authority to demand the discharge of any employee for failure to pay dues—only the International Union had such authority in accordance with Appendix A of the agreement. Clark told employees that the only reason why dues were not being deducted from the pay of employees was because Respondent believed that applicable law required dues authorizations to be directed only to the International Union.

e. Negotiations for a new agreement

On July 31, 1980, Hayes notified Clark by letter of his desire to reopen the existing collective-bargaining agreement in regard to the subject of wages, only. On August 4, 1980, Clark wrote employees and stated that there had been a dispute with the Union concerning dues checkoff, which had placed the International Union "in the middle of this dispute," and that the latter wanted Respondent to resolve its "differences" with the Union to permit dues to be checked off "directly to Local 100, and Appendix A of our present contract can also be made unnecessary." Clark also stated that: "In an effort to settle this dispute and to take . . . Hayes out of the middle, I have suggested to both . . . Hayes and Local 100 that [Respondent] open early negotiations, not on the wage reopener that is scheduled for October 1980, but for a new contract that will run from now until December 19, 1982."

On August 8, 1980, International President Wynn wrote Carey that Wynn had learned that Respondent and the Union were soon to commence collective-bargaining negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement. He stated that, if a new agreement was not reached, the present one would remain in full force and effect for its term; but that if a new agreement was concluded and ratified, the parties to it would be only Respondent and the Union, and that Appendix A of the current agreement would be stricken in its entirety and all reference to the International Union deleted. In closing, Wynn assured Carey "that in the light of the foregoing conditions the International Union agrees to the International's deletion from the contract."

On August 11, collective-bargaining negotiations for a second new collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union commenced. On August 13, after 3 days of negotiations, the parties concluded a settlement for a new agreement effective for the period from September 1, 1980, to December 19, 1982. The second new agreement was executed only by representatives of Respondent and the Union on September 2, 1980. As a part of this newest agreement, there was a provision for the checkoff of union dues and initiation fees to the Union where an employee provided Respondent with a proper authorization form for such payment.

After the second new collective-bargaining agreement became effective around September 1, the Union designated Joseph Piotrowski and Ramirez its servicing representatives in Respondent's plants. From September onward, both Joseph Piotrowski and Ramirez have been the Union's servicing representatives in such plants.

In October, following the execution of the second new collective-bargaining agreement on September 2, Respondent began again to check off union dues from the paychecks of employees and remit such dues directly to the Union. Then or shortly after Respondent began to check off such dues, the amount of moneys checked off was doubled to twice the normal monthly amount. It was agreed by Respondent and the Union that the checkoff of double dues each month would continue for a period of about 6 months, at which time the Union would have received moneys in an amount equal to that which it would otherwise have received pursuant to checkoff during the period that Appendix A was viable. The General Counsel concedes that Respondent "has in fact made up dues payments from March 1 through August 1980."

2. Discussion and analysis

Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, read together with Section 8(d), requires an employer to bargain in good faith with the union representing its employees. Each party to the collective-bargaining process must make "a serious attempt to resolve differences and reach a common ground." N.L.R.B. v. Insurance Agents' International Union, 361 U.S. 477, 486, 487, 488 (1960). While one party may not approach the bargaining table with a closed mind, neither is he bound to yield any position fairly maintained. "Nor may the Board . . . directly or indirectly, compel concessions or otherwise sit in judgment upon the substantive terms of collective bargaining agreements," for the Act does not regulate the substantive terms governing wages, hours and working conditions which are incorporated in an agreement." N.L.R.B. v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 402, 404 (1952), affg. American National Insurance Co. v. N.L.R.B., 187 F.2d 307 (5th Cir. 1951). N.L.R.B. v. Herman Sausage Co., Inc., 275 F.2d 229, 232 (5th Cir. 1960).

Applying these principles to the facts of this case, I find that the General Counsel has not proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the prestrike bargaining positions and conduct of Respondent showed a desire not to reach agreement or to bargain in bad faith in violation of the Act.

The General Counsel points particularly to three of Respondent's bargaining positions to support his contention of unlawful conduct: The rollback of wages together with the elimination of any cost-of-living adjustments; the elimination of mandatory union security and union dues; and the elimination of any arbitration provision. These positions cannot, however, be viewed in isolation. They must be considered in light of Respondent's explanations for its positions, its conduct on other issues, the Union's responses, the evolution of Respondent's positions, and its willingness to vary its positions. For example, Respondent proposed increases in health and pension benefits which were ultimately accepted by the Union. These increases, together with Respondent's agreement to the Union's proposed night-shift premium, offered employees some benefits to be weighed against the loss of a cost-of-living adjustment and the wage rollback. Of course, the wage rollback was subsequently modified and no cutback in wages took place. Even so, Respondent's position on wages was fully explained. The Union had refused to grant relief to Respondent the year before negotiations began when Respondent was in fact losing money. Because of the Union's failure to cooperate at that time, Respondent sought to recoup the same amount through a wage rollback in negotiations even though the next year it did not plead a loss in earnings. Respondent has convincingly shown that its profit margins are precarious and dependent to some extent on controlling labor costs. It also took the position that it was paying its employees too much money in comparison to the jobs they were doing and what other comparable employers with union contracts paid. These views were expressed to the Union and the issue was thrashed out at the bargaining table. The Union felt so strongly that it called a strike and, after the strike, signed contracts to resolve the dispute. Nothing that Respondent did or said at the bargaining table with respect to the wage issue would justify overturning the results of free collective bargaining.

Nor were Respondent's other positions improperly motivated or unyielding. In early December 1979, at the ninth bargaining session, Respondent suggested a trade to the effect that, if the Union agreed to Respondent's wage proposal, Respondent would agree to the withdrawal of its proposals for the elimination of compulsory union security, dues checkoff, and arbitration. Thereafter, on January 16, 1980, at the 12th bargaining session, Respondent again indicated its willingness to accept compulsory union security, dues checkoff, and retention of boning incentives as they appeared in the then-expired agreement, if the Union would agree to maintain the wage rates then in effect in an agreement for a term of 2 years. When the Union demanded an extension of the expired agreement for 1 year, Respondent reoffered its prior proposal but with a wage reopener in the second year. The Union rejected this as well as Respondent's other proposals. In these circumstances, it is clear that Respondent, while firm on its desire to hold down wages, was willing to yield, particularly on arbitration, union security, and dues checkoff, in order to reach agreement. Respondent's positions on each of these other issues were explained to the Union. It explained its reluctance to agree to these provisions because of its perceived view that the Union had been uncooperative in granting wage relief and in proceeding to arbitration on cases without merit. Nevertheless, it offered to yield on these issues if the Union would agree to its modified wage proposal. The Union declined. Even after the strike commenced, Respondent sought to vary its proposals and, of course, Respondent pursued a settlement of the strike and an agreement with the Union's parent—and ultimately with the Union alone—which contained dues-checkoff and union-security clauses. Respondent's efforts in this respect belie any contention that it was not seeking an agreement or was not bargaining in good faith.

In view of my findings set forth above, I also reject the contention of the General Counsel that Respondent bargained in bad faith by encouraging the Union to strike and by sending letters to its employees setting forth its bargaining positions. The minutes of the bargaining sessions show that both parties were flexing their economic muscles. Union Representative Walter Piotrowski warned of a possible strike ahd Respondent, through its chief negotiator, Clark, indicated that Respondent was willing and prepared to take a strike. Nothing in Respondent's conduct and statements evidenced bad-faith bargaining or a cast of mind against reaching agreement. The same can be said for the contents of the letters to employees. Since none of Respondent's bargaining positions or tactics was unlawful, its representation of its bargaining positions to the employees fairly reflected hard but lawful bargaining. It can aptly be said here, as in W. G. Best Homes Corporation, 253 NLRB 912, 921 (1980), that "what emerges from this extensive record is a test of economic strength between Respondent and [the Union] . . . . In that contest it is not the function of the Board to assist one to the detriment of the other."[18]

The General Counsel also alleges that Respondent engaged in bad-faith bargaining by refusing to abide by an alleged extension of the expired bargaining agreement and by withdrawing recognition from the Union. As I have indicated, I do not credit the testimony of Hayes that Respondent agreed to extend the old contract. The expired contract was not extended. Thus, the failure of Respondent to continue the union-security and dues-checkoff provisions of the expired contract was not unlawful.

Nor did Respondent ever decline to recognize the Union or withdraw recognition from the Union. The General Counsel alleges in his brief that Respondent "sought to avoid its bargaining obligation with Local 100" by entering into "Appendix A." This contention is ludicrous. The evidence clearly shows that International representatives, including Hayes, injected themselves into the negotiations before the strike. They participated in efforts to settle the strike and to salvage the jobs of employees who had been replaced; and they effectuated an agreement under somewhat unorthodox circumstances. However, the Union acquiesced in the participation of the International as well as all of the efforts of the International to reach an agreement with Respondent. The agreement provided not only for the end of the strike but also for a lump sum payment by Respondent to the Union's pension fund for past service credits for some of its employees. The agreement signed by all parties, including the Union, stated that the agreement was between Respondent and the International Union "with its subordinate body [the Union]" and specifically referred to Appendix A which was signed only by the International. Appendix A specifically states that the International "will be solely responsible" for the administration of the agreement notwithstanding that the Union "is also a party" to the agreement. Piotrowski, on behalf of the Union, was fully aware of the significance of Appendix A when he signed the agreement on February 28, 1980. And the membership of the Union was fully aware of the significance of Appendix A because at a meeting wherein they ratified the agreement both the agreement and Appendix A were read to them and explained to them by Hayes, the International representative. The Union not only acquiesced in the International's commendable and valuable participation in the negotiations but ratified the fruits of that participation. In these circumstances, I reject any contention that Respondent violated the Act by entering into the February 28, 1980, agreement with the International and the Union or that Respondent at any time withdrew recognition from the Union.

The General Counsel also alleges that, in applying Appendix A, Respondent violated the Act in two respects, first by refusing to check off dues to the Union and insisting instead that they be checked off to the International, and, secondly, by objecting to the designation of two union officials to police the agreement.

As shown above, the International designated three officials of the Union, Joseph Piotrowski, Reuben Ramirez, and John Lassiter, as servicing representatives for the purpose of policing the agreement. Respondent objected to Piotrowski and Ramirez. It objected to Piotrowski because of what it perceived a lack of cooperation on his part in the past, particularly in submitting cases to arbitration which Respondent thought should not have been submitted. Despite this objection, Joseph Piotrowski was apparently permitted to act as a union representative in the interviews of employees who were suspended for misconduct after the strike. Respondent objected to Ramirez because he would be dealing with Mojica and the two had recently been involved in an altercation which had spawned Labor Board and criminal charges. Respondent thought that the two could not work together on grievances. Respondent also took the position, which is supported by the record, that only one servicing representative was utilized in the past.

[18] The Charging Party asserts that Respondent's position in successfully pressing for its own pension plan rather than the Union's multiemployer plan was evidence of bad-faith bargaining. This specific allegation was not part of the complaint, and, despite some evidence on the point, was not fully litigated. Respondent was not on notice that it was required to defend its position on pensions and did not organize its presentation to meet such an allegation. Even on the merits, however, the Charging Party's assertion is unavailing. First of all, the pension issue cannot be considered in isolation from Respondent's other positions and conduct. But even focusing only on the pension issue, Respondent bargained in good faith. Respondent's pension proposal called for greater benefits than under the Union's plan. Respondent was also entirely within its rights in arguing that a corporate-sponsored plan would encourage loyalty and discourage turnover. Although Respondent's plan of necessity could not fund all past credits earned, the admittedly young work force—the average age was 35—would have an excellent opportunity to cash in on the better retirement benefits offered by Respondent. The Charging Party argues that those employees with less than 8 years' service—of which there were admittedly "quite a few"—lost pension benefits. Perhaps they did. The record is not clear on this point although presumably they will retain the credits they earned under the Union's plan and may build on them if in the future they become employed under the Union's plan. But Respondent agreed in the strike settlement agreement, which was, of course, part of the negotiations, to pay a lump sum settlement to vest those employees with 8 years' service or more in the Union's plan. This is not the conduct of a bad-faith bargainer. Indeed, Respondent's conduct with respect to the pension issue—although keyed to its self-interest—was sufficiently beneficial for employees that it reflects on the good faith of Respondent and its willingness to grant economic benefits in exchange for some "take aways." The Union's position on this issue, in contrast, seeks to have the Government rescue it from a deal made at the bargaining table which it now finds embarrassing.

The uncontradicted testimony of Clark is that Hayes, while at first objecting to Respondent's position on Ramirez and Piotrowski, acceded to Clark's position that only Lassiter should be designated as servicing representative. Since Hayes had the sole authority to administer the contract under Appendix A, he was authorized to agree with Clark's position as he did. Thus, whatever would be the situation had Respondent insisted over Hayes' objection upon the exclusion of Ramirez and Piotrowski, there could be no violation of the Act where, as here, Hayes agreed to such exclusion.

Respondent's reason for excluding Ramirez was reasonable and proper in the circumstances. Its exclusion of Piotrowski, on the other hand, was not rationally based. There was no arbitration provision in the contract and thus he would not be in a position to force arbitration in unmeritorious cases as Respondent feared. However, Hayes may have been convinced by Clark that Piotrowski's presence at the plant might cause bad feelings which he wished to avoid, particularly since the parties would shortly have the opportunity to reopen the agreement. In any event, Hayes did agree to the exclusion of Piotrowski. The exclusion of these two officials did not adversely affect the representation of the employees herein. Lassiter was provided with sufficient stewards who spoke both Polish and Spanish to police the agreement. And Respondent did not object to the individuals who were designated as stewards. Lassiter testified he had no problems in the several months that he was the servicing representative. This situation obtained until September 1980 when Appendix A was superseded by an agreement which specifically provided for administration by the Union. At that point both Ramirez and Piotrowski were designated and acted as servicing representatives. Thus, even if, in the unique circumstances of this case, Respondent had technically violated the Act by not accepting the designation of Piotrowski and Ramirez, there was no adverse impact on employee rights in the short period that they were not servicing representatives and no remedial order is required at this time.

The General Counsel also alleges that Respondent violated the Act by failing to honor dues-checkoff cards signed by employees on behalf of the Union and insisting instead that they designate dues to be paid to the International. This issue too turns on the unique circumstances of this case. Respondent took the position that Appendix A of the agreement of February 28, 1980, required that the dues be tendered only to the International and that Section 302 of the Act, which prohibits the transfer of funds from an employer to a union except under certain circumstances, precluded the payment of dues directly to the Union. Respondent suggested that the International could transfer the dues to the Union but that the authorizations would have to name the International and the moneys would have to be paid directly to the International.

The General Counsel argues that Respondent's reading of Section 302 to preclude the payment of dues to the Union is erroneous and that an employer may check off dues and make payments to a union "even in the absence of a contract" where the employees designate the union as the recipient of the dues payment. The General Counsel cites Section 302(c)(4) of the Act which states that the section is not applicable "with respect to money deducted from the wages of employees in payment of membership dues in a labor organization: Provided, that the employer has received from each employee . . . a written assignment which shall not be irrevocable for a period of not more than one year, or beyond the termination date of the applicable collective bargaining agreement whichever occurs sooner."

The question presented by the General Counsel's allegation is an interesting one but hardly worth its litigation in the circumstances of this case. The checkoff provision of the February 28, 1980, agreement refers to a form authorization which was attached to the agreement as Appendix B. That form specified the designee as the Union, not the International. The International also insisted that it desired the dues to be paid to the Union directly. In these circumstances, Respondent probably should have acquiesced and paid the dues directly to the Union notwithstanding the thrust of Appendix A, namely, that the International was to have sole responsibility for administering the agreement. However, in view of the unique arrangement surrounding the agreement of February 28, 1980, and the application of Appendix A, Respondent's insistence that the dues be remitted directly to the International did not constitute bad-faith bargaining, particularly in light of the eventual resolution of this issue. The dispute as to which entity would be the nominal representative in the administration of the contract was resolved in September. Today, dues are being checked off directly to the Union. All back dues for the period from March through September 1980 have been paid. There is no need for the Labor Board to concern itself with an academic question such as is presented by the General Counsel. Accordingly, I shall dismiss this allegation of the complaint as well.[10] [10] The parties have made much of a separate allegation in the complaint that Attorney Joseph Carey was an agent of Respondent. The reasons for this high pitched conflict are beyond the scope of this proceeding since such a finding has no practical significance. Carey was an agent of Respondent insofar as his statements are binding on Respondent in connection with the substantive allegations of the complaint. However, neither Carey nor Kane-Miller—of which he is an officer—is named as an individual respondent. Nor does the General Counsel seek an order against Carey or Kane-Miller. The entire conflict is much ado about nothing and I suggest that the parties forget about it.

B. The Status of the Strike

It is clear from the evidence that the employees and the Union decided to strike because of the bargaining positions and posture of Respondent. I have found that Respondent's bargaining positions and posture before the strike of January 18, 1980, did not constitute bad-faith bargaining within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Accordingly, the strike herein was an economic rather than an unfair labor practice strike.

C. The Discharge of Striking Employees for Alleged Picket Line Misconduct

In the course of the strike, Respondent received information about the possible misconduct of some striking employees while they were on the picket line. As a result of initial reports focusing on individual named employees, a number of them were suspended pending a further investigation into the alleged acts of misconduct. The notices of suspension, dated March 7, 1980, informed employees that they would be interviewed as part of the investigation and asked them to consult their union representative.

Following Respondent's investigation into the alleged strike misconduct, which included holding interviews with and taking affidavits from witnesses and other employees, Respondent afforded each of the 10 accused employees an opportunity to be heard. At these interviews, representatives of the Union and the International Union were present. A translator was provided where needed. Notes were taken by Clark's secretary which were thereafter transcribed for review by Clark. In these interviews, the accused employees were asked whether there were any witnesses that they desired Respondent to contact in the investigation. Where names were mentioned, Respondent interviewed those witnesses and notes were also taken of those interviews.

After reviewing all the notes of the interviews and as a result of Respondent's investigation, Clark concluded that 10 employees, all of whom had previously been suspended, should be discharged for strike misconduct. On March 25, 1980, these employees were notified of Respondent's decision by letter.

On March 24, 1980, Hayes submitted a "formal grievance" on behalf of the employees who had not been reinstated after the strike. On April 3, 1980, Respondent answered the Hayes letter by referring to a conference between Lassiter and Albert Mojica on the matter. Respondent stated that the 10 employees were discharged for strike misconduct. Respondent also stated that five of the employees were being reinstated pending a determination by the Labor Board as to whether their discharges were unlawful. Later Respondent decided similarly to reinstate two other employees. Only three of the discharged employees—L. V. Thomas, Jan Piton, and Stanley Karwaczka—were not reinstated.

Although Respondent submitted the documentary evidence it relied on in discharging all 10 employees in this proceeding, Respondent has not contested the General Counsel's allegations with respect to the 7 employees allegedly discharged for misconduct who were eventually reinstated. All seven of these employees took the witness stand. They testified that they engaged in the strike and picketing and they denied engaging in the alleged misconduct which led to their discharge. No witnesses were presented in this proceeding to rebut their testimony and the documentary evidence is insufficient to counter their denials that they engaged in misconduct. Accordingly, Respondent's discharge of these employees was improper since they did not in fact engage in the strike misconduct for which they were terminated. See N.L.R.B. v. Burnup & Sims, Inc., 379 U.S. 21 (1964).

The evidence concerning the remaining three employees whose discharges are at issue is discussed below:

On the morning of February 21, Amedo Orlino, a strike replacement at the Normal Avenue plant, appeared at the plant to report for work. As he got off a bus near the plant, he encountered two black men. One approached Orlino from the front, attempted to block him from proceeding toward the plant entrance, and asked Orlino where he was going. Orlino answered that he was going to work. As Orlino was speaking, he was struck from behind on the back of the head. The blow caused Orlino to stagger. He turned, looked behind him, and saw the face of his assailant whom he identified as L. V. Thomas.[20]

After he was hit, Orlino ran for the plant entrance, but the other man continued to obstruct his way. Orlino ran in another direction until he saw another employee he knew, Miguel Ramirez, in the front seat of a car approaching the plant. Ramirez, who had seen Orlino being struck, corroborated Orlino and identified Thomas as the assailant. He asked the driver of the car to stop and Orlino got into the rear seat. The car then proceeded to the plant entrance and Orlino got out.

Later that day, Orlino was X-rayed and was released from a local clinic. He then went back to the plant, punched out, and went home. Orlino testified that he did not know, nor could he identify, the second man because he focused primarily on the man who hit him. He had both men in his sight even after he reached the plant entrance because they followed the car the short distance from the point of the attack to the plant entrance.

As a consequence of Orlino's report of the incident of February 21, Thomas was suspended by Respondent. Thereafter, Thomas was afforded an interview by Respondent. In the interview, Thomas was asked if he had "anyone you want us to contact in your behalf." Thomas answered that he did not. However, at the hearing, Thomas testified that he was with Earl Warfield, another striker, the day that Orlino was hit and that Warfield told Thomas, at that time, that he, Warfield, had "slapped" Orlino. He also testified that Warfield again admitted, on March 3, the first day the employees came back to work after the end of the strike, that he had hit

Orlino. Warfield told him, "L.V. there is the guy that I slapped." According to Thomas, there were two or three people present when this was said. Thomas also testified to two other times when Warfield mentioned that he, Warfield, had hit Orlino, the last time being in the office of Thomas' attorney, where Warfield appeared pursuant to Thomas' invitation. Yet, Thomas never told Respondent of Warfield's alleged admissions even though Thomas admittedly had knowledge of them when interviewed by Respondent following his suspension, and even though he told Clark he had no witnesses to support his denial that he had struck Orlino.

Earl Warfield, who is 6 feet tall and weighs about 230 pounds, testified that he had been on picket duty with Thomas one morning when he approached Orlino who was going to work. Warfield advised Orlino that there was a strike and asked that he not report for work. According to Warfield, Orlino shifted his weight to his left foot and Warfield thought that Orlino was about to give him a karate kick. Then, according to Warfield, he put out his hand and brushed Orlino's shoulder.

Warfield testified that he told Thomas, on February 21, the day of the incident, that he had simply brushed Orlino's shoulder or "put him off balance." He testified that he spoke to Thomas about the Orlino incident one more time after Thomas was discharged but did not elaborate on the details of that conversation. Later, Thomas asked Warfield to go to his attorney's office and tell her that Thomas did not hit Orlino. Warfield identified a sworn affidavit he gave to Thomas' attorney on June 14, 1980, in which he stated that he had "shoved Orlino in the face" after arguing with him about the strike and "being frustrated at what he was saying . . . ."[21] In another sworn affidavit given to Respondent's counsel on February 13, 1981, a week before he testified, he stated that: "At no time during the period of the strike did I hit anyone. At no time did I tell Thomas I had hit a man." He admitted at the conclusion of his testimony that he was trying to help Thomas.

In rebuttal, Orlino denied that Warfield, a fellow employee and a "friend," had ever pushed him in the shoulder or the face. Orlino also testified that counsel for Respondent had brought him and Warfield together the prior week, at which time Orlino denied in the presence of Warfield that he had ever been touched by him.

I find that Thomas did strike Orlino as Orlino testified. Orlino was an honest and reliable witness. He was corroborated by another employee witness whose testimony was also reliable and straightforward. The testimony concerning the size of Thomas as compared with Warfield is insignificant. Nor is it significant that Ramirez thought that Thomas was the smaller of the two men and Orlino thought him to be the larger of the two. First of all, Thomas is 5 feet 8 inches tall. He is taller than Orlino who is 5 feet 5 inches tall and could well have been viewed by Orlino as "large" or larger than the second man. Secondly, and more importantly, I do not believe that Warfield was the other man. Warfield's testimony was completely unreliable. He told different people different stories and his prehearing affidavits conflicted not only with his testimony but also with each other. His whole testimony was motivated by a desire to help Thomas whose job was on the line. Moreover, Thomas himself was an unreliable witness. He allegedly knew about Warfield striking Orlino prior to the interview in which he was permitted to give his side of the story but he clearly stated he had no witnesses to offer in his defense and he never mentioned the Warfield "alibi" to Respondent. In these circumstances, I find that Thomas engaged in strike misconduct which clearly justified his discharge by Respondent.

Jan Piton

On January 18, 1980, the first day of the strike, George Schiller, Respondent's controller, was asked to go from the Normal Avenue plant to the Racine Avenue plant, about 2 miles distant. Schiller drove to the Racine plant with two other passengers, James Dillon, Respondent's chief accountant, who sat in the front seat, and James Gutsell, who sat in the rear seat.

When Schiller and his passengers approached the entrance of the Racine Avenue plant in Schiller's car, they observed some 50 to 60 pickets around the gate. Another car in front of Schiller's was permitted into the plant by the pickets without incident. However, as Schiller drove up to the entrance gate, his car was surrounded by pickets who proceeded to "bang" on the car while yelling and screaming obscenities at Schiller and his passengers. The pickets forced Schiller to stop his car and they opened the front doors. As this occurred, one of the pickets "took a swing at [Schiller], hit the back of [his] head and grabbed [his] coat." Schiller then slowly moved his car forward. The man who hit Schiller held on to his coat until the forward progress of Schiller's car forced the man to release him.

This entire incident was observed by then Sergeant Brad Douglas Muirhead, Jr., a field supervisor employed by Wackenhut Security Agency. At the time, Muirhead was inside the plant entrance about 6 or 8 feet from the gate. From this vantage point, Muirhead saw pickets pound Schiller's car and heard them yelling obscenities at the occupants. He also observed one picket open the door on the driver's side, throw a punch at Schiller and pull him by the collar and the hood of his coat while attempting to drag him from his car before letting go. Shortly after the assault on Schiller, Muirhead had a conversation with Carey, the attorney for Respondent, who inquired whether Muirhead had seen what had occurred. A few days later, Muirhead was shown some photographs for the purpose of identifying the person who had hit Schiller. After viewing a number of photographs in Clark's office, Muirhead identified Jan Piton as the assailant.

Piton denied that he had ever stopped a car or hit or attempted to pull a driver out of a car under the circumstances testified to by Schiller and Muirhead, although he admitted he was picketing at the Racine Avenue plant on the first day of the strike.

In the course of Respondent's investigation into the incident involving Schiller, Piton was interviewed by

Clark. Piton refused to divulge to Clark the names of any witnesses he contended were available to support his denial that he had hit anyone or pulled anyone out of a car. Piton testified that he did not do so because he was told not to by a union representative. At the hearing, however, Piton named three witnesses, including Raul Sanchez, a fellow employee, who could corroborate his denial. None of these named employees was mentioned in the pretrial affidavit given by Piton to the Labor Board.

Sanchez, a union steward, was subpenaed by Respondent from Guadalajara, Mexico, and interrogated regarding the attack on Schiller. Sanchez testified that Piton stopped the car which Schiller was driving, the door opened, and Piton "had the arm of [Schiller]." He testified that he did not know if Piton hit Schiller, but he saw Piton try to pull the "driver out of the car."

The testimony of Muirhead and Sanchez is mutually corroborative insofar as they identified Piton as the person who stopped Schiller's car and attempted to pull him out of it. Sanchez, a friend of Piton's, did not see a blow struck but Muirhead did and, in this respect, he corroborates Schiller who could not identify his assailant. Dillon also testified. He generally corroborated Schiller, but he could not see what was happening on Schiller's side of the car because the door was being opened on his side of the car. I viewed all of these witnesses as reliable and their testimony cumulatively establishes that Piton did strike Schiller and attempt to pull him out of his car while Schiller was driving. Piton's testimony is not credible. He was not corroborated even though he named some people who allegedly could have testified on his behalf. One of those, Sanchez, actually contradicted Piton. Piton's conduct was serious. He not only struck an individual but interfered with a moving vehicle. In these circumstances, I find that Respondent properly discharged him for engaging in strike misconduct.

Stanley Karwaczka

On January 18, 1980, the first day of the strike, truckdriver George Mollet sought to deliver a trailer load of boars to Respondent's Normal Avenue plant between 10 and 11 a.m. As he approached the plant entrance with his tractor-trailer, he observed a number of pickets in front of the gate. Mollet stopped his tractor-trailer. A number of pickets gathered in front of the tractor and around the side yelling to Mollet not to enter the plant. One of the pickets walked by the driver's side of the tractor-trailer and, some seconds later, Mollet heard a "loud pop." Mollet got out of his cab and inspected his tires, believing one of them may have blown out. Mollet noticed that the air hose was disconnected from the tractor-trailer. After connecting the air hose, which took him a few seconds, Mollet reentered his cab and drove off. He returned and entered the plant, without incident. Mollet could not identify the person who disconnected the air hose although he noticed a man wearing a green jacket walking past his tractor-trailer just before he heard the pop. There was no damage to the truck.

The above events were witnessed by some of Respondent's employees who were looking out of a second floor window onto Normal Avenue. One, Henrietta Stashwick, had her head out an open window watching the pickets when Mollet's tractor-trailer first appeared. She observed the striking employees gather around it after it was stopped and saw a man in a green jacket position himself between the tractor-trailer, where he "put out his arm" and retracted it. She testified that she recognized the man in the green jacket and she called out his name.

In her direct testimony, Stashwick identified the man in the green jacket as "Joseph Wargacki," another employee who was discharged for alleged misconduct but later reinstated. She was adamant on this point. After cross-examination, Respondent's counsel stated that he believed that her identification was incorrect. The prior witness, Karwaczka, was brought into the courtroom, with the agreement of counsel for the General Counsel and after Stashwick gave a general description of the man she observed which fit that of Karwaczka. Stashwick attributed her admitted error to being "extremely nervous." I doubt this explanation. She seemed very confident in identifying Wargacki and only appeared nervous when she changed her testimony.

In a pretrial affidavit given about these events on January 18, 1980, Stashwick simply mentioned that she saw a man in a green jacket "reach between the cab and the trailer and pull something out." She did not mention Karwaczka by name. One of the office employees present with Stashwick, Joan Miller, testified that Stashwick mentioned Karwaczka's name later in the day. She did not hear Stashwick call out any name at the time the incident occurred.

Karwaczka testified that, on January 18, he appeared at the Normal Avenue plant around 5:15 a.m. and that he left to go home around 9:30 a.m., after receiving his paycheck from a supervisor. He denied that he had disconnected the air hose on any tractor-trailer that day. Also, while Karwaczka admitted to owning a green jacket, he asserted it was inside the locker room of the Normal Avenue plant on January 18, and that he had worn a black leather jacket on that day.

Richard Backert, superintendent of the Normal Avenue plant, testified that he distributed paychecks at that location between 10 a.m. and noon, and that Karwaczka was one of the striking employees to whom he gave a check during that period. He also testified that Karwaczka wore a green jacket. Backert noted Karwaczka particularly since Backert had earlier heard in the office that Karwaczka was "the guy that pulled the thing off the truck" earlier that morning. Backert also testified that he was involved about a week later in opening the lockers of about 180 striking employees to make such lockers available for strike replacements. When the lock on Karwaczka's locker was clipped and the locker contents inventoried, according to Backert, there was no green jacket inside the locker. However, he does not recall whether Karwaczka's personal belongings were ever returned to him.

I do not believe that Karwaczka was the person who disconnected the air hose on the morning of January 18. Karwaczka's denial seemed to me to be credible. He was a candid witness who was not impeached on cross-examination. Respondent's evidence to the contrary is flimsy. The two office personnel who observed the incident and testified herein were speculating on the identity of the person who disconnected the air hose. The reports on this entire incident, which was one of several that occurred on this, the first day of the strike, were fraught with confusion and uncertainty. Stashwick did not even identify the person in the green jacket in an affidavit given the very day of the incident and, at the hearing, she confidently identified a person other than Karwaczka before correcting herself. Miller relied on what others had told her and Backert had likewise heard from unidentified office personnel that Karwaczka had been involved in the incident. All had participated in investigations and interviews by Respondent which had focused on Karwaczka and which solidified their identifications prior to the hearing herein. Moreover, I do not believe that Backert could have remembered what Karwaczka wore on January 18 when he was one of numerous employees given a check or what was not in his locker when he cleared it out as he did the lockers of 180 other employees. Nor can I be confident that Backert was entirely sure of the time when the checks were distributed so as to place Karwaczka on the premises at the time of the air hose incident. If, as he testified, Backert knew, prior to giving Karwaczka his check, that he had been identified as having disconnected an air hose, it is reasonable to assume that Backert would have mentioned it to him at the time. He did not. In all the circumstances, I find that the identification by Respondent's witnesses of Karwaczka as the person who disconnected the air hose is too speculative for me to base a finding and I therefore credit Karwaczka's denial that he was involved in the incident.

In any event, even if, contrary to the above analysis, I were to find that Karwaczka did disconnect the air hose, the incident is not significant enough to justify his discharge. There was no damage to the truck, it took seconds to reconnect the air hose, and the truckdriver was not impeded from eventually entering the plant. The discharge of a striker in these circumstances would give the impression that the employer was so interested in curtailing the right to picket and strike that he was willing to punish employees for minor incidents to that end. I therefore find that Respondent violated the Act by discharging Karwaczka for alleged misconduct while he was engaged in protected concerted activity.

D. The Alleged 8(a)(1) Violations

Two current employees, Rudolfo Martinez and Willie Griffin, testified in support of the allegations in the General Counsel's complaint that Albert Mojica threatened and interrogated employees. The evidence shows that, during negotiations, Respondent sent letters to employees describing the negotiations and setting forth Respondent's positions. Mojica testified that there were many times when he had conversations with employees about the status of negotiations.

Employee Martinez testified that, on or about December 12, 1979, his immediate supervisor, Bals Gonzales, told him that Mojica wanted to see him in his office. When he got there, Mojica asked him why the employees did not form their own union. He also "understood" Mojica to suggest that if the employees left the Union they would not have their pay reduced by 94 cents. Mojica also told Martinez that replacements would be hired for employees who went on strike. Martinez also testified that he did not mention this conversation to his fellow employees. Griffin testified that, on or about the same day or a day later, he was called into Mojica's office by Mojica himself. Mojica asked Griffin what he thought about the Union and whether he would rather have a voluntary union rather than a "mandatory one like you have now." Griffin said he liked the one he had at present. On cross-examination, Martinez admitted to bringing up the matter of the 94-cent rollback himself. He also admitted he was very "mad" at Mojica for having fired his brother, sometime earlier.

Mojica testified that Martinez came to his office on or about December 13, 1979, with questions about a letter of that date distributed to employees about the negotiations. Gonzales testified that Martinez approached him with questions about the letter and, as a result, he referred Martinez to Mojica. Mojica met with Martinez. He had the December 13 letter in front of him and he answered Martinez' questions about the 94-cent rollback. They discussed other issues including the possibility of a strike. Mojica denied asking that the employees form their own union or threatening to reduce wages unless the employees rejected the Union. He also denied questioning Griffin as the latter testified. According to Mojica, he saw Griffin outside his office reading Clark's letter. Mojica asked Griffin if he had any comments or questions and Griffin said he had none. Mojica denied that he invited Griffin into his office or that he had inquired whether Griffin liked a voluntary or mandatory union.

I credit Mojica's account of both conversations. His testimony was candid and included meaningful detail, particularly the fact that these employees had just received a letter from management which may have prompted some questions. Griffin testified on cross-examination that he may have seen and read the December 13 letter. Gonzales corroborated Mojica that Martinez had some questions about the letter and that he referred him to Mojica. Martinez himself testified he raised the issue of the 94-cent rollback. The testimony of Griffin and Martinez was devoid of context and not as clear or as detailed as that of Mojica and Gonzales. In addition, Martinez seemed to have a personal grudge against Mojica for firing his brother. Accordingly, I credit Mojica and Gonzales and I shall dismiss the allegations that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by Mojica's remarks on December 12 or 13, 1979.

The General Counsel also alleges as unlawful "help wanted" advertisements placed by Respondent in the Sunday Sun-Times edition of January 20, 1980, the Chicago Tribune edition of January 21, 1980, and in certain Spanish and Polish language newspapers on or about such dates seeking replacements for striking employees. These advertisements read basically as follows:

> LABORERS
> Wanted for meat packing plants. Immediate openings. $8.31/hr. base labor rate. These employees will be permanent replacements for striking employees.

Since the strike herein was not an unfair labor practice strike and since, neither in the advertisements nor at any time, did Respondent threaten to deprive unfair labor practice strikers of their rights under the Act, the advertisements were not coercive or in any other manner unlawful. I shall therefore dismiss the allegation that the advertisements were violative of the Act.

The General Counsel also alleges that, on the day the strike ended, Albert Mojica assaulted a union representative, Reuben Ramirez, on public property in the presence of a number of picketing employees. The evidence presents two competing views, each held strongly by the antagonists and witnesses on their behalf. A fair reading of the evidence reveals that, in the early morning hours of February 28, Mojica arrived at the picketers' station across the street from the Racine Avenue plant with Raul Sanchez, an employee and a union steward. Sanchez, who had been drinking with Mojica earlier in the evening, invited Mojica to have a drink there. Mojica accepted and had a few drinks with the strikers. Sometime later, Ramirez appeared and told Mojica to leave. An argument ensued between the two men, which included some pushing and shoving, over whether Mojica belonged at the site. Mojica insisted that he had been invited. At one point following some shoving, Mojica grabbed Ramirez' cap and threw it into a fire barrel. At another point, Mojica struck Ramirez. Mojica and two other employee witnesses testified that Mojica patted Ramirez "lightly" on the face in an attempt to calm Ramirez. Ramirez and his two witnesses, one, another representative of the Union, testified that the slaps were more substantial. Frankly, I am unable to determine whether the slaps were substantial or who started the shoving and pushing.

I do not believe that the evidence set forth above is sufficient to establish a violation of the Act. Mojica was invited to the strikers' station which was on public property and engaged in an altercation with Ramirez who had come onto the scene in an attempt to eject him. I cannot conclude that Mojica was the aggressor nor can I conclude that any employee would have been restrained from engaging in protected activity by Mojica's conduct. From my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor I believe the fight involved the personalities of the participants as much as any disagreement over the labor dispute. No employees could have believed that they would be subjected to assaults from Mojica for striking or otherwise engaging in union activities. Nor was there any evidence that any employees were or could have been coerced by what transpired. I shall therefore dismiss this allegation of the complaint.[22]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By discharging employees Frank Sekula, Jesus Gonzales, Juan Perez, Warren Mills, Alfonso Pineda, Joseph Wargacki, Stanislaw Krycinski, and Stanley Karwaczka, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.
2. The above violations are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
3. Respondent has not otherwise violated the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Since all the discriminatorily discharged employees except one have been reinstated and there is no evidence or contention that they have not been properly reinstated, I shall order the reinstatement only of employee Stanley Karwaczka to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position without prejudice to his seniority or other rights. Karwaczka and the seven other discriminatorily discharged employees shall be made whole for any and all losses of earnings caused by their unlawful discharges. The amounts due to these employees shall be computed as provided in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[23]

Upon the foregoing findings of fact and conclusions of law, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[24]

The Respondent, AMPAC, a subsidiary of Kane-Miller Corp., Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees because they participate in a strike or engage in other protected concerted or union activity.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer Stanley Karwaczka full and immediate reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position without prejudice to his seniority or other rights, and make him and employees Frank Sekula, Jesus Gonzales, Juan Perez,

[22] Even if I were to credit Ramirez' testimony in its entirety and if I were to conclude that Mojica's conduct "coerced" or "restrained" employees, I doubt very much if it would effectuate the policies of the Act or promote labor peace to make findings of a violation on this issue and to issue a remedial order. Over a year has passed since the confrontation. Memories are hazy as to exactly what happened, and, at present, Ramirez is acting as a servicing representative and presumably dealing with Mojica on an amicable basis.

[24] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Warren Mills, Alfonso Pineda, Joseph Wargacki, and Stanislaw Krycinski whole for any loss of earnings or benefits they may have suffered as a result of their unlawful discharge in the manner set forth in the "Remedy" section of this Decision.

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for its examination and copying, all payroll and other records necessary or useful in order to analyze and determine the amount of backpay due under this Order.

(c) Post at its facilities in Chicago, Illinois, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[25] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 13, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaints be dismissed insofar as they allege violations not found herein.

January 18, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On September 18, 1980, Administrative Law Judge Jennie M. Sarrica issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith, and to revise her recommended Order.

With respect to the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by suspending and discharging Charging Party James Deka, Respondent in its exceptions asserts, inter alia, that the Administrative Law Judge has misconstrued the record, and that Deka had emerged as "the chief suspect for the Frabotta break-in" before any organizing activities occurred that could have come to the attention of Respondent. We find merit in Respondent's contentions.

Respondent owns and/or operates a number of shopping malls. The events in the instant case involve members of Respondent's security force at a large mall. The security force personnel possess public police powers on the mall property and hold commissions as special police officers of the neighboring village.

On the morning of November 10, when Lieutenant Frabotta, arriving for duty on the day shift, unlocked and entered his office, he found a "voodoo doll" pierced with pins and marked with his badge hanging from a sprinkler fixture by a string around the neck. A spray-painted black rose was placed on Frabotta's desk, and pinned to his hat was a piece of paper with the printed message "ANY TIME WE WANT." When Respondent's investigation disclosed that Deka had been seen with the doll in the guards' locker room, and had obtained a black rose a day or so before the incident, Respondent on November 14 notified him by memo that he was to "be in the Chief's office at 9 a.m. on the 15th." At that meeting, Deka admitted having the doll in the guards' locker room, but said that he had found it there and thought it was "funny." He also admitted purchasing a black rose, but contended that he had bought it as a joke to take to a going away party for a friend the previous week. He then went out to his car and returned shortly with a black rose.[2] Deka attempted to explain the suspicion that he was involved on the ground that it was "common knowledge" that he hated Frabotta. Mall Manager Petrie and Security Chief Gregorcic then suspended Deka indefinitely, pending a review of the matter with Respondent's new corporate head of security (Dierker) who was away at the time, and whom Petrie had been unable to reach by telephone. Dierker, Gregorcic, and Petrie met on Friday, November 18, reviewed the events and evidence obtained, and scheduled a hearing for Deka for 11 a.m. on Monday, November 21. Deka was notified Friday afternoon of the proposed meeting. Late that night, he delivered a note stating that he would not be able to attend the meeting "as his lawyer was unable to attend with him," and further stating that he "would contact Respondent on Monday afternoon to set up a new appointment."

Deka did not attend the Monday meeting; instead, he telephoned and talked with Petrie about 11:45 a.m. When Petrie told him he should have attended the meeting, Deka responded that "he had his rights." Petrie said they did not include working for Respondent, and told Deka he was terminated. Deka asked "who his lawyer should contact," and Petrie told him.

The Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Deka was discharged for union activity appears premised on her findings (1) that Deka solicited signatures on authorization cards on November 14, (2) that he first learned he was a suspect in the "doll" incident while soliciting signatures, and (3) that this activity occurred before he was notified that he was to be at the meeting on the morning of November 15 which resulted in his suspension. We conclude, however, that the record as a whole does not support such an analysis.

Following discovery of the doll and the black rose on November 10, Deka was one of the employees who attended a meeting at employee Garbo's house on Sunday, November 13, at which the initial decision was made to "go ahead to find out how to organize" a union. Employee Hess subsequently contacted Union Representative Wet-

[1] We do not adopt the Administrative Law Judge's references to Captain Grandberry's discussing personnel matters with James Deka. Rather, the record indicates that Grandberry at times discussed personal problems with Deka.

[2] Deka's testimony does not explain why he still had the rose in his car almost a week later. The testimony of former employee Prohonic, which the Administrative Law Judge finds "unreliable" (see ALJD, fn. 15), provides an explanation. See fn. 5 infra.

trick, and Deka, Hess, and Snyder thereafter met with Wettrick and obtained authorization cards.[3] The Administrative Law Judge states that the employees met with Union Representative Wettrick on the morning of November 14 (Monday), that Deka solicited signatures on cards later that day, and that on the evening of November 14, before Deka's suspension, Hess placed signed union cards in Deka's locker. However, the testimony of Union Representative Wettrick, not treated by the Administrative Law Judge, indicates that the above sequence of events could not have occurred. Thus, Wettrick testified that he received the call from one of the employees at his office on a business day, that he was not in the office on Sunday, and that the employees did not have his home telephone number. He further testified that he first met with the employees either the day after, or 2 days following, the initial telephone contact.[4] Assuming the earliest sequence of events consistent with Wettrick's testimony, i.e., that Wettrick received the telephone call on the first business day after the employees decided to contact the Union, and that he met with the employees and provided them with authorization cards on the earliest day thereafter, Deka's first solicitation of signatures on those cards would not have occurred until the afternoon of November 15—after he had been suspended.

Similarly, with respect to the Administrative Law Judge's statement concerning Hess' placing signed union cards obtained by him in Deka's locker on the evening of November 14, Hess' own testimony was that, on the first day they received the cards from Wettrick, he, Hess, forgot to bring them in, and did not bring in any cards or solicit signatures himself until the day after that. Hence, even if the meeting with Wettrick had occurred on November 14, the Administrative Law Judge's finding would not be consistent with Hess' own testimony. While the Administrative Law Judge states that Deka first learned he was a suspect while soliciting signatures on cards on November 14, we find that the record supports Respondent's exception to the effect that Deka himself changed his testimony and conceded that he knew he was a suspect at least 1 or 2 days before that.[5]

In regard to the Administrative Law Judge's inference of animus by Respondent to the security employees' organizing, it should be noted that although such discussions had apparently been occurring on a sporadic basis for several months, and were known to Respondent, there is no other indication of actual retaliation by Respondent against known union adherents; e.g., Hess or Martin. Indeed, it seems that Deka was considered by fellow employees, and apparently by management, as being opposed to unionization prior to the doll incident. On November 21, the Union requested recognition for the security force and, although Union Representative Wettrick testified that the Union was not eligible for Board certification, recognition was voluntarily granted by Respondent. We note further that other employees of Respondent at this location were also represented.

We conclude, contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, that the record demonstrates that Deka had emerged as a suspect in the doll incident,[6] and was suspended for that reason, before Respondent knew of any union activity on his part, and that his subsequent discharge was an integral part of that disciplinary process,[7] unrelated to any union activity in which he may have engaged.

Accordingly, we shall dismiss the 8(a)(3) allegation of the complaint herein.

ORDER

1. Delete paragraphs 1(b) and 2(a) and (b) and reletter the remaining paragraphs.

[3] There had been a prior meeting at Garbo's house that apparently did not involve discussion of unionization. The Administrative Law Judge states that Deka attended both—as he testified. We note, however, that Hess, one of the longtime prounion activitists, testified that Deka did not attend the earlier meeting at Garbo's. In view of the result reached infra, we find it unnecessary to resolve this conflict.

[4] In response to cross-examination by the General Counsel, Wettrick testified that his meeting with the other employees "could have happened the next day after" he was first contacted. The Administrative Law Judge noted on the record that Wettrick referred to his log when testifying.

[5] Deka changed his testimony on rebuttal and, consistent at least in part with testimony by former employee Prohonic, conceded that Prohonic had told him, probably on Saturday (November 12), that he was a suspect in the voodoo doll incident.

Respondent had excepted, inter alia, to the Administrative Law Judge's refusal to accept the testimony of officer Prohonic. In view of our disposition of the 8(a)(3) allegation herein on other grounds, we find it unnecessary to rule on this matter, although we note that Deka modified his own testimony following Prohonic's appearance as a witness, and that a careful reading of Prohonic's testimony together with the record as a whole indicates it is not as internally contradictory as the Administrative Law Judge's Decision suggests.

[6] We emphasize that the question involved here is not one of Respondent's demonstrating Deka's actual participation in placing the voodoo doll in Frabotta's office, but rather the evidentiary circumstances in the relevant time frame and whether these established a reasonable basis for discharging Deka.

[7] Nor do we adopt, on this record, the Administrative Law Judge's apparent suggestion that Mall Manager Petrie's involvement here in the disciplinary process with respect to security personnel constituted disparate treatment.

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint allegations not specifically found herein be, and they hereby are, dismissed.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT interrogate our employees concerning their union activities or threaten them with discharge for seeking union representation.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of their rights to engage in self-organization, to form, join, or assist Private Police and Security Guards Local Union No. 57, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, to engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

EDWARD J. DEBARTOLO CORPORATION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JENNIE M. SARRICA, Administrative Law Judge: This is a proceeding under Section 10(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151, et seq., hereinafter referred to as the Act. Based on charges filed on November 29, 1977,[1] a complaint was issued on January 13, 1978, presenting allegations that Edward J. DeBartolo Corporation, hereinafter referred to as Respondent, committed unfair labor practices within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(1) and (3) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act. Respondent filed an answer denying that it committed the violations of the Act as alleged. Upon due notice, the case was heard before me in Cleveland, Ohio, on June 5 and 6, 1978. Representatives of all parties entered appearances and had an opportunity to participate in the proceeding.[2]

Based on the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses, and after due consideration of briefs and arguments, I make the following:

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, an Ohio corporation, is engaged in the management and operation of shopping centers and/or shopping malls, including the Randall Park Mall in North Randall, Ohio, the facility involved herein. During the year preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $100,000 of which $25,000 or more is derived from retail enterprises, including Higbee's, Halle's, The May Company, and Sears. Annually, said retail enterprises receive gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and purchase goods and/or services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Ohio.

Respondent admits and I find that it is now, and has been at all times material herein, an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

Respondent admits and I find that Private Police and Security Guards Local Union No. 57, AFL–CIO, hereinafter referred to as the Union, is now, and has been during all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Admissions

Respondent admits and I find that at all times material herein the following-named individuals occupied the positions set forth opposite their names and were agents of Respondent, acting in its behalf, and were supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

Frank Tolar—	Lieutenant, Security Department
Charles Marshall—	Supervisor, Maintenance Dept.
James Frabotta—	Lieutenant, Security Department
Lloyd Grandberry—	Captain, Security Department
Richard Dierker—	Director of Corporate Security
Scott Petrie—	General Manager of Randall Park Mall
Louis Gregorcic[3]—	Chief, Security Department

Respondent further admits and I find that, on or about November 15, the Respondent indefinitely suspended the employment of James S. Deka, the Charging Party herein, and that, on or about November 21, Respondent terminated the employment of Deka by discharging him and at all times since has failed and refused to reinstate him to his former or substantially equivalent position of employment.

[1] All dates are in 1977, unless otherwise indicated.

[2] Certain errors in the transcript are hereby noted and corrected.

[3] With respect to Gregorcic, Respondent avers in its answer that he is no longer employed by Respondent.

In its answer, Respondent denied all remaining allegations contained in the complaint, and at the hearing Respondent denied those allegations added by amendment to the complaint at the hearing.

B. The Issues

1. Whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by unlawfully interrogating, threatening, suspending, and discharging its employees because of their union activity and/or protected concerted activity.

2. Whether Respondent suspended and discharged employee James S. Deka in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

C. Deka's Employment History

James S. Deka was employed by Respondent from July 19, 1976, until November 21, 1977, as a patrolman in the security force. During the period of his employment Deka never received any oral or written warnings or suspensions except for those immediately preceding his discharge. His last four performance evaluations reveal that his superiors considered him to be an excellent and "all around fine officer," and Deka was complimented by two of his superiors for excellent performance on the job.

Deka was a personal friend of Captain Lloyd Grandberry. Deka testified that during August, while he was the manager of the baseball team, he told Grandberry and Chief Louis Gregorcic that he did "not believe in the union." Also during August or September, Deka spoke to Grandberry on his own initiative about the "gripes of the men" and how they felt about Lieutenant James Frabotta, Grandberry, and other superiors, and that they were talking about getting a union. He identified the fellow patrolmen involved in the latter activity. At that time, Grandberry told Deka he had already heard about the patrolmen's interest in a union. Although his relationship with Gregorcic was not comparable to that with Grandberry, Deka also informed Gregorcic of "what was going on with fellow officers."

D. The Union Activity

Two meetings concerning the mutual interests of patrolmen employed by Respondent were held at the home of Patrolman Salvatore (Tory) Garbo. Deka attended both. Notice of these meetings was posted on the blackboard, located in the locker room and used by Respondent to announce meetings on anything pertaining to the security department. However, they were not identified as union meetings. The second of these meetings was held on November 13. At this meeting employees decided to find out how to organize and Patrolman James M. Hess, a former member of the Union, was designated to contact Union Representative Wettrick and set up a meeting with some of the patrolmen, on behalf of the group. Such a meeting was held on the morning of November 14, at a local restaurant known as Manners of Valleyview. Present, in addition to Hess and Wettrick, were two patrolmen, Victor Snyder and Deka. Wettrick gave these individuals union authorization cards to have signed. That day and the following day Deka took the cards with him to work and solicited signatures of fellow patrolmen. Most of this activity took place in Respondent's locker room. Additionally, on the evening of November 14, Deka, who attended the police academy where Gregorcic was an instructor, took the cards with him to class,[4] where he continued active solicitation.

E. The 8(a)(1) Allegations

It is alleged in the complaint that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by each of the following incidents involving conduct of Grandberry: (1) In his office in August or September, Grandberry threatened Deka with discharge or other reprisals by telling him that employees who engaged in union activity or protected concerted activity would be discharged; (2) in mid-November Grandberry made a similar threat to Sergeant Frederick D. Martin, Jr., by telling him that Respondent's security guards would lose their jobs if they chose the Union as their collective-bargaining representative; and (3) sometime in early to mid-December, Grandberry threatened employees with unspecified reprisals by stating to Garbo, "I want you" and another named employee "to stop the Union. You're both good patrolmen. I'd hate to lose you."

Deka testified that in August he went to Grandberry's office to inform him that "the guys" were dissatisfied and that the word was out "that they were going to get a union" if things were not straightened out, to which Grandberry replied that he had a "s— list" and "whoever was starting a union, they were going to get rid of." Grandberry asked Deka for the names of the individuals involved and Deka named two patrolmen, Hess and Sergeant Crowley.

With respect to this allegation, Grandberry testified that, in addition to his work for Respondent, he is a police officer in the nearby village of Woodmere. He was on vacation from November 9 to November 22. Grandberry recalled that before he left for vacation he was aware of talk of union organizing among the security force. He explained that he "heard scuttlebutt of attempts to bring a union in" and "the way they [the security guards] talked, he could hear," but he never joined in their conversations. Grandberry's office is located by the squadroom next to that of Frabotta. Grandberry admitted that Deka was a close friend and that they conversed nearly every time they met; that Deka kept him informed as to what was going on in the department; and, that he discussed personnel problems with Deka. Grandberry also testified that there has been frequent union talk among the security force since the mall opened. However, he denied that Deka ever mentioned any specific union activity to him, and asserted that Deka was never mentioned to him as one who was active in bringing in the Union.

[4] Upon the basis of a card majority following an appropriate demand, Respondent extended recognition to the Union on November 23, and at the time of the hearing bargaining was in progress.

I do not credit Grandberry's denial that Deka ever mentioned specific union activity to him. Clearly, at that time, Deka was engaged in keeping superiors informed of occurrences among the security force. The familiarity of the relationship between Deka and Grandberry, which included personnel matters normally kept confidential as between supervisors and employees, plus Deka's declared union opposition and confessed attempts to foster consideration of employee gripes prior to November 9, supports a conclusion that he reported to Grandberry, and possibly to Gregorcic, everything he learned of union and concerted activity among the security force. For purposes of my credibility determination, I place no significance in testimony that before Grandberry went on vacation on November 9, General Manager Scott Petrie instructed supervisors not to hold any conversations with employees about the Union and that Petrie issued such orders to supervisors not only after the Union made its claim but whenever the Union was mentioned throughout the period since the mall opened. The issue is not what orders were given to supervisors, but rather what the individual supervisors said and did.[5]

Martin testified that sometime during early to mid-November, before Deka was discharged, and while Martin was in Grandberry's office, the latter stated that if the employees "got a union in they would be fired" and on another occasion Grandberry made the same statement in the presence of Garbo.

Grandberry could not recall having conversations with one or more of the security guards or specifically with Martin and/or Garbo about what would happen if the Union organized the security force. He did recall that someone asked his opinion of unions, and he stated that law enforcement and unions did not mix.

Garbo testified that he had several conversations with Grandberry wherein the Union was the subject, some of which were in the presence of Martin and one in the presence of Snyder. In one such conversation Grandberry expressed his wish that the employees would not "get a union in," and stated his fear that "we would all be fired, including himself, if a union did in fact organize." On one occasion in early December, Grandberry asked Garbo and Snyder to "try to keep the Union from coming in."[6] Grandberry mentioned that the security guards could be replaced with the police department.

Grandberry denied that he tried to talk any of his patrolmen out of joining the Union. He could not recall a December conversation with Garbo and Snyder, and denied that he told anyone he wanted them to try to keep the Union out or that they would be fired if they brought the Union in.

I am not convinced that Grandberry took a hands-off position and do not credit his denials. His admissions, together with the pattern of conduct attributed to him by three witnesses, whose testimony gives no indication that it was contrived, convince me that he did engage in such conversations with members of the security force. I credit the testimony of Deka, Martin, and Garbo as to the conversations with Grandberry. But for the statements made to Martin and Garbo, one might be inclined to view statements made to an employee such as Deka, who was engaged in reporting on the activities of other employees including union matters, as having slight, if any, coercive impact. However, in the total context, I find each of the foregoing, including statements made to Deka, constitutes interference, restraint, and coercion and that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Further allegations of 8(a)(1) violations involve conduct of Lieutenant Frank Tolar in his office in the following incidents: (1) on November 14, interrogating Deka by asking him how many cards he had gotten signed by other employees; and (2) on November 18, interrogating Hess by asking him, "How is the Union going?"

Deka testified that, before the second meeting of patrolmen on November 13, he had occasion to enter Tolar's office concerning some reports. On this occasion Tolar stated: "I hear the guys are having a meeting." Deka replied: "Well, the guys are thinking about a union." Tolar stated he thought "it was a good idea" and he wished he could sign. On the evening of November 14 or early on November 15, before Deka's suspension, patrolmen Snyder and Hess had placed the signed union cards obtained by them from fellow employees in Deka's locker. Deka was checking the number of signed cards when Tolar asked him how many had signed. Deka told Tolar: "Just about everybody in the department."

Hess testified that he stopped in Tolar's office to speak with him at which time Tolar asked how the Union was going and Hess responded that it was going fine. Tolar then asked whether there was any way he could join. Hess responded, "Not right now," and Tolar said, "Okay."

The evidence presented reveals that Tolar, who was the immediate supervisor of patrolmen working on whatever shift he was scheduled to take, occupied an office about 15 feet from the patrolmen's locker room, which also housed the records office. Consequently, Tolar was frequently in and out of the locker room during his shift as his work involved handling the records. In his previous employment, Tolar was a union member.

Tolar testified that in early November there was a lot of talk and rumors about a union. Patrolmen talked with him. Additionally, he could overhear their conversations. He testified that "We had heard from everyone of them about it and either they talked to me directly, or in passing in a conversation, or whatever. But I can't say specifically this guy, this guy and this guy." Tolar could not remember specific conversations with particular patrolmen concerning union activity and union meetings. He did recall seeing a posting on the locker room blackboard of a notice for a union meeting but could not recall whether it specifically designated that it was a union meeting. He stated that in his recollection this occurred after the organizing was "out in the open," but could not fix the date or state whether this was before or after the Union's recognition demand.

Additionally, Tolar testified that his superiors brought to him information concerning the organizing activities of the patrolmen but claimed that he would not respond to such information and refused to reply to any comments about union activity. Tolar testified that Deka had been mentioned as being a patrolman supporting the Union before his suspension. Tolar admitted that he may have had a conversation with Deka about the time of the posted union meeting and that he may have also had a conversation with Deka regarding union cards. Tolar further testified that he probably held a conversation with Hess in which he asked how the Union was going and "he probably told me." However, Tolar denied that he asked Hess whether he could join. Tolar admitted that from his conversations with employees he had a pretty good knowledge of who was strong for the Union.

Clearly, Tolar was sympathetic to employees' efforts to organize and not only made this fact known but also, by his silence on the subject when it was brought up by his superiors, tried to protect their efforts. While asking active employee organizers how many signed cards they had, and how things were going in their organizing efforts, is generally the type of interrogation viewed as violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I find in Tolar's conduct an absence of any reasonable inference of coercive interrogation. On the contrary, the circumstances would indicate encouragement. Even if Tolar did ask whether he could join (and I do not find this to be so as in all other respects he was an unusually candid witness and there is no reason to reject his denial), I do not believe that in the circumstances it would further the policies of the Act to find an 8(a)(1) violation based on such an inquiry.[7] Accordingly, I shall recommend dismissal of allegations of unlawful conduct based on statements made by Tolar.

It is alleged that on November 25, at Jake's Delicatessen at the Randall Park Mall, in North Randall, Ohio, Charles Marshall, the maintenance department supervisor, unlawfully interrogated Hess about the union activity, sympathies, and desires of himself and other employees. Hess testified that on the day after Thanksgiving he was having lunch at Jake's Delicatessen when he was joined by Marshall. The latter asked Hess whether there was any truth to the rumor that the security guards were forming or had formed a union. Hess told Marshall that the rumors were true, that they were trying to form a union. Marshall's response was that he thought it was "great." Marshall then proceeded to relate an experience he had at his former employer where he had formed a union, and outlined for Hess, step by step, what the security guards would have to do, and the procedures to follow, including advice that if they experienced any kind of harassment to notify the National Labor Relations Board. Hess further testified that the maintenance department is presently represented by a union and that it has a collective-bargaining agreement covering those employees. Hess also testified that to the best of his knowledge, at the time of his conversation with Marshall, the Union had already requested recognition as representative of the security guards. Marshall did not testify.

In this situation, as in those conversations involving Tolar, I am convinced that to find a violation would not reflect the intent or further the purposes of the Act.[8] Accordingly, I shall recommend dismissal of the violation of the 8(a)(1) allegation which is based on the conversation between Hess and Marshall.

It is alleged in the complaint that, sometime in late November, Frabotta, while driving in a police cruiser with an employee, unlawfully interrogated him by asking whether he had been contacted by the Union, and if it was Deka or another employee who had contacted him. In its answer, Respondent denies the manner and form of this allegation, averring that Frabotta conversed with a patrolman after Deka had been discharged and the charge herein had been filed, and that he only inquired whether Deka was active in organizing for the Union as Deka claimed. It is further alleged that, on or about December 3, Frabotta engaged in a conversation with an employee in the patrolmen's locker room and during that conversation unlawfully (a) interrogated the employee by asking him, "What do you know about this Union?" and "Have you checked it out?" and (b) impliedly threatened the employee with discharge or other unspecified reprisals, and intimidated, coerced, and restrained him by stating, "You ought to stay out of this Union mess. You're new."

Frabotta, who at the time of the hearing was employed full time on the State of Ohio police force, testified that the conversation in the squad car referred to in the complaint was between himself and Snyder. As noted above, Snyder had not returned from vacation at the time of the hearing. Frabotta testified that he had previously verified with Snyder what had been said in that conversation, and that it was as follows: "Frabotta asked Snyder who had approached him about the Union, Hess or Deka, and Snyder replied that it was Deka." Frabotta was unable to testify whether by that time he had learned that Deka had filed a charge with the Board. Admittedly, Frabotta was not seeking the information in order to ascertain the validity of the representation claim or preparation of Respondent's defense to the charge. Frabotta stated that he had just learned from Gregorcic that the latter had been told by a student at the police academy that Deka was actively involved in union organizing.

Patrolman John William Brandow III, who at the time of the hearing was a full-time police officer on the force of the village of Hiram, Ohio, and who was newly employed by Respondent on October 31, 1977, was the employee involved in the locker room conversation which took place around December 3. On that occasion Frabotta asked Brandow what he knew about the Union and who had approached him about the Union. Brandow told Frabotta that he knew nothing about the Union and that nobody had approached him. Frabotta stated that unions did not belong in police work. In that conversation Frabotta in effect asserted that Deka was going to look bad when this union mess came out in court, explaining that he meant Deka had perjured himself before the National Labor Relations Board by telling them he was fired for bringing the Union in. Frabotta asserted this was not true, that there were other reasons Deka was fired. Frabotta also told Brandow that because the latter was new on the force he ought to stay out of the Union, asserting that "the trouble-makers were bringing the Union in, and this was to protect them because they weren't doing their job."

[8] See fn. 7, supra.

Frabotta testified that he asked Brandow if anyone had approached him about the Union just to make conversation. Brandow responded that they had. Frabotta asked, "What are you going to do?" Brandow asked, "What would you do?" He told Brandow he did not have to do anything, then added, "I wouldn't get involved." Frabotta also admitted discussing Deka and stating that Deka was lying when he claimed he was fired because of union activity. Frabotta recalled that basically he told Brandow, "Do what's best for you. Don't feel pressured by anyone . . . ."

Clearly, either version of the Brandow conversation constitutes unlawful interrogation as does the admitted questioning addressed to Snyder. Both instances are violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act,[9] and I so find.

F. The 8(a)(3) and (1) Allegations

As noted above, it is admitted in the answer that Respondent, on November 15, indefinitely suspended the employment of Deka and, on November 21, discharged or terminated his employment, and has since failed and refused to reinstate him. Respondent denies the allegation in the complaint that these employment changes were for unlawful reasons. Respondent asserts that Deka's suspension and subsequent discharge were for cause based entirely on discipline, unrelated to any union or concerted activity by Deka.

The incident precipitating the sequence of events which assertedly culminated in Deka's discharge on November 21 occurred on November 10. On that morning, when Frabotta walked into his office he found a voodoo doll, bearing his badge number, pierced with pins, and hanging by its neck from the ceiling sprinkler fixture. Soon thereafter, he discovered on his desk a black rose and a printed note, which read "Any time we want," pinned to his hat which was placed on his outbox by the door.[10] Frabotta had entered his office with a key and had not noticed any irregularity in the lock. On examination of the door and lock, nothing evidencing a break-in was apparent that had not been seen previously as a result of prior break-ins.[11]

According to Frabotta, he was very disturbed by the symbolic message as well as the written one, and considered the incident as one conveying a personal threat of bodily harm, so he spoke to Grandberry about it when the latter came in for his check that day[12] and, since Gregorcic was not on duty at that time, Frabotta began an investigation of the incident on his own authority. A check with the florist at Alexander's Flowers, located in the mall, revealed that an employee had painted a rose black for Deka a couple of days before.[13] Also in talking with Martin, Frabotta learned that Deka had been observed several days earlier in the patrolmen's locker room examining a voodoo doll. Frabotta solicited a statement from Martin regarding this observation, and also wrote up a report of his own observation and investigation of the incident and left the report and statement for Gregorcic.[14]

Deka was off duty on November 9 and 10. He learned that management suspected him of involvement in the voodoo incident while he was soliciting signatures on union cards. At that time, Martin told him an investigation was being conducted. Later when he reported to the dispatch center on the night of November 14, Deka was handed a memorandum dated November 15, stating, "Be in the Chief's office at 9 a.m. on 15th."

Deka met with Scott Petrie, general manager of Randall Park Mall, and Gregorcic on November 15 at 10 a.m. Gregorcic asked whether Deka knew the reason he was summoned. Deka replied that he did not. Gregorcic stated that Frabotta had made a complaint against Deka that he had put the voodoo items in Frabotta's office, and that they knew he had bought the black rose at Alexander's. Deka admitted he had bought a black rose for a party and asserted that he still had the rose. Deka was then told they had somebody who said they had seen Deka with a voodoo doll. Deka explained that he had found the doll on the locker room floor and had shown it to Martin, commenting he thought it was funny, and then placed it on the table.[15] Deka was asked whether he knew who had done it. Deka disclaimed knowledge. Petrie then stated he wanted to see the rose Deka had purchased.[16] Deka went to his automobile and brought back the dried up black rose.[17] Deka was asked to wait in the outer office. According to Petrie, he and Gregorcic attempted to reach Richard Dierker, Respondent's director of corporate security, to confer but were unable to reach him.[18] Deka was again summoned and told by Petrie that they were suspending him pending investigation. Deka asked for, and received, the suspension in writing.

[10] Frabotta testified that when he entered his office he saw the hanging doll; he left his office for a few minutes and when he returned "someone" had taken the doll down. It was at that time he went to his desk, discovered the rose and then the note.

[11] On one of the previous occurrences, Frabotta's hat was missing. The flattened badge from the hat was later received through the mail by Chief Gregorcic. On other occasions only papers on his desk were disturbed. Because of these latter occurrences, Martin affixed a device to the door to determine whether the door was the source of entry and the device was discharged that night. The locks on the office doors of Frabotta and Gregorcic were then changed and Martin put a screw into the doorframe, placed so as to prevent anyone from slipping a thin blade behind the doorframe to open the lock.

[12] As noted, supra, Grandberry's vacation began on November 9. Grandberry testified that he did go to the mall for his check on November 10, but did not testify with respect to any conversation with Frabotta, and left the impression that he was on vacation and knew nothing about the voodoo doll and black rose incident.

[13] Deka testified that he had purchased a black rose at that shop on November 8, assertedly to take to a party at the police academy on November 8 or 9. Frabotta claimed he learned through inquiry that Deka had been seen the previous day in the vicinity of Alexander's Flowers. However, he could not recall who told him this, and the investigation file does not reflect that Frabotta had any such lead.

[14] Frabotta's testimony would indicate that he did all of this on that first day. However, Martin's statement is dated November 11, at 2:05 p.m., and Frabotta's report is dated November 13, Sunday. It recites the content of Martin's statement as well as the information obtained from Alexander's Flowers, and a comment that Gregorcic had accompanied him to Alexander's on November 11. There is no testimony that Frabotta made more than one report. It is therefore unclear just what, if anything, concerning this incident Frabotta left for Gregorcic to see when the latter reported to duty on November 10 or 11. There is undenied testimony that officials did not believe Deka had placed the items in Frabotta's office but that Deka had knowledge which he would disclose if he personally were charged as the perpetrator.

According to Petrie, he and Gregorcic later discussed the matter with Dierker who told them to get more evidence. Five statements were obtained from different patrolmen between 1:56 and 4:15 p.m. on November 15. One patrolman related that he had seen a white box on the table in the locker room. None of the others offered any evidence, reciting only that each had not seen such a white box. A second statement was taken from Martin at 6:58 p.m. on November 17, in which he added that he had seen Deka place the doll on the table, and that after the Frabotta office incident Deka had displayed to him a black rose which Deka claimed to have purchased at Alexander's for a party. Martin was later approached for still another statement but refused, declaring that he would not permit them to put words in his mouth.

On Friday, November 18, after 2 p.m., Petrie, Gregorcic, and Dierker met and discussed the results of the investigation. Even though the supplemental investigation admittedly added no confirming evidence, according to Petrie, they agreed on a "feeling" that "Deka was involved" because the evidence was "too coincidental." Also according to Petrie, at that time the three agreed to discharge Deka for his implication in the voodoo incident and all that remained was "a matter of timing." Petrie added that Gregorcic and Dierker agreed at that time to set up a meeting for Monday morning, November 21, for the purpose of discharging Deka. Dierker testified that the Monday morning meeting was set to give Deka a hearing and to obtain more facts or comments regarding the incident. Gregorcic testified that, on November 18, he and Petrie were of the opinion that, if nothing favorable to Deka arose out of the Monday meeting, there was a good chance that Deka would be terminated. Gregorcic wrote the memorandum to Deka dated November 18, setting forth the meeting time and date.

The week of Deka's suspension happened to also be his week to drive in a ride-sharing agreement among patrolmen to and from the police academy classes. On Friday evening, November 18, Deka arrived at the mall to pick up his passengers, and while waiting in his automobile he was approached by Frabotta who handed him an envelope. It contained an interoffice memorandum from Gregorcic dated November 18, advising that arrangements had been made for a meeting between Dierker, Gregorcic, and Deka in the conference room at 11 a.m., on Monday, November 21. The notice did not state the purpose or subject of the meeting. While at the academy, Deka called his lawyer and, thereafter, drafted a letter to Gregorcic advising that his lawyer was unable to be present at the appointed time and requesting another date and time. Deka hand-delivered the letter to Frabotta to deliver to Gregoric and slipped a copy of the letter under Dierker's office door.

According to Petrie, between 7 and 9 p.m. on November 18, he received a call from Gregorcic stating a letter had been received from Deka advising that he could not be at the scheduled meeting because his lawyer would be unable to attend with him due to another commitment. At 10 o'clock that evening, Petrie received a second call from Gregorcic relating information of Deka's involvement in union activity, specifically, that Deka was reportedly talking with a union official.

[15] Daniel Prohonic, a police officer of Regional Transit, the county bus service which transverses Randall Park Mall, during the relevant period, worked for Respondent as a part-time security patrolman. Presented as a witness for Respondent, Prohonic testified that he saw the doll 5 days to a week before the voodoo incident when Deka joined him at a mall restaurant and brought forth from a bag the doll and a package of pins and told Prohonic the name of the store where Deka had purchased these items. Prohonic asked Deka what he was going to do and Deka said he was going to hang it in Frabotta's office. Prohonic further testified that on the same day or on the day following the discovery of the doll and rose Prohonic suggested that Deka "lay off" Frabotta to which Deka replied that Frabotta could not touch him, that he had purchased two black roses and had one in the car and in case they asked him he could produce a rose. Prohonic also testified that he never related any of the foregoing to any of his superiors before Deka's discharge. Then Prohonic changed his testimony to state that he did tell Martin within a day after the incident that he had seen Deka putting pins in the doll. Also, he engaged in an argument with Garbo as to whether the incident should have been perpetrated. Prohonic then testified that he told Frabotta on the day of the incident who had bought the doll and what transpired in the restaurant. Frabotta did not ask him for a written statement at that time. At another point, Prohonic testified that Frabotta did ask him to give a statement regarding the incident but he did not do so because "people . . . Dierker and Frabotta . . . weren't around when I needed to turn it in." And at still another point, Prohonic testified that he was not asked for a statement "until this year" which would be well after the relevant period. Again, Prohonic explained he "tried to stay out of it." Then Prohonic testified he first learned of the hearing in which he was testifying the preceding Wednesday when he encountered Dierker at the mall and was invited into Dierker's office. Dierker asked Prohonic whether the latter had told Frabotta he "knew who had the doll" to which Prohonic replied "yes"; Dierker asked Prohonic whether he had told him (Dierker). Prohonic said, "yes"; Dierker stated that it must have slipped his mind. When asked when he told this to Dierker, Prohonic stated, "It was earlier this year, the same time I told Lt. Frabotta." Then Prohonic testified that at that time they were talking about Martin's testimony and Prohonic said, "Well, you still have me." Frabotta said, "Well, what about you?" Prohonic said, "I know Deka bought the doll," and reminded Frabotta he had so informed Frabotta of this in the flower shop on the day the voodoo items were discovered. Frabotta told Prohonic that he did not remember Prohonic talking to him. According to Prohonic, Frabotta seemed surprised. There was considerably more of this type of internal contradiction, but the foregoing is sufficient to present the unreliability of Prohonic's testimony without concern for specific denials.

[16] In his Board statement, Petrie had stated that prior to the November 15 meeting he knew from Martin's statement that Deka had said he was going to use the rose for a party. The statement of Martin with that information was not taken until 6:58 p.m. on November 17. Petrie then changed his testimony to indicate that on November 15 his only knowledge of Deka's connection with the November 10 incident was Martin's statement regarding the doll. Yet that statement had been submitted with Frabotta's report of Deka's having purchased a black rose at Alexander's.

[17] Deka explained he had taken the rose to a party at the police academy for a "going away party" given there for one who was being sent to the penitentiary. There was no followup investigation on this claim although further statements were solicited from other patrolmen that afternoon and many of the officers were connected with the academy.

[18] There is testimony that there had been a discussion of the matter the previous day and a tentative decision to suspend Deka pending investigation.

No reply was made to Deka's November 18 letter and no attempt was made to contact him between the time of its receipt and the hour set for the meeting. On Monday morning, Petrie left word at his office that he was to be notified if Deka showed up for the meeting. Having heard nothing by Monday morning, Deka called Dierker to verify that the latter had received his letter. At that time Deka inquired when Dierker could set up a new appointment. Dierker told Deka that he had nothing to do with it and that Deka should talk to Petrie. Deka attempted to do so but Petrie was not available. Deka left his phone number. Petrie did not try to return Deka's call. Petrie claimed that Dierker never told him of Deka's call to Dierker that morning.

At 11:45 a.m., Petrie called Deka and asked why Deka was not at the meeting. Deka explained he had supplied Gregorcic and Dierker with advance notice, together with the reason. Petrie informed Deka that he had been given an opportunity by the director of corporate security to have a meeting and he should have attended. Deka told Petrie he felt that he was being harassed and wanted his lawyer with him if they were going to make any charges against him. Petrie informed Deka that his lawyer had not been invited, declaring, "I said I wanted you at that meeting."[19] Deka claimed he had rights, which Petrie denied and advised Deka that he was discharged. Deka asked who his lawyer should contact and Petrie advised Deka it would be the legal department in the home office. After the conversation, Petrie wrote the discharge letter which Deka received by mail the following day. The reason stated therein for Deka's termination was "for failure to comply with an order by the Director of Security at Randall Park Mall."

Frabotta, who is no longer employed by Respondent, testified that, when his hat was taken from his office and destroyed in October 1977, and when papers on his desk were disturbed in November 1977, prior to the voodoo doll and black rose incident, no investigation was conducted although from all appearances his door lock had been tampered with. These were not unnoticed incidents for it was Gregorcic who received Frabotta's hat badge through the mail. Both Dierker and Petrie claim responsibility for ordering the investigation of the voodoo doll and black rose incident. I discredit both in this respect.

Dierker testified that, when he came to work on the morning of November 10, he was met by Frabotta who exhibited to him the items found in Frabotta's office that morning, and Dierker directed Frabotta to institute an investigation and to use any member of the department[20] to see what evidence they could accumulate.[21] According to Dierker, Frabotta reported back to him by supplying his own statement and that of Martin. Factually, Frabotta's report was made to Gregorcic, and Frabotta made no mention in his testimony of any such contact with Dierker, either initially on November 10, or ultimately by way of a report. It is highly unlikely that Frabotta would have forgotten the immediate involvement of such a top company official or that in such a situation he would have waited until November 13 to submit his report of the incident to his superior, Gregorcic, when he had Martin's statement dated November 11 and the information in his own statement was obtained on November 10 and 11. Frabotta did testify that it was Dierker who wanted a second statement from Martin, which Martin gave at 6:58 p.m. on November 17. Frabotta testified he never understood why Dierker wanted this second statement. I am convinced that Dierker did not enter the picture until November 15.

Petrie also claimed credit for instituting the investigation of the voodoo doll and black rose incident. He testified that the matter first came to his attention on November 11, when he was informed of it by a maintenance man. Petrie recalled that he went to Gregorcic to ask what had happened. He was told that Frabotta's office had been broken into and the voodoo items placed there with the note. Petrie related that he inspected the door and observed that the wood around the latch looked "chewed" and several scratches appeared on the metal column around the door latch.[22] According to Petrie,

[19] It is noted that Gregorcic's memorandum notice of the meeting gives no indication that Petrie was to be involved in this meeting. It reflects "cc: Mr. Dierker" only. Nor is there any indication to whom Petrie may have made this comment before this telephone conversation. Admittedly, it was never previously communicated to Deka.

[20] Prohonic testified that on the November 10 when the stores opened he accompanied Frabotta to Alexander's Flowers where Frabotta questioned the clerk on duty. Frabotta made no mention of having any assistance in the investigation. For reasons related in fn. 15, supra, I do not credit Prohonic's testimony in any respect as I find it totally unreliable.

Dierker testified that he ordered the investigation because he viewed the incident as going beyond a practical joke and felt that disciplinary action should be taken. With respect to his own efforts to investigate, Dierker testified he did not attempt fingerprinting because the doll had been handled by too many people and the rose would not respond to the chemicals used in the fingerprinting process. Dierker claimed he did take the note to the police scientific laboratory where the handwriting expert declined to make an analysis. No verification of this step was presented, nor was an explanation given as to why the note did not lend itself to fingerprinting. His testimony stands without corroboration or documentation.

[22] Although it is admittedly not normal procedure for Petrie to become involved in investigations, Petrie testified he found such action warranted on this occasion for three reasons: (1) an officer was being harassed; (2) the discipline of the department was involved; and (3) breaking and entering is a criminal offense. This attempted justification is in stark contrast to the record of prior breaking and entering incidents referred to in footnote 10, supra, none of which drew Petrie's attention or concern, and all of which were known to both Frabotta and Gregorcic at the time of this incident. Petrie claimed to have asked certain questions of either Frabotta or Gregorcic at the time. If this were the case it would seem strange that they would not remember to testify to this part of the investigation. If this occurred at all, there is no explanation why they would not have told him that the observable markings evidencing a break-in were the result of prior incidents and preexisted this one. Also, one might note, in contrast to this supposed justification for intervention into security department investigations, the number of other criminal offenses set forth as the basis for other discharges of security officers, infra, none of which reflect involvement by Petrie even though three involved theft

Deka's name was first brought up when Martin stated he had seen Deka in possession of the doll with pins in it and upon receiving that information he and Gregorcic decided to have Deka come to the office on November 15 for an interview.[23] Deka was advised of this by memorandum drafted by Gregorcic. As a copy of the memorandum was not presented in evidence, there is no documentation to establish Petrie's involvement in the investigation up to this point in time. Since Deka received the notice of the meeting on the evening of November 14, and Frabotta's report is dated November 13, the evidence suggests Monday, November 14, as the earliest date on which it was decided to conduct the interview with Deka on November 15. Considering all of the relevant evidence, I am convinced that Petrie did not become involved in the voodoo investigation until after Deka's participation in contacting the union representative and his active solicitation of union authorization cards on November 14.

According to Dierker, he made the decision to discharge Deka for failure to respond to an order to attend a meeting. He does not indicate that this was ever communicated to anyone. According to Petrie, prior to his phone call to Deka on November 21, Dierker and Gregorcic had already decided on November 18 to discharge Deka because of their belief that he was involved in putting the voodoo doll and black rose in Frabotta's office. Petrie testified that this incident could be considered a violation of four of Respondent's rules of conduct for its security officers warranting suspension.[24] However, as Deka's failure to attend the meeting was a final act of breach of those rules which was cause for suspension pending a hearing, namely, "willful disobedience of an order lawfully issued to him by a superior officer," Petrie discharged Deka and in the official notice he listed only that action as the cause of discharge.

Petrie testified that it was not the practice of the Company to discharge a patrolman before he had been suspended, and the action taken after suspension depended on the circumstances of each case and on the work record of the employee. He personally does not generally play any part in disciplining or discharging security department employees. An exception, other than the case involving Deka, occurred when he gave a sergeant the option of resigning or being discharged after suspension for incompetency and neglect of duty, in a situation where he personally was the complaining official concerning neglect which affected the tenants' operations, and the officer's record revealed a history of five warnings and complaints by four different superior officers within a 3-month period. Petrie then explained that he was the one to call Deka and discharge him because he had become involved by attending the meetings.

The actions taken with respect to other security officers, either discharged or given the opportunity to resign in lieu of discharge during the period reasonably contiguous to the discharge of Deka, were without the intervention of Petrie, and their personnel records reveal that disciplinary letters and memoranda, complaints of neglect of duty or misconduct, and suspensions were in many cases numerous preceding discharge action. Most of the offenses were of a nature serious to society, such as sabotage of communications, false fire alarms, and criminal conduct including theft of property, carrying a concealed weapon, arrests by neighboring police departments, and revocation of the required deputy commission. In this latter situation, the patrolman was given a desk job for a period of time before termination steps were taken.

A review of Deka's personnel file reveals that he had never received any warning slips and no disciplinary action before the immediate suspension and discharge, and that he had no absences or tardiness. It also revealed that he consistently received above average or excellent job performance ratings. Petrie could not recall, but did not deny, that Deka also received from Petrie special praise for his performance relating to duties assigned involving official escort for visiting dignitaries. Also prior to the voodoo incident, Gregorcic had recommended Deka highly to a neighboring police department where Deka was seeking employment. Admittedly, Deka's record was not reviewed or considered in the decision to discharge him.

The reason stated in the termination letter as the cause for discharge, differing in concept from that given verbally, is, at best, a stretching of the circumstances to fit a rule. "Willful disobedience of an order lawfully issued by a superior officer," it would seem, must contemplate something in the nature of an order. The memorandum notice of the November 21 meeting is certainly not presented in the form or nature of an order, and when Deka gave advance notification that the "arrangement" mentioned in the memorandum did not comport with his convenience and gave the reason why, the least that could reasonably be expected is that he would be notified that he was not being given a choice as to the date or time of the meeting and despite his stated reasons he would be expected to attend the meeting as originally set. A lack of such a normal response tends to indicate an intent to take a secretive course hoping to create an incident to use as a pretext for discharge.

A significant reason for this approach may well rest in the timing of two phone calls by Gregorcic to Petrie, on the night of November 18. In the first, Gregorcic relayed to Petrie the receipt and content of Deka's letter in response to the Gregorcic memorandum of that date. In the second call Gregorcic reported information he had just obtained regarding union activity. Gregorcic testified that at or about 10:20 p.m. two fellow Bainbridge from stores and mall property over which as mall manager Petrie had direct responsibility. Additionally, the money stolen from the purse of Gregorcic's secretary while it was in Gregorcic's office did not precipitate an investigation.

[23] It is noted that both Martin's statement about seeing Deka with the doll and Frabotta's investigation report relating that Deka purchased a black rose from Alexander's were both in Frabotta's investigation report dated November 13. That document reflects that Deka's name was revealed to Frabotta at the flower shop. This part of Frabotta's investigation preceded Martin's statement.

police officers who had just attended the police academy relayed to him information they had obtained at the school. These officers informed Gregorcic that Respondent was about to "be hearing from the Union,"[25] and that Deka and Hess were involved. Gregorcic testified that he communicated this information of Deka's union activity to Petrie because he felt it might have a bearing on the meeting they had scheduled to be held with Deka on Monday.

Although this is claimed as the first specific knowledge by superior officers of Deka's personal involvement in the Union, the record requires a contrary conclusion. Supervisor Tolar testified that Deka was mentioned as being one of the patrolmen supporting the Union prior to Deka's suspension. In fact, after the union activity "came out in the open," i.e., posting of notice of meetings at Garbo's home, in November, "all patrolmen were aware of it, and everyone was aware of it." Indeed, his superiors may have passed this information back to him from some other sources. Tolar himself had seen Deka counting the signed authorization cards in the patrolmen's locker room, and Deka had informed him that most of the patrolmen had signed. Grandberry testified that, before he went on vacation November 9, he was aware of activity among the men on the security force directed to "bringing a union into the Security Department," because he could hear the patrolmen talk. Frabotta's office was next to Grandberry's near the squadroom and undoubtedly he too could hear the same talk. Frabotta admitted that he first heard about the union activity in November before the voodoo doll incident. Gregorcic admitted that he was in his office regularly during this period and that he conferred with Frabotta every day that the latter was on duty. He talked to Frabotta "off and on" about rumors of union activity, and may have discussed meetings at patrolmen's houses with Petrie during this period. He did talk to Petrie about the fact that the patrolmen "were unhappy" or "had problems." Gregorcic also admitted that he could have told Petrie the patrolmen were talking about a union, and "it could be" that Petrie told him, "Don't worry, they're just talking." After being prompted by his own affidavit, Petrie admitted that he had previously received reports from Grandberry and Gregorcic of one or more union meetings at Garbo's home, and that in those reports supervisory officers gave names of individual patrolmen who were involved in union activity. It is noted that Deka attended both meetings at Garbo's home. Further, Petrie related that Gregorcic relayed to him information gained from the police academy that Deka was involved in the union organizing and was reported as talking with union officials. Nor was Dierker remote from such knowledge. The record reveals that, while he was still a consultant to Respondent, Dierker was invited to attend a meeting at patrolman Garbo's home to discuss problems at Randall Park Mall, but he declined to attend.

The foregoing reveals that all of the evidence Respondent ever obtained connecting Deka to the voodoo incident was within the knowledge of Respondent's chief of the security department by November 11, 1 day after the incident. Yet it was not considered serious enough to produce a written report, until Deka attended the meeting at Garbo's home where it was decided to seek out the Union. Only then, on November 13, was the incident significant enough to record in a report by Frabotta. Nor was it significant enough to take any disciplinary action on, until Deka openly undertook solicitation of signatures on union authorization cards on November 14. This brought forth a prompt suspension meeting on the morning of November 15 without one iota of additional incriminating evidence. Deka was the patrolman who was obtaining most of the signatures. His removal from the proximity of other patrolmen, by suspension, should have put the brakes on the organizing drive. However, he continued his employee contact by driving fellow patrolmen to the police academy where he continued his organizing efforts. This was followed by the scheduling of a meeting for November 21, still without a thread of added evidence[26] with respect to the voodoo incident.

The confusion among the principal representatives of Respondent in the discharge of Deka as to when the discharge decision was made, by whom, and for what reason, indicates that resolution of the voodoo incident was not the primary subject of interest or the cause for the discharge. Rather, it was being utilized to coerce Deka into inaction in his organizing efforts. Had they fully intended on November 18, when the November 21 meeting was set up, to discharge Deka at that time for his involvement in the voodoo incident (concerning which they had no more evidence than they had before Deka emerged as the leading union organizer), surely there would have been some clear understanding as to the grounds they would use, or some effort to formulate the charges against him. There is not even agreement among them as to whether this was to be a hearing, a further questioning, or a pronouncement of their discharge decision, which obviously was not even clear to them.

When Deka requested a change in the meeting date and Respondent's officials, almost simultaneously, learned of the impending representation demand and the success of Deka's organizing efforts, I am persuaded that, knowing the weaknesses in their voodoo charge, Dierker and Petrie maneuvered Deka back and forth between them so as to create a new and single so-called violation of the rules which they could use as a discharge pretext.

I find that Dierker and Petrie collaborated in a decision to discharge Deka in retaliation for his successful organizing effort and seized upon his failure to attend the scheduled meeting as a pretext to conceal their unlawful motive. Accordingly, I find that Respondent suspended Deka on November 15 and discharged him on November 21, 1977, because of his protected union activity and that it thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

[25] The Union's letter demanding recognition is dated November 21.

[26] It is not to be believed that an experienced internal security officer of Dierker's stature would have been so inadequate to the task of checking such obvious leads as Deka's story of a party at the police academy where many of Respondent's officers attended and where officers attending from two neighboring towns also worked with two of Respondent's supervisory officers (Gregorcic at Bainbridge and Grandberry at Woodmere), if the real interest had been the solving of the voodoo mystery.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

Conclusions of Law

1. Edward J. DeBartolo Corporation is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Private Police and Security Guards Local Union No. 57, AFL-CIO, at all times material herein, has been and is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By interrogating its employees concerning their union activities and threatening to discharge employees seeking union representation and by suspending and discharging an employee in retaliation for engaging in protected Section 7 rights, Respondent interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By suspending and discharging James S. Deka for engaging in union activity, and by thereafter failing and refusing to reinstate him, Respondent has discriminated against employees with respect to hire, tenure, and terms and conditions of employment and has thereby engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unlawful conduct constitutes unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. Having found that Respondent unlawfully suspended and discharged James S. Deka in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to offer him immediate and full reinstatement to his former position, without prejudice to any seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of pay suffered by him as a result of its discrimination against him, by payment to him of money equal to that which he normally would have earned, absent the unlawful discharge, with backpay and interest computed under the established standard of the Board in accordance with the formula set forth in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[27]

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record in this case, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[28]

The Respondent, Edward J. DeBartolo Corporation, North Randall, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Engaging in interrogation of its employees concerning their union activities and threats of discharge for seeking union representation.

(b) Suspending and discharging an employee in retaliation for engaging in protected Section 7 rights.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering in its employees' exercise of their rights to form, join, or assist Private Police and Security Guards Local Union No. 57, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, or to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Offer James S. Deka immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority and other rights and privileges, and make him whole in the manner set forth in "The Remedy" section of this Decision.

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its office in Randall Park Mall, North Randall, Ohio, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[29] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 8, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 8, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken by Respondent to comply herewith.

[28] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[29] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On March 25, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Arthur Leff issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel, the Charging Party, and Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs. The General Counsel and Respondent also filed answering briefs to each other's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

We agree with the Administrative Law Judge's findings, conclusions, and remedy in connection with his finding that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing since March 18, 1980, to meet and bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the appropriate unit. Our discussion below is, therefore, limited to the allegation dismissed by the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discriminatorily terminating the employment of James E. Carter on or about August 8, 1980, because of his membership in and activities on behalf of the Union.

As more fully described by the Administrative Law Judge, the credited record evidence surrounding the incident that led to Carter's discharge is as follows: On Thursday, July 31, plant engineer Lammeree told Carter that a part needed to repair forklift truck 16 would arrive at Respondent's plant at or about 2:30 or 3 p.m. on Friday, August 1, and that Carter should expect to stay on to install it even if it meant working overtime. On August 1, Carter worked all day without taking a break repairing the engine on forklift truck 4 and by 3 p.m., his normal quitting time, had successfully completed that job. After showing Lammeree the work he had done on forklift truck 4, Carter left the shop to punch out shortly after 3 p.m.

About the same time, Sam Bianco, who had been sent to another city to pick up the electric harness needed to repair forklift truck 16, returned to the shop. Lammeree approached Carter and told him that the part had arrived and that he wanted Carter to install it. Carter told Lammeree that he had already done a full day's work, that he had an appointment to keep, that Lammeree had another mechanic there who could do the job, and that he should have the other mechanic install the electric harness. Lammeree attempted to accommodate Carter by asking Bianco to install the harness. Bianco said that he doubted that he could perform the work. Lammeree related his conversation with Bianco to Carter and instructed Carter to remain overtime and perform the work. Carter again told Lammeree that he could not stay because he had an important appointment to keep. Contrary to Lammeree's instruction, Carter left the plant.

The applicable legal issues have been framed aptly by the Administrative Law Judge. Thus, he found that Carter refused to work overtime contrary to his supervisor's instructions and in violation of Respondent's mandatory overtime rules, and that such insubordinate behavior constituted legitimate grounds for dismissal. Noting that no employee of Respondent had been discharged previously for violation of this rule, the Administrative Law Judge described the issues here as whether Respondent would have meted out the ultimate disciplinary penalty to Carter but for his union activities. Stated another way, he asked whether the discharge penalty constituted discriminatory disparate treatment. We agree with the Administrative Law Judge's finding that legitimate grounds for the discharge of Carter exist here and with his framing of the issue to be decided. We disagree, however, with his assessment of the applicable record evidence and his conclusion.

The Administrative Law Judge found that Respondent has no fixed policy regarding the degree of discipline for violating its mandatory overtime rule or other rules. He reasoned that Respondent was free, therefore, to base the severity of the discipline on its assessment of the seriousness of the misconduct, so long as no considerations unlawful under the Act played a role. He found that Carter's refusal to work overtime represented gross misconduct and insubordination. In so finding, he relied primarily on his findings that it was of critical importance to have forklift truck 16 in operation as soon as possible, that Carter was made aware of the importance of this work the preceding day, and that he was the only mechanic capable of performing the necessary work. The Administrative Law Judge also found that the General Counsel failed to establish that Carter's discipline constituted disparate treatment.

[1] The General Counsel and Respondent have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

The General Counsel's evidence of disparate treatment consisted of the testimony of several employees as well as certain "contact reports" subpenaed from Respondent that related to all incidents in which employees had been brought up by their supervisors on charges for refusing to work overtime or similar conduct in the 3 preceding years.

The credited and uncontradicted testimony of employee Gene Praeger is that there had been a number of occasions, including one occasion when two of the large and one of the smaller forklifts were down, when he refused Lammeree's demand to work overtime and had walked off the job without having any disciplinary action taken against him. Each time Praeger had stated that he had a reason, without specifying what it was, for not being able to work overtime.

The credited testimony of John Campbell is that he had been given a 3-day disciplinary suspension for refusing to work overtime in May 1977 after he was instructed by his supervisors to work overtime 10 minutes before the regular quitting time. On a subsequent occasion Campbell was given only a warning when he again refused to work overtime.

The four contact reports (apparently all there were) were submitted by Respondent pursuant to a subpena from the General Counsel. In three instances, an employee who had refused to work overtime and had walked off the job, contrary to his supervisor's instructions, was simply given a warning. The fourth contact report, dated April 20, 1980, involved an employee, Frank Bowerson, who had called his supervisor to request permission not to report for work that day because he wanted to take a trip with his father. Bowerson's request was denied on the ground that there was no one available to replace him, but he stayed out anyway and was given only a 1-day suspension.

The Administrative Law Judge found that Praeger's refusals to work overtime were not comparable to Carter's refusals because Praeger's refusals were always with at least the tacit acquiescence of his supervisor. He distinguished Campbell's discipline from Carter's on the basis that Campbell was given only 10 minutes' advance notice and there were other employees available to do the work. As to the contact reports, the Administrative Law Judge refused to give them any weight because they do not contain all the relevant facts surrounding the various incidents.

The standard used by the Administrative Law Judge to evaluate the evidence of disparate treatment presented by the General Counsel was unduly restrictive. It was not incumbent on the General Counsel to show an identical situation with a diametrically opposite result. Instead, it was the General Counsel's burden to show a pattern of treatment by Respondent of employees who have refused to work overtime that is clearly at odds with the treatment of Carter.

The evidence of disparate treatment presented by the General Counsel must be evaluated within the framework of the undisputed evidence that Respondent has no fixed policy governing the degree of discipline to be imposed for the violation of the mandatory overtime rule. The absence of any such policy is significant because the record evidence shows that employees have violated the mandatory overtime rule on numerous occasions but no employee who has violated the rule had been discharged before Carter. Thus, even before we compare the circumstances present in the refusal to work overtime shown by the General Counsel's evidence with Carter's refusal, it is plain that Respondent has not strictly enforced its mandatory overtime rule and that where it had enforced this rule a warning or lesser discipline has been meted out. It is against this background that the Administrative Law Judge's handling of the individual incidents of refusal to work overtime must be evaluated.

That Praeger's refusals to work overtime were always with at least the tacit acquiescence of his supervisor pales in significance when it is considered that Praeger refused to work overtime on numerous occasions but received no discipline on any occasion. Similarly Campbell did not receive any discipline, but only a warning when he refused to work overtime on a second occasion after his earlier 3-day suspension. Hence, the General Counsel has shown that sometimes, even for repeated violations of the mandatory overtime rule, employees had escaped discipline entirely. This is in stark contrast to Carter's discharge for his first offense of this kind.

Nor do we discount the "contact reports," as the Administrative Law Judge did, because they do not contain all the relevant facts surrounding the various incidents.[3] Indeed, it is significant that

[3] It may be disputed as to who had the burden of filling in the details. Arguably, the General Counsel could have called the employees who were the subject of the reports or the officials of Respondent who prepared the reports to fill in the details. We find, however, that the reports these reports were from Respondent's own records. It would be one thing if the General Counsel had predicated his case solely on these records. But these records plainly show three additional instances where an employee has refused to work overtime and walked off the job, contrary to the supervisor's instructions, with no discipline but only a warning. At minimum, they represent additional evidence as to Respondent's past treatment of first offenders. And the contact report on Bowerman shows that his requested permission not to report for work was denied on the ground that no employee was available to replace him. Although the Bowerman incident does not involve the mandatory overtime rule, it does reveal Respondent's reaction to an employee who refused to work when he was denied permission to take off because no employee was available to replace him. Unlike the Administrative Law Judge, we find that these contact reports deserve to be weighed in determining whether Carter's discharge represented discriminatorily motivated disparate treatment and support the General Counsel's contention.

In addition to the foregoing evidence of disparate treatment, it also is plain that the manner in which Respondent arrived at its decision to discharge Carter is inconsistent with its past practice. Thus, there was no prior investigation or effort to ascertain Carter's version of the events even though Carter was initially suspended pending an investigation. Nor did Respondent review Carter's personnel file. It was Respondent's normal procedure, however, to investigate and review an employee's records before meting out discipline.[3] In this connection, Respondent offered no explanation for its failure to follow its normal procedures.

Even if we were to agree with the Administrative Law Judge's resolution of this allegation, we would disagree with his rationale for excusing Respondent's failure to follow its normal procedures or its failure to explain its actions. The Administrative Law Judge excused Respondent's failings "in light of Respondent's grievance procedure which gave Carter the opportunity, which he did not choose to utilize, of presenting his version to Del Gaudio . . . ." This approach effectively punishes Carter for Respondent's failure to follow its own procedures. But that aside, this rationale cannot be accepted here where Respondent insisted not only that Carter leave the Company's property at once but also threatened to call the police if Carter ever set foot on company property again. These statements were made by Respondent, not in the heat of the events on August 1, but at the time Respondent notified Carter on August 4 that he was being discharged.

Aside from the evidence of disparate treatment and failure to follow normal procedures in arriving at the Carter discipline decision, there is other evidence that undermines any finding that Respondent would have discharged Carter in the absence of his union activities. For example, the record shows that Carter was a skilled forklift mechanic with 7 years of satisfactory performance;[4] that Carter not only played a leading role in the Union's organizing campaign,[5] but also served as chairman of the employees' bargaining committee; and that Respondent was overtly hostile to the Union. Finally, it cannot be overlooked that Bianco, who was assigned to maintain forklift truck 16, was available on August 1, did complete the repair work, and had forklift truck 16 in full operating condition within 2 hours.[6]

In sum, we find that the General Counsel has established that Respondent's discharge of Carter constituted discriminatorily motivated disparate treatment and that Respondent failed to show that it would have discharged Carter in the absence of his protected activities. Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. United States Gypsum Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

contain sufficient facts to demonstrate Respondent's treatment of employees who have violated its mandatory overtime rules. For that reason and because the reports were part of Respondent's own records and are used to formulate a basis for personnel action (see fn. 3, infra), we have considered them here.

[3] Two weeks after Carter's discharge, employee Peter Borm was discharged for refusal to work overtime. The record shows not only that Borm had been warned previously that he would be discharged for future attendance problems, but also that Borm was allowed to give his version of the events and his personnel file was reviewed before Del Gaudio made the decision to discharge Borm. This treatment of Borm contrasts starkly with Carter's treatment.

[4] Carter was congratulated by his foreman as the only employee to move from Class C to Class A mechanic within a 2-year period.

[5] That Respondent recognized Carter's role in the organizing campaign is evident from the remarks of Carter's foreman, Tracy, to employee Bianco to the effect that Carter was instrumental in organizing the Union and bringing it into the plant.

[6] Respondent contended that the repair of forklift truck 16 was of critical importance and that Carter was the only employee capable of repairing it. Although Bianco expressed reservations about his ability to perform the work, he did perform the work and the truck was available on the weekend that preceded the decision to discharge Carter. Respondent's further assertion that it had to call an outside contractor to work on forklift truck 16 because of Carter's refusal to work overtime is tempered by Bianco's testimony (ALJD, sec. III,3,1, at fn. 11) as well as record evidence that Respondent used outside mechanics on many occasions.

We mention Bianco's completion of the repair work not for the purpose of excusing Carter's refusal to work overtime but because it is relevant to the circumstances facing Respondent at the time it decided to discharge Carter. In short, the repair of forklift 16 may well have been of critical importance, but it was performed by the employee who Carter insisted could do the work and these circumstances tend to bring this incident closer to those described by Praeger.

2. United Paperworkers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Union at all times since February 15, 1979, has been, and now is, the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees in the following unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining:

> All production and maintenance employees, including quality control department employees and plant clerical employees employed by Respondent at its Baltimore, Maryland, location, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. By refusing since March 1980, to meet and bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the bargaining unit described above, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. By discharging or otherwise discriminating against James E. Carter because of his interest in, or activity on behalf of, the Union, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has violated the Act in certain respects, we shall order it to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall order Respondent to cease and desist from failing or refusing to bargain concerning rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit. Upon request by said Union, we shall order Respondent to meet and bargain with the Union concerning such terms and conditions of employment and, if an agreement is reached, embody such understanding in a written agreement.

We also shall order Respondent to offer immediate and full reinstatement to James E. Carter, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered by reason of his unlawful discharge by Respondent. Backpay with interest thereon is to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). (See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).)[7]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, United States Gypsum Company, Baltimore, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Failing or refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other terms and conditions of employment, with United Paperworkers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, as the exclusive representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees including quality control department employees and plant clerical employees employed by Respondent at its Baltimore, Maryland, location, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees because of their interest in, or activity on behalf of, a labor organization.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their right to engage in or refrain from engaging in any or all of the activities specified in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, meet and bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described bargaining unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a written signed agreement.

(b) Offer James E. Carter immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered by reason of his unlawful discharge by Respondent in the manner set forth in the section herein entitled "The Remedy."

[7] In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

(c) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Baltimore, Maryland, plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 5, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, concurring in part and dissenting in part:

For the reasons set forth by the Administrative Law Judge, I would find that the General Counsel has failed to establish that the discharge of employee James E. Carter was discriminatorily motivated. Therefore, I would dismiss the allegation that Carter's discharge violated the Act.

I agree with my colleagues, however, that Respondent violated 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to meet and bargain with the Union after March 18, 1981.

[8] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT by failing or refusing to bargain with the United Paperworkers International Union, AFL-CIO, interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of their right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist any labor organization, to bargain through representatives of their own choice, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid and protection, or to refrain from any and all such activities except to the extent permitted by Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against employees because of their interest in, or activity on behalf of, a labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

WE WILL bargain collectively, upon request, with United Paperworkers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, as the exclusive representative of all our employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment, and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees, including quality control department employees and plant clerical employees employed by the Employer at its Baltimore, Maryland, location, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL offer James E. Carter immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered by reason of our unlawful discharge of him, with interest.

UNITED STATES GYPSUM COMPANY

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ARTHUR LEFF, Administrative Law Judge: Upon charges filed by the above-named Union, in Case 5-CA-12049 on March 24, 1980, and in Case 5-CA-12517 on August 14, 1980, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 5, issued separate complaints against United States Gypsum Company, herein called Respondent. The two cases have been consolidated for purposes of hearing. The complaint in Case 5-CA-12049 was issued on May 1, 1980. As amended at the hearing, it alleges in substance that since March 18, 1980, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act by failing and refusing to meet and bargain with and withdrawing recognition from the Union as the certified majority representative of its employees in an appropriate bargaining unit. The complaint in Case 5-CA-12517, issued on September 18, 1980, alleges in substance that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discriminatorily terminating the employment of James E. Carter on or about August 8, 1980, because of his membership in and activities on behalf of the Union. Respondent filed an answer to each of the complaints denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices. The hearing in this consolidated proceeding was held before me at Baltimore, Maryland, on October 27 and 29, 1980. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and by Respondent on December 27, 1980.

Upon the entire record in the case and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, a Delaware corporation, is engaged in its Baltimore, Maryland, location in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of various products, including gypsum wallboard. During the past year, a representative period, Respondent purchased and received directly from points outside the State of Maryland for use at its Baltimore location products valued in excess of $50,000, and also sold and shipped from that location to customers located outside the State of Maryland products valued in excess of that amount. The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and it is found that Respondent is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

United Paperworkers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, herein called the Union, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Respondent's Refusal To Bargain

1. The relevant facts

On February 15, 1979, the Board, in Case 5-RC-10590, certified the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the following unit found to be appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining: All production and maintenance employees, including quality control department employees and plant clerical employees employed by Respondent at its Baltimore, Maryland, location, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Respondent and the Union held their first negotiating meeting on June 15, 1979, and some 17 additional meetings thereafter. Their last meeting was held on January 31, 1980. James A. DelGaudio, the works manager at Respondent's Baltimore location, was Respondent's chief negotiator. John H. O'Brien, an International representative of the Union, was the chief negotiator for the Union. Apparently, very little progress toward reaching an agreement was made by the parties during the 18 bargaining sessions that were held.

On February 12, 1980, 12 days after the last meeting, O'Brien addressed a letter to DelGaudio in which he asked DelGaudio whether he was ready to meet again with the Union and, if so, to let him know on how many days and for how many hours he would be prepared to conduct meetings during the next month. DelGaudio replied by letter, dated February 15, 1980, in which he expressed his willingness to continue negotiations and suggested February 22 as the next meeting date, if convenient to O'Brien. By letter dated February 18, 1980, O'Brien informed DelGaudio that the suggested date was not convenient to him. In his letter, O'Brien further informed DelGaudio that he would be out of the city on a special International union assignment and on vacation from February 26, 1980, through March 16, 1980, and requested that DelGaudio prepare and supply him with a schedule of negotiating dates between March 17, 1980, and April 15, 1980. On February 15, 1980, DelGaudio, in a letter to O'Brien, stated that he had no objection to setting up an advance schedule of multiple meeting dates, but suggested that O'Brien call him when he returned to town so that they might discuss a selection of dates in a more definite manner.

Upon his return to town on March 17, 1980, O'Brien called DelGaudio. DelGaudio was not available that day, but returned O'Brien's call the following morning. There are discrepancies between the respective accounts of O'Brien and DelGaudio as to what was said in their telephone conversation that morning. Based upon my evaluation of the testimony given by each of them and my general impression of their overall credibility as witnesses, I believe, and find, that their conversation was substantially as follows: O'Brien told DelGaudio that he wanted to set up a schedule for further bargaining meetings between Respondent and the Union, and asked DelGaudio to let him know the dates on which he was prepared to meet with the Union and the number of hours that he was willing to allocate to each meeting. DelGaudio replied that he would not at that time stipulate to any further bargaining meeting dates because he wanted first to consult with Respondent's attorneys to obtain their legal advice on the question of whether the Union still occupied a representative status. He told O'Brien that, since writing to him last, he had received comments from employees that they no longer wanted the Union in the plant, and in that connection added, "Furthermore, the employees don't want your big fat ass around here anymore—Even one of your committeemen told me that."[1] O'Brien asked what committeeman had made that remark, but DelGaudio refused to tell him. O'Brien then stated that he intended to get in touch with the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service so that a mediator could set the meeting dates and assist in the negotiations. DelGaudio rejoined that if that was what O'Brien wanted to do it was all right with him. At that point O'Brien hung up the phone.[2] [1] The quoted statement is based on credited testimony given by O'Brien that was not specifically disputed by DelGaudio at the hearing.

Immediately after his March 18 telephone conversation with DelGaudio, O'Brien notified the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service that the Union and Respondent appeared to have reached an impasse in their negotiations, and requested the appointment of a mediator to help the parties resolve their differences. W. J. Dick was designated by the FMCS to act as the mediator in the dispute.

On March 21, Dick telephoned DelGaudio. He informed DelGaudio that he had already spoken with O'Brien and that he was now touching base with DelGaudio to set up mutually agreeable future bargaining meetings. DelGaudio, according to his testimony, informed Dick that he was not refusing to meet with the Union. But he nevertheless declined to agree to any further meeting dates. He told Dick that he had received comments raising the question of whether the Union still had the support of employees in the plant and that he wanted to discuss that question with Respondent's attorneys and have it resolved before responding to the request for further meetings. Dick left his telephone number with DelGaudio and told DelGaudio to be sure to inform him if he decided to meet with the Union. Later that day, Dick telephoned O'Brien and reported to him that DelGaudio had refused to set any future bargaining dates and the reasons that DelGaudio had given for taking that position.

O'Brien testified that he assumed from what Dick told him, as well as from his telephone conversation with DelGaudio on March 18, that Respondent did not intend to engage in any further bargaining with the Union and, therefore, on March 24, 1980, filed the Union's refusal-to-bargain charge in this proceeding.[3]

DelGaudio had no further communication with O'Brien after their telephone conversation on March 18, nor did he have any with the FMCS mediator. DelGaudio testified that on March 26 or 27, after having received a copy of the Union's refusal-to-bargain charge, he consulted with counsel for Respondent, was advised by counsel that Respondent was still under a continuing obligation to bargain with the Union and, in light of that advice, decided that he would again meet with O'Brien for further contract negotiations. He did not, however, inform O'Brien of that "decision." According to DelGaudio, he did not do so because he expected that O'Brien would call him if O'Brien wanted to set a date for a further meeting. I find it difficult, however, to reconcile DelGaudio's testimony in that respect with his admission elsewhere in his testimony that he inferred from the Union's unfair labor practice charge that O'Brien had concluded that Respondent was refusing to meet with the Union. I am satisfied from all the evidence that DelGaudio did not again communicate with O'Brien because he did not wish to set up further bargaining meetings with the Union.

Respondent introduced into evidence two petitions, one dated April 18, 1980, and the other April 23, 1980, containing the apparent but unauthenticated signatures of 67 employees in the bargaining unit in which the signers of the petitions declared that they no longer wished to be represented by the Union. At that time, according to DelGaudio, there were approximately 105 employees in the bargaining unit. DelGaudio testified that he found the first petition on his desk when he came to work on the morning of April 22, 1980, and the other on his desk the following morning. According to DelGaudio, he had no idea how the petitions were circulated or by whom, nor did he know who had placed them on his desk. As appears from DelGaudio's unchallenged testimony, following the receipt of the aforesaid petitions, Respondent, through counsel, notified the Union that it was withdrawing recognition of the Union as the bargaining representative of its employees.

2. Analysis and concluding findings

The facts found above are sufficient in my opinion to support the complaint's allegation that Respondent has failed and refused since March 18, 1980, to meet and bargain with the Union in violation of its statutory obligation to do so.

It is to be observed, to begin with, that Respondent makes no claim that prior to its receipt on April 22, 1980, of the first of the two employee petitions adverted to above, it had a reasonably grounded good-faith doubt of the Union's continuing majority status that would have justified it in withdrawing recognition from the Union.[4] To the contrary, Respondent concedes that, prior to the date of its receipt of that petition, it was under a statutory obligation to meet and bargain in good faith with the Union.

As shown above, it is undisputed that Respondent never complied with the Union's requests for the setting of further bargaining dates after March 17, 1980, initially made by O'Brien in his February 14 letter to DelGaudio, and repeated by him in his March 18 telephone conversation with DelGaudio. It similarly failed and declined to honor the like request of the FMCS mediator made on March 21, 1980.[5] The fact that DelGaudio in his re-

[2] O'Brien's testimony differs from the findings made above in that he initially testified that DelGaudio stated that he was not going to meet with the Union again. On cross-examination, however, O'Brien acknowledged that DelGaudio may not have made that statement in haec verba, but explained that that was the way he interpreted DelGaudio's remarks. DelGaudio's testimony differs from the findings made above principally in this respect: According to his version, their conversation ended with the understanding that O'Brien would also seek legal advice and speak to his "people" about the situation and, after doing so, "we would get back" to DelGaudio. I do not credit DelGaudio's testimony in that respect. There is no reference to any such expressed or implied understanding in a memorandum of his conversation with O'Brien that DelGaudio says he prepared shortly after the conversation occurred. His testimony to the foregoing effect, moreover, is inconsistent with an admission later made by him that it was "never stipulated" in his telephone conversation with O'Brien that O'Brien was to call him again to follow up his (O'Brien's) request for bargaining dates.

[3] The charge alleges, in pertinent part, that since the date of certification, Respondent "refused to bargain in good faith, and as late as 3/21/80 by notification from FMCS to UPIU—continues to refuse to meet and refuses to bargain in good faith."

sponse to these requests did not expressly declare in so many words that Respondent would no longer meet and bargain with the Union does not, of course, preclude a finding of a refusal to bargain. A refusal to meet and bargain, though not expressed, may be inferred from other circumstances. The actions of an employer, or more precisely in this case its inaction, may speak louder than its words. In the instant case, I think that such an inference is clearly warranted from Respondent's subsequent continuing disregard of the requests made of it by the Union and the mediator to set up further meeting dates for the conduct of further negotiations. Respondent's continuing obligation to meet and bargain with the Union was, of course, not affected by the refusal-to-bargain charge that was filed by the Union on March 24. The filing of that charge neither precluded further bargaining nor excused Respondent of its failure to cooperate with the Union in setting up further meeting dates for the continuation of negotiations.

Respondent contends that, when DelGaudio spoke to O'Brien on March 18 and to the mediator on March 21, he was justified, in the light of the comments he had been receiving about antiunion sentiment in the plant, in withholding the scheduling of any further negotiating sessions with the Union until he had an opportunity to obtain legal advice from counsel as to whether, in Respondent's words, "he could in fact, continue to bargain." In view of subsequent events, DelGaudio's good faith in asserting this as his reason for not then complying with O'Brien's and the mediator's request for further meeting dates is open to question. However, assuming arguendo that DelGaudio's initially asserted reason for deferring such compliance was a valid and justifiable one, the same cannot be said of his continued failure, after having been advised by counsel on March 26 or 27 of Respondent's continuing obligation to bargain, to notify the Union that Respondent was now ready and willing to stipulate with it on a mutually satisfactory date for the resumption of negotiations. For reasons previously indicated, I am unable to credit DelGaudio's explanation that he refrained from contacting the Union to set up a further bargaining meeting because he expected O'Brien to contact him if he wanted a further bargaining meeting. O'Brien had already made clear to DelGaudio in his February 14 letter and in the March 18 telephone conversation that the Union did want further meetings with Respondent. And the unfair labor practice charge filed by the Union on March 24 made it unmistakably clear that the Union considered Respondent derelict in not having met its earlier request for such meeting dates. For like reasons, I am unable to agree with Respondent's further argument that the burden was on the Union to contact Respondent, rather than the other way around, and that no 8(a)(5) violation may be found in this case because of the absence of evidence of any subsequent union request for bargaining and of a refusal of such a request by Respondent. Here the Union had already made its request for further meeting dates, and Respondent, according to its own position, had simply deferred responding to that request until it had an opportunity to consult with counsel. In these circumstances, I believe it apparent that it was incumbent on Respondent to contact the Union after receiving the legal advice it claimed it needed, and not for the Union to continue to press Respondent for a response to its outstanding request. Respondent's failure to do so unmistakably evidences an unwillingness on its part to meet and bargain with the Union and is supportive of an inference to that effect.

Accordingly, I conclude and find that Respondent, by refusing to meet and bargain with the Union since March 18, 1980, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Absent Respondent's continuing unlawful refusal to bargain, as just found, I would have viewed the employee petitions, which were received by Respondent on April 22 and 23, 1980, and which were apparently signed by a majority of the unit employees, as having provided Respondent with a sufficient basis for doubting the Union's continuing majority status and, therefore, sanctioning its withdrawal of recognition from the Union after its receipt of those petitions. However, I consider Respondent's prior unlawful refusal to bargain on March 18 continuing thereafter without interruption as an unfair labor practice of a sufficiently serious nature to taint the employee petitions and to preclude Respondent from relying upon them as a basis for withdrawing recognition from the Union.[6] Accordingly, and in line with well-established Board precedent in situations of this kind,[7] I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, not only by its continuing refusal since March 18, 1980, to meet and bargain with the Union, but also by its affirmative withdrawal of recognition of the Union as well.

B. The Alleged Discriminatory Discharge of James E. Carter

1. The relevant facts

James E. Carter was employed by Respondent for a period of more than 7 years prior to his discharge on August 4, 1980. He started as a Class C mechanic, advanced to a Class A mechanic in less than 2 years, and during his last 4-1/2 years worked as a mobile mechanic. Respondent does not question his skill as a mechanic. Nor does it make any claim that his overall work record was unsatisfactory. The only reason given by Respondent for his discharge is that he refused on August 1, 1980, to obey a supervisor's order to work overtime on a specific job. Carter was the first employee ever disstcle Paper Supply Company, Inc., 251 NLRB 1423 (1980). And see also Sec. 204(a)(2) and (3) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947. The Supreme Court in N.L.R.B. v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149, 152 (1956), equated the statutory duty under Sec. 204(a)(1) of the Act with the duty to bargain in good faith under Sec. 8(a)(5) and 8(d). The duties under Sec. 204(a)(2) and (3) are similarly equatable with the bargaining obligations of an employer under Secs. 8(a)(5) and 8(d).

[6] Although the parties were apparently still far apart in their negotiations, it cannot be presumed that, even if Respondent after March 18 had bargained in good faith with the Union under the aegis of a mediator, no agreement would have been reached. Nor can it be presumed that if such good-faith bargaining had occurred, even without a contract being reached, a majority of the unit employees would nevertheless have determined to discontinue their support of the Union.

charged by Respondent for refusing to work overtime, although shortly after the filing of the charge in the instant case Respondent did discharge another employee for that reason. The General Counsel does not dispute that Carter refused to work overtime on August 1, but contends that Respondent would not have discharged him for that reason had it not been motivated to do so because of his union activities.

Carter had played a leading role in the organizational campaign that led to the Union's certification on February 15, 1979, as the collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's production and maintenance employees at its Baltimore plant. He served on the Union's organizing committee and was one of the two employees most instrumental in obtaining union designation cards from employees. Following the Union's certification, he served as the chairman of the employees' bargaining committee, and in that capacity participated in all of the 18 bargaining sessions that were held prior to Respondent's unlawful refusal to meet and bargain further with the Union, as found in the preceding section of this Decision. Prior to that time, also, the Union had filed on Carter's behalf two unfair labor practice charges, one alleging a discriminatory 3-day suspension resulting from his attendance at the representation hearing, and the other alleging a discriminatory refusal to promote and transfer him to a more desirable position. Both of these charges, however, were either dismissed or withdrawn. Carter's leadership role in organizing the Union was admittedly well known to Respondent's management. About 6 months prior to Carter's discharge, Fred Tracy, who was Carter's foreman, in a conversation with a new employee (Sam Bianco) about the Union, pointed to Carter who was then leaving the room and remarked, "That's the nigger that got the Union organized, him and a guy named Buck."

As a mobile mechanic, Carter's job function was to service Respondent's forklift trucks and maintain them in a state of repair. At the time material herein, another mobile mechanic, Sam Bianco, who had been with Respondent a relatively short time and was not as skilled as Carter, also performed the same functions. When there was extra work to be done, as was often the case, Respondent would utilize outside mechanics on a contract basis. Respondent had 11 forklift trucks, 6 small ones and 5 large ones. Separate trucks were specifically assigned to Carter and to Bianco for routine servicing, but either of them could be called upon to perform work on a truck assigned to the other when circumstances so required. The large trucks were needed for certain essential plant operations that could not be performed by the smaller trucks. The absolute minimum number of the larger forklift trucks needed for full plant operations was three.

On Thursday, July 31, Respondent was confronted with the following situation with respect to its large forklift trucks. Two of the large trucks, Truck No. 4 (which was routinely serviced by Carter) and Truck No. 16 (which was routinely serviced by Bianco) were nonoperational. Truck No. 4 had been out of commission for some time with serious engine and transmission problems. Truck No. 16 had become inoperable on Tuesday of that week with a burnt-out electric harness. Of the remaining large forklift trucks, one had trouble with its brakes—after an hour or two of service, it had to be shut off to allow the brakes to cool off. The other two trucks that were operational also had defects that made their continued use without breakdown uncertain. Respondent's operations are conducted on a 24-hour-a-day, 7-day-a-week basis, and Respondent was anxious to get one of its big trucks that had been out of use back into operation by the weekend.

On Tuesday, July 29, when the electric harness on Truck No. 16 burned out, Respondent ordered a new harness from a local Hyster dealer, but found when it arrived on Thursday that it was not suitable for that truck. At the instruction of Plant Engineer William Lammeree, Carter attempted to replace the burnt-out electric harness on Truck No. 16 with the harness from Truck No. 4, but found that it could not be used on that truck. Later that day, Lammeree had a telephone conversation with a Hyster parts dealer in York, Pennsylvania, who told Lammeree that he could obtain a suitable harness, but that it would not be available at his shop until 1 p.m. on Friday. Lammeree told the York dealer that he would have one of Respondent's employees pick it up at that time. Carter was present during Lammeree's telephone conversation with the York dealer. Following that conversation, Lammeree told Carter that the harness would arrive at Respondent's plant at or about 2:30 or 3 p.m. on Friday and that Carter should expect to stay on to install it even if it meant working overtime. Carter did not say anything and gave no indication at that time that he would not be able to work overtime on Friday.[8]

On August 1, Carter worked all day without taking a break repairing the engine on Forklift No. 4, and by 3 p.m., his normal quitting time, had successfully completed that job. Truck No. 4, however, was still not in an operable condition because oil had started to leak out of the transmission due to a faulty job that had been performed by an outside contractor. After showing Lammeree the work he had done on Truck No. 4, Carter left the shop to punch out shortly after 3 p.m.

At or about the same time, Sam Bianco, who had been sent to York to pick up the electric harness, returned to the shop. Lammeree approached Carter, who was then in the process of punching out, and told him that the harness had arrived and that he wanted him to install it.

[8] The foregoing findings are based on Lammeree's credited testimony which was corroborated by Wilbur D. Lane, Respondent's service department superintendent, who was also present when Lammeree had his conversation with the York dealer. Carter admitted that he was present during this telephone conversation and that he assisted him in identifying the type of harness that was needed. His testimony was inconsistent, however, concerning as to whether he was told he would be expected to work overtime. Initially, he testified that nothing was said to him on that subject. Later, he admitted that Lammeree did tell him that day before Lammeree made his call to the York dealer that it might be necessary for him to work overtime on Friday, but he testified that this had reference to the completion of his work on the engine of Truck No. 4, the job to which he was assigned on Friday, and had nothing to do with the installation of the harness on Truck No. 16. As the specific subject under consideration at that time involved obtaining a harness for Truck No. 16, and Carter earlier that day had performed related work on that truck, I find Lammeree's version more plausible. Lammaree, by his overall testimony, impressed me as a forthright and careful witness.

Carter told Lammeree that he had already done a full day's work; that he had an appointment he wanted to keep; that Lammeree had another mechanic there who could do the job; and that he should have him install the harness. Lammeree, in an attempt to accommodate Carter, spoke to Bianco about installing the harness, but was told by Bianco that he doubted that he would be able to perform that work correctly, explaining that he had had a similar job assignment once before but had been unable to complete it without Carter's aid. Lammeree then went to the locker room where Carter was in the process of changing his clothes, informed Carter what Bianco had said to him, and told Carter to come back to the shop and meet him at the forklift truck. Carter did come back to the shop. Lammeree again instructed him to stay overtime to install the harness, stating that he was needed for that purpose. Carter inquired whether he would receive report-in pay for punching back in (4 hours' guaranteed pay). Lammeree told him he would not.[9] Carter then again told Lammeree that he could not stay on as he had an important appointment he wanted to keep. Lammeree again instructed Carter to remain and perform the job, but Carter refused and left the plant. According to a written report of the incident, submitted by Lammeree to his supervisor and received in evidence without objection by the General Counsel, Carter, before leaving, complained about the way the Company treated its employees and also stated that he did not care if the Company suspended him for a day or a week for leaving.[10]

After Carter left, Bianco remained in the shop to install the harness. Bianco, who is still in Respondent's employ and who impressed me as an honest witness, testified that he completed his work on the installation of the wiring harness ard had the truck in full operating condition by 5:30 p.m. that day. I credit his testimony.[11]

Immediately following Carter's refusal to work overtime, Lammeree reported his version of the incident to his immediate supervisor, Engineering Superintendent Barry Sharesky, and also to Personnel Superintendent James Booth. The incident was then reported to Workers Manager James DelGaudio, the only person authorized to discharge empoyees. Lammeree recommended that Carter be immediately suspended pending further investigation as to why Carter had refused to stay overtime to work on the truck. His recommendation was approved by DelGaudio. Lammeree telephoned Carter that evening and told him not to come to work the next day (Carter was scheduled to work that Saturday) and not to return to the plant until further notified.

On Monday, August 4, 1980, Carter was summoned to the plant for a meeting with Lammeree and Personnel Superintendent Booth. Booth told Carter that they were making Lammaree his supervisor so that Lammeree could inform him of the decision that had been reached concerning the disciplinary action to be taken against him. Lammeree then informed Carter that he was being terminated for gross misconduct and insubordination in refusing to obey Lammeree's instruction to work overtime on the No. 16 forklift the preceding Friday. Booth then told Carter that Lammeree and the assistant personnel manager would accompany Carter to the shop so that he could get his tools and other personal belongings; that Carter was then to leave the company property at once; and that they would call the police if he ever set foot on company property again.[12]

The decision to discharge Carter was made by DelGaudio. DelGaudio admittedly did not receive any recommendation from anyone below him that he take that action. Lammeree's only recommendation was that Carter be suspended pending investigation. Contrary to the usual practice, no independent investigation was conducted by the department superintendent and no effort was made to obtain Carter's version of the incident before the discharge decision was made. DelGaudio, when asked, was unable to say why the usual procedure was not followed in Carter's case. He did explain, however, that Respondent has a grievance procedure that allows an employee against whom disciplinary action is taken by a foreman to take up and discuss any complaint he may have with the department superintendent and then the works manager. Carter's testimony shows that he was aware of that procedure. His explanation for not requesting a meeting with DelGaudio was that he thought it would be useless, and particularly so since he had been told that the police would be called if he ever set foot on the premises again.[13]

DelGaudio's testimony indicates that in arriving at his decision to discharge Carter, he did not bother to review Carter's personnel record to determine whether Carter had ever been previously disciplined or warned for refusing to work overtime (in point of fact, Carter had not). Nor did he take into account Carter's length of service, competency as an employee, past work record, and other matters that normally would be considered in determining whether discharge action is warranted. When asked what considerations he did take into account, DelGaudio testified as follows:

[9] According to Carter's undenied testimony there had been occasions in the past prior to the advent of the Union when he and other employees were allowed report-in pay when called back to work after they had punched out even though they were not still on plant premises. Under Respondent's then-current policy, however, employees were not entitled to report-in pay if called back to work while still on plant premises. During the negotiations, the Union had sought to have Respondent change its policy in that respect.

[10] The findings in this paragraph are based in the main upon the credited testimony of Lammeree. Carter's testimony does not differ substantially from Lammeree's except in two respects. Lammeree's testimony makes no mention, one way or the other, about Carter stating on Friday that he had an important appointment he wanted to keep. Lammeree also testified that he could not recall Carter saying anything about call-in pay. Carter's testimony with respect to these two items was corroborated by Bianco and is credited.

[11] Respondent asserted at the hearing that because of Carter's failure to work overtime, it became necessary for Respondent to call in an outside mechanic to check and service the truck. According to the documentary evidence introduced by Respondent to support that assertion, the only work done by the outside mechanic was the straightening out of two wires and the replacement of a voltage regulator, a part that Bianco credibly testified he had alreaqy replaced.

[12] Following Carter's discharge, Respondent utilized outside mechanics on a contract basis for a period of aoout 2 to 3 weeks to perform the work that Carter normally would have performed.

[13] Carter's testimony shows that he did thereafter talk to Bianco on the telephone, but did not ask for a meeting with DelGaudio.

> I reviewed the entire incident with Mr. Lammeree, Mr. Lammeree's supervisor and Mr. Booth. I weighed all the facts that were presented to me. The decision to discharge from the facts presented to me were that Mr. Carter was made aware 24 hours ahead of time that he would have to work on this particular job. At that time he gave no indication that he would not be able to work. It was an absolute necessity that that piece of equipment be running and Mr. Carter was the only one who could do the job. Mr. Lammeree, his supervisor, instructed him to do that job and in spite of this, Mr. Carter refused to work the overtime and walked off the job.

DelGaudio testified that in view of Respondent's mandatory overtime policy he considered Carter's refusal to obey Lammeree's instructions in these circumstances to be gross misconduct and insubordination warranting discharge.

The record shows that Respondent has a mandatory overtime policy under which employees may be required to work overtime without their consent when directed to do so by their supervisors. That policy, however, has not been strictly applied. Thus, when an employee is told to work overtime by his supervisor and presents a reason for not being able to do so, the supervisor will normally try to get another employee to perform the overtime work or make some other accommodation to take care of the situation. Prior to the August 1 incident, Carter himself on a number of occasions had requested to be relieved of overtime work because of other things he had to do, and his requests had been granted. Gene Prager, a mechanic presently employed by Respondent, who had serviced forklifts under Lammeree's supervision for about a year until he was transferred to another position, testified without contradiction that there had been a number of occasions, including one occasion when two of the larger and one of the smaller forklifts were down, when he had refused Lammeree's demand to work overtime and had walked off the job, without having had disciplinary action taken against him. His testimony indicates, however, that each time he had stated that he had a reason, without specifying what it was, for not being able to work overtime. He also conceded that he was never faced with a situation where he had walked off the job after his supervisor had instructed him to remain regardless of his reason for not wanting to do so. Concerning his own understanding of Respondent's mandatory overtime policy, Carter testified as follows:

> Q. Mr. Carter, you know you could be disciplined for refusing to work overtime, correct?
> A. If on any job, if a person came up, a supervisor came up and told you you had to work over and you just like that say no, and then walk out, sure that's grounds for disciplinary action.

Carter also testified that:

> If you were told to work over, it was considered mandatory if the supervisor told ahead of time.

DelGaudio admitted that he was not personally aware of anyone in the history of the plant who, prior to Carter's discharge, had ever been terminated for refusing to work overtime. In May 1977, one employee, John Campbell, had been given a 3-day disciplinary suspension for refusing to work overtime.[14] So far as this record shows, Campbell was the only employee prior to Carter's discharge against whom any disciplinary action (excluding warnings) had been taken for refusing to obey a supervisor's order to work overtime. The General Counsel subpenaed from Respondent its documentary records (contact reports), covering the 3-year period prior to Carter's discharge relating to all incidents in which employees had been brought up by their supervisors on charges for refusing to work overtime or similar conduct. He introduced into evidence four such contact reports, seemingly all that there were. Three of these contact reports related to incidents that occurred prior to September 1979 when DelGaudio became the works manager. In each of them the employee involved was simply given a warning for having refused to work overtime and walking off the job, contrary to his supervisor's instruction. The fourth contact report, dated April 20, 1980, involved an employee, Frank Bowerson, who had called his supervisor to request permission not to report for work that day because he wanted to take a trip with his father, was denied such permission on the ground that there was no one available to replace him, but stayed out anyway. The employee was given a 1-day suspension.

Following Carter's termination, Respondent did discharge an employee (Peter Born) for refusal to work overtime. That discharge occurred on August 21, 1980, about 10 days after the filing of the unfair labor practice charge in this case. Born was discharged for leaving his job at his regular quitting time because he wanted to pick up his wife at her place of work.[15] Born, it appears from his personnel file, had on a prior occasion been warned that he would be discharged for future attendance problems. His personnel file was reviewed by DelGaudio before he made his discharge decision. DelGaudio admittedly did not even refer to Carter's personnel file. Moreover, Born, prior to his discharge, was contacted by his department superintendent and allowed to give his version of the events, a practice that DelGaudio admitted was normally followed, but was not in Carter's case.

2. Analysis and concluding findings

On the facts of this case, I believe it clear enough that Carter's refusal to work overtime, contrary to his supervisor's instruction and in violation of Respondent's mandatory overtime rule, constituted insubordinate conduct on his part for which he could have been legitimately disciplined. Prior to Carter's discharge, no employee had been discharged by Respondent for violation of that rule. The question left to be decided, as I see it, boils down to this: Would Respondent have meted out that ultimate disciplinary penalty to Carter but for his union activities? Basically, although perhaps not entirely, it is the General Counsel's position that Respondent's discharge of Carter was violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) because it constituted discriminatorily motivated disparate treatment of him. Respondent, on the other hand, argues that the General Counsel has failed to make even a prima facie showing to support an inference that Carter's union activities were a motivating factor in its discharge decision; that no adverse inference based on disparate treatment is justified by the evidence in this record; and that, in view of the circumstances involved in Carter's refusal to work overtime, Respondent would have discharged Carter even in the absence of his union activities.

[14] Campbell was called as a witness by the General Counsel. His testimony discloses that he had been instructed by his supervisor to work overtime 10 minutes before his regular quitting time, that he had refused to do so stating that he had to pick up his wife at her job, and that he had rejected the department superintendent's suggestion that he return to work after driving his wife home. On a subsequent occasion when Campbell had again refused to work overtime and had walked out, he was only given a warning.

[15] Born's reason for refusing to work overtime appears to be similar to the one given by John Campbell who, as earlier noted, was given a 3-day suspension and on a subsequent occasion only a warning for again refusing to work overtime. The Campbell incidents occurred before DelGaudio became works manager.

There are undoubtedly circumstances present in this case that may give rise to a suspicion that Carter would not have been discharged but for the prominent role he had played in the Union's organizational and other activities at Respondent's plant prior to Respondent's refusal to bargain. More suspicion, however, is not enough to support an 8(a)(3) allegation. The law requires supporting evidence of a substantial nature. Although my conclusion in this respect may not be free from doubt, I am not convinced that the evidence in this case is sufficiently substantial to support a finding of discriminatorily motivated disparate treatment, or to support an 8(a)(3) violation finding on any other ground.

It is noted, to begin with, that the evidence in this record that might support an inference of antiunion motivation is weak at best. Such an inference may possibly be drawn from Respondent's unlawful refusal to bargain and the derogatory remark made by Foreman Tracy to Bianco about 6 months before Carter's discharge. But whatever force that evidence might otherwise have is largely diminished in this case by other considerations. Thus, there is no indication that Respondent engaged in any independent 8(a)(1) violations since the advent of the Union on Respondent's scene. What is more important, the record reveals nothing of significance in the timing of Carter's discharge. So far as appears from this record, neither the Union nor Carter had engaged in any union activities at Respondent's plant since Respondent's withdrawal of its recognition of the Union, some 5 months before Carter's discharge. And in view of the pendency of the unfair labor practice case based on the 8(a)(5) charge, and the likelihood that it would be fought by Respondent, if it lost, up through the court of appeals, there was little prospect at the time of Carter's discharge of any revival of the Union's activity at Respondent's plant for a considerable time to come. It is also worthy of note in that connection, although alone by no means controlling, that although Respondent was admittedly aware of Carter's prominent role in union activities for 2-1/2 years prior to his discharge, there is nothing in this record to show that any unlawful discriminatory action was taken against him during that period.

As noted above, the major question here is not whether Respondent had a legitimate basis for disciplining Carter for his refusal to work overtime—clearly it had—but whether the discharge penalty meted out to him for that offense constituted discriminatory disparate treatment. Respondent, so far as this record shows, had no fixed policy with regard to the degree of discipline, if any, that was to be imposed on employees for violating its mandatory overtime or other rules. It was free to base the severity of its discipline upon its assessment of the seriousness of the misconduct involved, so long as it did not take into account considerations that were unlawful under the Act.

In the case of Carter, it cannot be said that Respondent had no justifiable reason, at least from its point of view, for regarding Carter's refusal to work overtime on August 1, 1980, as gross misconduct and insubordination. Respondent considered it of critical importance to its operations to have the electric harness installed in forklift Truck No. 16 as soon as possible. Its fleet of large trucks was in bad condition, with two trucks completely down, one operable only part of the time, and the others in danger of breaking down. If Truck No. 16 were not repaired and another truck were to break down it would have resulted in a curtailment of Respondent's weekend operations. Carter, as his own testimony shows, was made aware by Lammeree the preceding day of the importance of having one of the disabled trucks brought into operable condition by Friday afternoon. He was given 24 hours' advance notice that he would be required to work overtime on Friday, August 1. He was also aware, after Bianco expressed uncertainty as to his ability to install the electric harness, that he (Carter) was the only mechanic available at the time to perform the job. Nevertheless, he refused to work overtime and walked off the job, contrary to his supervisor's direct instructions and in violation of Respondent's mandatory overtime rule.

The law is clear that, prior to drawing an adverse inference based on disparate treatment, a basis for comparing the underlying incidents must be established. Soldier Creek Coal Company, a Division of California Portland Cement Co., 243 NLRB 456, 462 (1980). With the aim of establishing disparity of treatment, the General Counsel called two witnesses, John Praeger and John Campbell, and also introduced into evidence four contact reports from Respondent's personnel records covering the 3-year period prior to Carter's discharge. As appears from the findings made above, although Praeger testified that while working as a mobile mechanic under Lammeree he had refused to work overtime on a number of occasions without being disciplined therefore, he admitted that he had never been faced with a situation, such as was true in Carter's case, where he was expressly directed by his supervisor to work overtime regardless of his stated reason for not wanting do so. In short, Praeger's testimony discloses that his refusals were always with at least the tacit acquiescence of his supervisor, and, therefore, not comparable to Carter's refusal here in question.

Campbell's refusal to work overtime, for which he received a 3-day disciplinary suspension, differs from Carter's, in that Campbell was given only 10 minutes' advance notice and there were others available to do the work, as well as for other reasons indicated in the footnote set out above relating to his suspension. The contact reports in evidence, to which reference has been made above, show that prior to the time DelGaudio became works manager three employees were simply warned for refusing to work overtime, two because they did not want to stay beyond their regular quitting time, and one because he had a part-time job to go to.[16] The contact reports in evidence upon which the General Counsel relies to show disparate treatment do not contain all the relevant facts surrounding the various incidents involved such as: whether or not the employee given the warning had received advance notice that he would have to stay over; whether or not others were available to do the overtime work he was instructed to perform; and whether or not the overtime work was considered critical to plant operations. The contact reports in evidence, therefore, do not provide a sufficient basis for comparison with Carter's situation to support a finding that Respondent's discharge of Carter constituted disciminatory disparate treatment. I so find.

In reaching my conclusion that this record does not support an 8(a)(3) finding, I have not ignored the General Counsel's further argument that Respondent's precipitous action in discharging Carter, without any prior investigation or effort to ascertain Carter's version of the events and without so much as reviewing Carter's personnel file, constitutes evidence of pretext. But in the light of Respondent's grievance procedure which gave Carter the opportunity, which he did not choose to utilize, of presenting his version to DelGaudio, I do not think that the absence of a prior investigation and deviation from other normal procedures is enough in this case without proof of disparate treatment to support an inference that Carter's discharge was unlawfully motivated. Were I sitting on this case as an arbitrator, I might well have viewed the discharge discipline meted out to Carter for his refusal to work overtime, his first offense of that kind, as too harsh a penalty, considering his admitted skill as a mechanic and his 7 years of apparently satisfactory service as an employee. But under the applicable evidentiary standards and principles of law by which I am bound, and notwithstanding the circumstances giving rise to suspicion, I am impelled to conclude that on the record made in that case the General Counsel has not met his burden of establishing by a fair preponderance of credible evidence that Respondent would not have discharged Carter for his insubordinate refusal to work overtime, but for his union activities.

Accordingly, I shall recommend dismissal of the complaint's 8(a)(3) and (1) allegations in Case 5-CA-12517.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. United States Gypsum Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. United Paperworkers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Union at all times since February 15, 1979, has been, and now is, the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees in the following unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining:

> All production and maintenance employees, including quality control department employees and plant clerical employees employed by Respondent at its Baltimore, Maryland, location, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined by the Act.

4. By refusing since March 18, 1980, to meet and bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the bargaining unit described above, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. Respondent has not, as alleged in the complaint in Case 5-CA-12517, engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices proscribed by Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and from any like or related unfair labor practices, and that it take the affirmative action provided for in the recommended Order below, which I find necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

Pursuant to authority granted it by the National Labor Relations Board under Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a three-member panel has considered objections to an election held February 26, 1981,[1] and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of same. The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief[2] and hereby adopts the Regional Director's findings and recommendations.

We agree with the Regional Director that the Petitioner made no material misrepresentations which warrant setting aside the election. We also find, for the reasons set forth below, that the electioneering conducted by the Petitioner's agents during the balloting was insufficient to warrant an inference that it interfered with the exercise of the employees' free choice.[3]

The balloting took place in a room, herein the polling place, located on the ground floor of the Employer's Building #2. The entrance to the polling place was approximately 10 feet up a corridor[4] from a set of glass-paneled doors opening to the Employer's parking lot. Through these doors, a person standing in the parking lot could view the corridor, the entrance to the polling place, and parts of the polling place itself. The Employer presented evidence that, during the balloting, agents of the Petitioner passed out a campaign leaflet and spoke to employees as they entered both the main entrance to the building and the glass-paneled doors on their way to vote or work. The Employer also presented evidence that, as the line of employees waiting to vote backed up to the glass-paneled doors, which were closed, the Petitioner's agents peered through the doors and continued to pass out literature and talk to entering employees.

It is the Board's province and duty to safeguard its electoral processes from conduct which inhibits the free exercise of employee choice. In carrying out this duty, "the Board is extremely zealous in preventing conduct which intrudes upon the actual conduct of its elections." Claussen Baking Company, 134 NLRB 111 (1964). Thus, the Board prohibits electioneering "at or near the polls."[5] And, as means of enforcing this ban against electioneering, the Board will set aside an election on the basis of any prolonged conversations between a representative of a party to the election and employees waiting in line to vote, without inquiring into the nature of the conversation itself, Milchem Inc., 170 NLRB 362 (1968).[6] Such prohibitions, of course, are not required by the Act. Rather, they have been devised by the Board under its authority to regulate its own election procedures and serve to eliminate the unfair advantage gained by last-minute electioneering and pressure as well as to minimize the distraction and interference which result therefrom. As the Board stated in Milchem, "[t]he final minutes before an employee casts his vote should be his own, as free from interference as possible."

Nevertheless, the Board does not apply its "no electioneering" rules to set aside elections whenever electioneering takes place "at or near the polls," regardless of the circumstances. While the Board seeks to establish election conditions as ideal as possible, "elections must be appraised realistically and practically, and should not be judged against theoretically ideal, but nevertheless artificial, standards."[7] A representation election is often the climax of an emotional, hard-fought campaign and it is unrealistic to expect parties or employees to refrain totally from any and all types of electioneering in the vicinity of the polls.[8]

When faced with evidence of impermissible electioneering, the Board determines whether the conduct, under the circumstances, "is sufficient to warrant an inference that it interfered with the free

[1] The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election. The tally was: 69 for and 66 against, the Petitioner. There were no challenged ballots.

[2] The Employer has requested oral argument. This request is hereby denied as the record, the exceptions, and the brief adequately present the issues and positions of the parties.

[3] Our determination herein is based on the evidence presented by the Employer during the investigation of the objection, which we have assumed to be true and which has not been disputed. A hearing is, therefore, unnecessary.

[6] The Employer does not contend that the election herein should be set aside on the basis of the strict Milchem rule, though it does argue that the Milchem principles should be applied here.

[7] The Liberal Market, Inc., 108 NLRB 1481, 1482 (1954). While Liberal Market involved the effect of antecedent conduct upon a Board election, the standard is equally applicable to allegations of improper electioneering.

choice of the voters."[9] This determination involves a number of factors. The Board considers not only whether the conduct occurred within or near the polling place, but also the extent and nature of the alleged electioneering,[10] and whether it is conducted by a party to the election or by employees.[11] The Board has also relied on whether the electioneering is conducted within a designated "no electioneering" area[12] or contrary to the instructions of the Board agent.[13]

Under the circumstances of this case, we find the evidence of electioneering presented by the Employer insufficient to warrant an inference that it interfered with the exercise of the employees' free choice. It is undisputed that the electioneering was conducted away from the polling place and was not directed at employees waiting in line to vote. The area immediately outside the glass-paneled doors had not been designated a "no-electioneering"[14] area and the electioneering did not violate any instructions by the Board agent. Most significantly, voters standing in line to vote were separated from the electioneering by the set of doors, which remained closed during the balloting. Thus, while the entrance to the polling place was only 10 feet from the glass-paneled doors and, at times, the line of voters backed up to those doors, the voters, once in the corridor, were insulated from the electioneering. Accordingly, we shall overrule the objection and certify the Petitioner.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

It is hereby certified that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for General Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of Brockton & Vicinity, Local Union No. 653, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, and that, pursuant to Section 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the foregoing labor organization is the exclusive representative of all the employees in the following appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by the Employer at its Plymouth, Massachusetts location excluding quality control employees, technical employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Local Union 148T, AFL–CIO–CLC (Leshner Corporation) and Deborah Susan Blaydes. Case 9–CB–4312

January 20, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On July 8, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Elbert D. Gadsden issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

We disagree with the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by failing to represent fairly employee Deborah Blaydes.

On April 18, 1979, Blaydes was involved in separate physical altercations during worktime—one with employee Charlene Lewis, the other with employee Connie Butterly. All three employees were fired pursuant to an employer rule against fighting. Thereafter, Blaydes and Lewis filed grievances.

The Administrative Law Judge found that, at the first-step grievance meeting, Plant Manager Paul Moritz stated that the Employer was willing to reinstate Blaydes but not Lewis. The record indicates that the Employer's position was based on its belief that Blaydes had not been the aggressor in either fight and merely had defended herself. The Administrative Law Judge also found that the Respondent's officials, particularly Mary Shirley, financial secretary, responded to the Employer's "offer" by insisting that it was company policy to discharge all employees involved in a fight or none and, therefore, both grievants should be reinstated or neither. At the second grievance meeting, Moritz again stated that the Employer would reinstate Blaydes, but not Lewis, whom Moritz termed a "troublemaker." The Respondent's representatives again insisted that both grievants or neither be reinstated. Because Lewis could not attend the second-step meeting, a third meeting was held so that she could give her version of the events. During that meeting, George Meyer, the Respondent's business representative, requested that both Blaydes and Lewis be reinstated, with Mary Shirley adding that the Employer should reinstate both grievants if it were going to reinstate one. Harold Carpenter, plant supervisor, replied that he would have brought Blaydes back but that "now" he would "have to take it to the Company." Subsequently, the Respondent was notified in writing that both grievances were denied. The Respondent did not process either grievance to arbitration.

The Administrative Law Judge concluded, without supplying a rationale, that the Respondent's refusal to accept the Employer's "offer" to reinstate Blaydes, but not Lewis, and its "squeeze play" of insisting that both employees be reinstated or neither constituted a breach of its duty of fair representation to Blaydes. He further concluded that, having rejected the Employer's "offer," the Respondent's failure to take Blaydes' grievance to arbitration was arbitrary and likewise a breach of its duty of fair representation.

A union breaches its statutory duty of fair representation when its conduct toward a member of the collective-bargaining unit is arbitrary, discriminatory, or in bad faith.[1] There is no evidence or contention that the Respondent's actions regarding Blaydes' grievance were the result of bad faith or hostility toward Blaydes. Nor is there any evidence of disparate treatment. To the contrary, the Respondent, in processing the grievances, argued that both Blaydes and Lewis should be reinstated. Finally, it cannot be said that the Respondent, having decided to process the grievances, did so in a perfunctory manner, for it actively advocated its position. The only issue in this case, therefore, is whether the Respondent, by taking the position that it took and then abandoning Blaydes' grievance short of arbitration, acted arbitrarily. Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, we find that it did not.

There is nothing in the record to indicate that the Respondent's position that both Blaydes and Lewis be reinstated or neither was anything other than a good-faith, honest attempt to secure the reinstatement of both grievants. The Respondent also owed a duty of fair representation to Lewis. We see no reason why its duty to represent Blaydes fairly and act as her advocate required it to accept the Employer's offer to reinstate Blaydes at the expense of Lewis' continued employment.[2] The Board has held that a union "has a wide range of discretion in serving the unit it represents"[3] and the Respondent's response to the Employer's "offer," a response which sought to obtain the reinstatement of both grievants, certainly falls within that discretion. The Respondent's position was based on the Employer's policy of discharging all employees involved in a fight, or none, and, therefore, it cannot be said to be arbitrary or based on irrelevant considerations. Moreover, while the position taken by the Respondent resulted ultimately in the denial of Blaydes' grievance, it is only through hindsight that the Respondent's good-faith attempts to secure the reinstatement of both Blaydes and Lewis can be called into question.

Nor did the Respondent's failure to arbitrate Blaydes' grievance violate its duty of fair representation. Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, the mere fact that the Respondent refused to accept the Employer's offer to reinstate Blaydes but not Lewis did not obligate it to process Blaydes' grievance to arbitration. Rather where, as here, a union undertakes to process a grievance but decides to abandon the grievance short of arbitration, the finding of a violation again turns on whether the union's disposition of the grievance was arbitrary or motivated by ill will or other invidious considerations.[4] There is no evidence that the Respondent's failure to invoke arbitration was based on animosity, discrimination towards Blaydes,[5] or irrelevant considerations. Also, the record establishes that, following the denial of the grievances, a discussion on their merits took place during the Respondent's July 1979 union meeting.[6] Thus, this is not a case where a union, having undertaken to process a grievance, abandoned it without reason or merely at the whim of someone exercising union authority.[7] We therefore find that the Respondent did not arbitrarily dispose of Blaydes' grievance and shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the complaint herein be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Elbert D. Gadsden, Administrative Law Judge: Upon unfair labor practice charges filed in Case 9-CB-4312 on August 6, 1979, by Deborah Susan Blaydes, an individual, herein called Blaydes or the Charging Party, against Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Local Union 148T, AFL-CIO-CLC, herein called Respondent, a complaint was issued by the Regional Director for Region 9 on behalf of the General Counsel on April 25, 1980.

The complaint alleges in substance that in each of three separate grievance meetings Respondent refused to accept Employer's offer of reinstatement of the Charging Party because Respondent desired Employer to reinstate other discharged employees along with the Charging Party, and Employer refused to reinstate the other dischargees; and that Respondent refused to process to arbitration a grievance concerning the discharge of the Charging Party, pursuant to provisions of the collective-bargaining contract with Employer. By these acts and omissions, the complaint alleges that Respondent failed to represent the Charging Party, for reasons which are unfair, arbitrary, and invidious, thereby resulting in a breach of the fiduciary duty owed employees it represents; and that by such acts and omissions, Respondent has restrained and coerced its employees in the exercise of their protected Section 7 rights, in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

The hearing in the above matter was held before me in Cincinnati, Ohio, on April 13 and 14, 1981. Briefs have been received from counsel for the General Counsel and counsel for Respondent, respectively, which have been carefully considered.

Blaydes without adding that the Employer would not reinstate Lewis. In his brief to the Administrative Law Judge, the General Counsel, relying on the testimony of Plant Supervisor Carpenter, contended that the "offer" to reinstate Blaydes was, in fact, unconditional. While Carpenter testified that the Employer, by its "offer," was willing to reinstate Blaydes and continue processing Lewis' grievance, he also testified that, "When they said all or none, we said if we couldn't take just her [Blaydes] back, we would take none." Of course, the Employer did not need the Respondent's approval before it could unilaterally reinstate Blaydes without reinstating Lewis. However, even assuming that the Employer intended its "offer" to be unconditional, it was not stated in those terms.

[5] The Respondent also failed to take Lewis' grievance to arbitration.

[6] Business Agent Meyer, then Grievance Chairman Magnolia King, Financial Secretary Mary Shirley, and employee Barbara Grubb, all testified that, following the discussion, the membership voted not to invoke arbitration. Meyer further testified that the discussion included the likelihood of winning an arbitration. On the other hand, Bea Miranda, the Respondent's president at the time, testified that, although the grievances were discussed at the July meeting, no vote or action was taken. The Administrative Law Judge made no finding on the extent of the discussion or on whether a vote was taken. Nevertheless, it is the General Counsel's burden to prove that the Respondent acted arbitrarily. Since the record establishes that, at a minimum, some discussion on the merits of the grievances preceded the Respondent's failure to invoke arbitration, we cannot find that the Respondent acted arbitrarily or without reason.

Upon the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses, I hereby make the following:

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material herein, Employer Leshner Corporation, herein called Employer, an Ohio corporation with an office and place of business in Hamilton, Ohio, has been engaged in the manufacture of textile products.

During the past 12 months, a representative period, Employer, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received at its Hamilton, Ohio, facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Ohio.

The complaint alleges, the Employer admits, and I find that Employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Local Union 148T, AFL-CIO-CLC, herein called Respondent or Union, is now and has been at all times material herein a labor organization within the meaning of section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background Facts

At all times material herein, Respondent, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been, and is now, the exclusive bargaining representative for purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, of all employees of Employer in the following unit:

> All employees in the Old or South Plant in Hamilton, Ohio with the following exceptions: superintendents, foremen, office employees, and watchmen.

At all times material herein the following-named persons occupied the positions set opposite their respective names, and are now, and have been, agents of Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(13) of the Act: Jerilene Miller, steward; Mary Shirley, steward; Bea Miranda, president; Meg King, chief steward; and George Meyer, business agent.

At all times material herein, Respondent and Employer have maintained and enforced a collective-bargaining agreement covering wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the unit described above, which agreement includes, inter alia, a grievance and arbitration procedure.

The parties herein stipulated that George Meyer is a joint board manager for Respondent and Local 2297; that Respondent, Local 148T, and Local 2297 have the same mailing address: 215 West Wyoming Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio, and the same telephone number: 761-1797.[1]

B. The Propriety of Notice of the Charge Upon Local 148T

The parties herein stipulated that on August 6, 1979, Charging Party (Blaydes) filed a charge against Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Local 2297, AFL-CIO-CLC, and that a copy of said charge was served by registered mail on August 6, 1979. Thereafter, the charge was dismissed by the Regional Director for Region 9 on September 24, 1979, because he concluded that the burden of establishing a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act could not be sustained, and a complaint was not issued. This determination was appealed by Charging Party and sustained. Consequently, a complaint was issued on April 25, 1980, alleging that Local 2297 violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by failing to fairly represent the Charging Party (Blaydes) in processing her grievance in reference to her discharge.

An amended complaint was issued on January 19, 1981, correcting the name of Respondent Union to Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Local 148T, AFL-CIO-CLC, and containing the identical allegations set forth in the original complaint. At the hearing herein, the parties stipulated that George Meyer is the joint board manager and business agent for Respondent (Local 148T) and Local 2297; and that Respondent and Local 2297 have the same mailing address, and the same telephone number but separate and distinct bargaining agreements, covering different units of employees of Employer. Nonetheless, counsel for Respondent argues that neither a charge nor an initial complaint was ever filed against Local 148T, but rather, Local 148T was served with an amended complaint without having first been served with a charge addressed to it. or an original complaint. Therefore, counsel for Respondent contends that Local 148T was not properly served according to Board rules, and that the amended complaint herein should be dismissed.

However, the record shows that Meyer testified and counsel for Respondent acknowledged at the hearing that Respondent knew that the charge herein was intended for Respondent (Local 148T); that upon receipt of the charge, George Meyer made arrangements for certain officers of Respondent to meet with the Board agent investigating the charge; and that some of Respondent's officers gave statements to the investigating Board agent. It is also observed by me that the record does not show that Respondent objected to service of the charge or the initial complaint herein prior to service of a copy of the amended complaint. In fact, in paragraph 1 of its answer to the initial complaint, Respondent admits to service of the charge. It is apparent, however, that although Respondent denied such service in its answer to the amended complaint, such denial was not filed until sometime after January 14, 1981, subsequent to some of the investigations to which Manager Meyer assented and with which he cooperated.

Counsel for Respondent renewed its motion for dismissal of summary judgment at the hearing based upon his argument heretofore alluded to.

However, in view of the fact that Manager Meyer accepted a copy of the charge served upon him, admitted that he knew it was intended to be against Local 148T, whom he also represents, and thereafter made arrangements for, and cooperated with a Board investigation of Local 148T officials, pursuant to said charge, I conclude and find that Respondent (Local 148T) was not misled either by the substance of the charge, or by the fact that it was mistakenly addressed to Local 2297. Respondent was not prejudiced by the charge because the allegations contained therein were identical to the allegations in the amended complaint. Although the amended complaint was labeled "amended," it was amended to reflect only Respondent's correct title, not its address or the substance of the allegations. Thus, for all practical purposes, Respondent received a copy of the original complaint bearing its correct name, for which it knew the charge and the original complaint were intended.

For the foregoing reasons, I further conclude and find that the mere technical misnomer of Respondent in the charge and original complaint herein is not a sufficient ground for the dismissal of the amended complaint, pursuant to Section 10(b) of the Act. American Geriatric Enterprises, Inc., and its wholly-owned subsidiary Hamilton Medical Convalescent Center, Inc., 235 NLRB 1532 (1978), and Ross Sand Company, Inc. d/b/a Rosco Concrete Pipe Co., Inc., 219 NLRB 915 (1975). I also find that, since Respondent had actual notice of the charge (Meyer knew the charge was for Local 148T), said charge and amended complaint were validly and timely served within the meaning of Section 10(b) of the Act. Peterson Construction Company, Inc., 106 NLRB 850 (1953), and American Steamship Company, a subsidiary of General American Transportation Corporation, 222 NLRB 1226 (1976).

Accordingly, counsel for Respondent's motion to dismiss the complaint, or for summary judgment, is hereby denied.

C. An Altercation With Some Physical Contact Between Two Employees During Working Time

Dischargee Deborah (Debby) Blaydes was employed by Respondent on April 18, 1978, until April 24, 1979. During working time on April 24, 1979, Blaydes testified that they had an extra girl that night and she worked on the assembly line as usual whenever they had an extra girl. She was assigned there by Steve Gay, supervisor of her shift. Another girl was assigned to be relief girl, which involved relieving girls at their work station in order to permit them to go to the restroom or for other personal reasons. Blaydes said one girl hollered back to her for relief, and she went to the girl and told her that she was not relieving and that she would have to wait for the girl who was relieving. Thereafter, Connie Butterly hollered at her, saying Linda had to go to the restroom. Blaydes said she told her that she was not relieving, that Lisa Haddock was, and that she had already sent a message to that effect to Linda. About 10 or 15 minutes later, Blaydes said a spot was coming through on the material and she went to talk to the machine operator about it. Connie Butterly told her again that Linda had to go to the restroom. Blaydes said she told her she was not doing it and that she had sent word by Butterly's husband that she was not relieving. The testimony in this regard is rather conflicting, however, it appears that Butterly told Blaydes not to use her husband as her personal slave or as her messenger boy and, according to Union President Bea Miranda, Connie Butterly told her Blaydes said, "She would take her husband up to the hayloft and show him a good time." Other witnesses testified Blaydes told Butterly "F—— you, and the broom you rode in on." Blaydes testified she could not recall what the conversation was between herself and Connie Butterly at this juncture.[2] Nevertheless, Butterly's husband was a machine operator and he was the one who was supposed to come and get the relief girl whenever one of the employees wanted to go to the restroom.

Butterly left her machine and grabbed Blaydes around the neck, proceeding to choke and scratch her about the neck and face. Machine operator Keith came over and commenced pulling Butterly off Blaydes. The record shows from all testimonial accounts that Blaydes simply tried to block and pull the hands and arms of Butterly in an effort to avoid being hurt, without retaliating in any way with physical force. Subsequently, Supervisor Steve Gay assigned her to a machine and dryer, and another girl continued to serve as relief girl.

Fifteen minutes prior to the end of her shift, Blaydes testified she went to the restroom and, as she was leaving there, Charlene Lewis hollered to her, requesting to be relieved. Lewis continued to holler at her, and Blaydes said she continued walking without responding. Then, Lewis said something to her and she (Blaydes) turned around and made a reply which she cannot now recall, but adding that she did not want to hear what Lewis had to say. Blaydes said she returned to her work station. Lewis stopped her machine and came to her work station and grabbed her around the neck. All testimonial accounts of record clearly show that, while both Lewis and Butterly, respectively, attacked Blaydes by grabbing her around the neck, choking her, scratching her around the neck and face, and/or pulling her hair, Blaydes did not at any time retaliate against them physically. Blaydes simply tried to defend herself by holding the hands and arms of Butterly and Lewis.

The testimonial accounts nevertheless show that, during their altercation, Blaydes told Butterly and Lewis, "F—— you, and the broom you rode in on."[3]

[2] Although Blaydes said she did not recall telling Butterly, "F—— you," or the remarks in reference to taking Butterly's husband up in the hayloft, I nevertheless credit Miranda's testimony because I was persuaded by her demeanor as well as the unobjected to testimonial reports of participants in the grievance meetings that Blaydes made such a remark, as well as telling Butterly, "F—— you, and the broom you rode in on." Moreover, Blaydes did not categorically or convincingly deny she made the former remarks.

[3] Although Blaydes impliedly denied that she used such language, I was persuaded by her demeanor while testifying, as well as by the consistent testimonial accounts of what transpired in the grievance meetings,

Blaydes also testified that Supervisor Gay was one of the persons who separated her and Lewis, and she asked him if she was going to be fired and Gay said he did not know, he would have to talk with management. On the next day, April 25, 1979, Supervisor Gay gave her a written warning and advised her she was fired. Charlene Lewis and Connie Butterly were also fired on the same day.

D. Grievance Committee Meetings and Union Membership Meeting in Reference to Dischargee Deborah Blaydes' Grievance

A composite of the essentially corroborated testimonial accounts of what was discussed, and what was generally understood and agreed upon during three grievance committee meetings and two union membership meetings, with respect to the grievances filed by Deborah (Debby) Blaydes and Charlene Lewis, is as follows:

Present at the first-step grievance committee meeting in or about early May 1979 were: Paul Moritz, plant manager, Supervisor Steve Gay, for Employer, union officials Bea Miranda, Jerilene Miller, and Mary Shirley, for the Union, and grievant Deborah Blaydes. After Blaydes told her version of the April 24 incidents, as she previously testified herein, Supervisor Steve Gay said his investigation of the incidents indicated dischargee Connie Butterly had attacked Blaydes and the former acknowledged she was in the wrong.

A concensus of the grievance committee, as did a consensus of members at a May union meeting, concluded that dischargee Butterly was the aggressor in the incident between Blaydes and Butterly; that dischargee Charlene Lewis was the aggressor in the incident between Blaydes and Lewis; and that Blaydes was passive and only defensive in blocking or trying to remove the hands and arms of Butterly, and later, the hands and arms of Lewis from around her neck, in an effort to prevent them from choking her, scratching her face and neck, or pulling her hair. It was the view of the grievance committee that Blaydes had been assaulted by Butterly and Lewis, respectively, and that Blaydes did not retaliate, and therefore, should not have been fired.

Plant Manager Moritz then offered Blaydes her job back and Mary Shirley said it was company policy to discharge both or all employees involved in a fight. Moritz nevertheless again offered Blaydes her job or stated he wanted to reinstate her. Mary Shirley said, "No," the Company had to take both Blaydes and Butterly back, or neither one. Charlene Lewis was not present and the committee wanted to hear her version of the incident, so the meeting was adjourned.

Present at the second-step grievance committee in or about late May 1979 were: Plant Manager Paul Moritz, Plant Supervisor Harold Carpenter, and Second Shift Supervisor Steve Gay, for Employer; Business Agent George Meyer, Bea Miranda, Mary Shirley, and Meg King, for the Union; floorlady Kathy Heatherly, and grievant Deborah Blaydes. Bea Miranda announced that Charlene Lewis would not be present because she was in the hospital. Blaydes was asked to tell her story and she did, essentially as she testified in this proceeding. Supervisor Gay told his story, essentially as he did in the first grievance meeting. A concensus of the committee again concluded that Butterly was the aggressor and Lewis was the aggressor, respectively, in each instance with Blaydes, who was the passive victim in each attack.

Thereafter, Plant Manager Paul Moritz said he would reinstate Blaydes to her job, but not Charlene Lewis, because she was a troublemaker. Plant Supervisor Harold Carpenter said he thought both Blaydes and Lewis should be reinstated. Mary Shirley said both should be reinstated or neither, in accordance with company policy. Business Agent Meyer said he could not make a decision until he heard Lewis' version of the incident. Thereupon the meeting was adjourned.

Present at the third-step grievance meeting on or about June 7, 1979: Business Agent George Meyer, Bea Miranda, Jerilene Miller, Meg King, and the testimony is conflicting as to whether Mary Shirley was present, for the Union. Plant Supervisor Harold Carpenter and Plant Manager Paul Moritz were present for Employer, and grievant Charlene Lewis. Grievant Blaydes was asked to leave before the meeting started because the committee had already heard her version. Lewis told her version of the incident which was essentially the same as Blaydes' testimonial account herein. The concensus of the committee was the same as it was in the two prior grievance meetings, with respect to what each dischargee did. Business Agent Meyer asked to have Blaydes reinstated to her job and Mary Shirley said, "If you're gonna bring one of them back, bring 'em both." Carpenter said he would have brought Blaydes back but now he would have to take it to the Company (Employer). The meeting was adjourned. Subsequently, Carpenter did advise the Union, in writing, pursuant to its request, that both grievances (Blaydes and Lewis) were denied by Employer.

There was a union membership meeting in early July 1978, and Deborah Blaydes, Mary Fields, Bessie Markham, George Meyer, Mary Shirley, and Bea Miranda were present. Blaydes told Shirley she (Shirley) cost her (Blaydes) her job. An argument ensued between Blaydes and Shirley and Blaydes got angry and left the meeting. Before leaving, she asked Meyer was the Union going to process her grievance to arbitration and Meyer said he did not know. Since the Union was advised by Employer (Carpenter) that the grievances (of Blaydes and Lewis) were denied, no action was taken by the Union to process Blaydes' grievance to arbitration, pursuant to the contract. In reference to the grievances, Mary Shirley and Meg King testified that the job of the Union is to try to have the discharged employees reinstated.

Supervisor Carpenter testified that the Union never contacted him about taking Blaydes' grievance to arbitration. He further testified undisputedly that Blaydes' grievance was denied. It was determined at the last grievance meeting that the Union would not allow Employer to reinstate Blaydes without reinstating Lewis and Butterly, and "I had no alternative but to deny the grievthat Blaydes did use the above language towards Butterly and Lewis. Consequently, I discredit Blaydes' denial and credit the testimony that she used said language.

ances of all three dischargees." Carpenter continued to testify in this regard as follows:

> Q. What do you mean by you had no alternative?
> A. Well, the Union says we either take none or all. We wasn't going to take them all, so we denied the grievance and didn't take anybody. . . .
> Q. Now, you have mentioned the fact that you had no alternative in view of what we have discussed here, you had no alternative but to fire all three. What do you mean you had no alternative? What would prevent you from reinstating?
> A. Not to hire her.
> Q. What do you mean, you had no alternative?
> A. In other words, the union said take them all or none.
> Q. Yes?
> A. We were willing to take Debby back. When they said all or none, we said if we couldn't take just her back, we would take none.
> Q. Was there anything that would prevent you from taking Debby back?
> A. We'd have more problems with the union.

Additionally, according to the undisputed testimony of Carpenter, Employer's policy simply says, "all parties involved in a fight will be discharged." He said, "It does not say, all or none may be kept or rehired."

Analysis and Conclusions

Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act provides, in part as pertinent herein, as follows: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—to restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7."

In construing the application of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, the U.S. Supreme Court and the Board have held that a union with "the exclusive agent's statutory authority to represent all members of a designated unit includes a statutory obligation to serve the interests of all members, without hostility or discrimination towards any, to exercise its discretion with complete good faith and honesty, and to avoid arbitrary conduct." Vaca et al. v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171 (1967), and Miranda Fuel Company, Inc., 140 NLRB 181 (1962).

In the instant case, it is unequivocally clear from the uncontroverted evidence of record that, in each of the three grievance committee meetings, Employer was of the view that Deborah Blaydes was the passive victim of the attacks of Butterly and Lewis, and thereupon offered to reinstate Blaydes but not Charlene Lewis. Butterly did not pursue a grievance, so some members of the Union (Mary Shirley) insisted that Emloyer reinstate Blaydes and Lewis, or neither.

Although it was established that Employer had a policy which provided that all employees involved in a fight will be discharged, the word "fight" was not defined and the policy did not prescribe conditions upon which Employer would retain or reinstate an employee who was involved in a fight. Notwithstanding the absence of such a definition, the evidence is clear that, at least with respect to Deborah Blaydes, Employer does not equate a passive victim of an attack with physical force as an employee involved in a fight. Even if Blaydes' foul language to Butterly and Lewis actually provoked them, words alone do not constitute an assault. Moreover, such words cannot be asserted in self-defense to justify physical attack upon a person.

Employer's view of Blaydes' part in both incidents is consistent with the common understanding of the word "fight"—to take part in a physical struggle,[4] as distinguished from "altercation"—an angry or heated argument.[5] Apparently Blaydes and Lewis were discharged before all of the details of each incident were known by Employer. However, the record shows that after Employer was satisfied that Blaydes was a passive victim in both episodes, it immediately applied its policy with a construction that a passive nonretaliating victim was not what it meant by being involved in a fight. Nevertheless, some union members (Shirley and King) ignored Employer's construction of its policy and its decision to reinstate Blaydes, and continued to maintain that Blaydes was involved in two fights and insisted that Employer reinstate Blaydes and Lewis, or neither of them.

When Employer learned that some union members of the grievance committee were not relenting to Employer's offer to reinstate Blaydes, but not Lewis, it gave in to the Union's alternative and did not reinstate Blaydes or Lewis. As Plant Supervisor Harold Carpenter testified, Employer did not want to have problems with the Union so it opted not to reinstate either employee.

At the July union meeting, Blaydes asked Business Agent George Meyer whether her grievance was being processed to arbitration pursuant to the arbitration provision of the contract. Meyer replied he did not know, he would have to think about it. Blaydes' grievance was not processed to arbitration in accordance with the arbitration provision of the contract, and Respondent is not shown to have made an effort to do so. Consequently, under the foregoing circumstances, I find the evidence sufficient to support a conclusion that Respondent refused to accept Employer's offer to reinstate Blaydes. Its failure to process her grievance to arbitration was therefore arbitrary conduct, having a coercive and restraining effect upon the exercise of employees' rights protected by Section 7, and in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

Additionally, I find that Respondent's failure to process Blaydes' grievance to arbitration, and its "squeeze play" of insisting Employer reinstate Blaydes and Lewis, the established aggressors, or neither of them, constituted a breach of Respondent's fiduciary duty to fairly represent Blaydes, in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECTS OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with the operations of Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

[5] "Webster's New World Dictionary," supra.

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices warranting a remedial order, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It having been found that Respondent has restrained and coerced its members by repeatedly and arbitrarily refusing to accept Employer's offer to reinstate dischargee Deborah Blaydes, unless Employer also reinstate dischargee Charlene Lewis, or neither employee, and finally to further process Blaydes' grievance to arbitration; that Respondent also further coerced its members by breaching its fiduciary duty fairly to represent her, all in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, the recommended Order will provide that Respondent cease and desist from engaging in such unlawful conduct, and that it promptly request Employer to reinstate Deborah Blaydes to her former position or, if such position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, or, if Employer refuses to reinstate Blaydes, Respondent should request Employer to process a grievance over said employee's discharge and pursue such grievance in good faith and due diligence, including permitting Blaydes to have counsel or other representative of her own choosing during such grievance arbitration proceeding, and reimburse Blaydes for the reasonable cost thereof, and Respondent shall make Blaydes whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered as a result of her discharge on April 25, 1979, until such time as Blaydes is reinstated by Employer, or said employee obtains other substantially equivalent employment.

Upon the basis of the above findings of fact and upon the entire record of this case, I make the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Leshner Corporation, Employer herein, is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Local Union 148T, AFL-CIO-CLC, Respondent herein, is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By repeatedly and arbitrarily refusing to accept Employer's offer to reinstate dischargee Deborah (Debby) Blaydes, and failing to process her grievance to arbitration, Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. By repeatedly and arbitrarily failing to process dischargee Deborah (Debby) Blaydes' grievance to arbitration, Respondent breached its fiduciary duty fairly to represent Deborah (Debby) Blaydes, in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Worksman Trading Corporation and Local 29, Retail, Wholesale Department Store Union, AFL-CIO. Case 29-CA-8163

January 20, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS JENKINS AND HUNTER

On July 15, 1981, Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief,[1] and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions [3] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[4]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Worksman Trading Corporation, Ozone Park, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in said recommended Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT discharge any of our employees because of their activities on behalf of Local 29, RWDSU, AFL-CIO, or to discourage any employee from joining or supporting the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL offer to Robert Thomas, Juan Rivera, Joseph Lomuscio, Tyrone Townsend, and John Dantzler their jobs back and pay them all moneys they lost, plus interest, because of their unlawful layoff on July 14, 1980.

WORKSMAN TRADING CORPORATION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES F. MORTON, Administrative Law Judge: On July 18, 1980, Local 29, Retail, Wholesale Department Store Union, AFL-CIO (herein called the Union), filed the unfair labor practice charge in this case, pursuant to which the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board was authorized to investigate the Union's contentions therein that Worksman Trading Corporation (herein called Respondent) violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (herein called the Act). On September 10, 1980, the General Counsel issued a complaint against Respondent alleging, among other things, that it violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by having discharged five of its employees because of their activities on behalf of the Union and in order to discourage the employees of Respondent from joining or supporting the Union. Respondent filed a timely answer. The pleadings, together with stipulations received at this hearing, placed in issue the alleged discriminatory discharges of those five employees. The hearing was held before me on April 27, 28, and 30, 1981, in Brooklyn, New York.

Upon the entire record, including my observations of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the oral arguments made by the parties at the close of the hearing and of the brief filed by Respondent, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The pleadings establish and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. This request is hereby denied as the record, the exceptions, and the brief adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] Although alleged discriminatee Robert Thomas was told by the Respondent's vice president, Marc Woodsman, that the Respondent would promote him to "supervisor" of shipping and receiving, there is no contention and no evidence that Thomas was a statutory supervisor.

[3] The Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent manufactures industrial and recreational bicycles. In 1980, it produced approximately 8,000 bicycles, 95 percent of which were made pursuant to special orders. Until late 1979, Respondent was located in a small plant in Brooklyn, New York. With assistance from the Urban Development Corporation, it relocated to a much larger facility in the borough of Queens, New York. The move was completed by January 1, 1980.

Irving Worksman owns 80 percent of the stock of Respondent. The remainder is divided evenly between his son Mark and another individual. Respondent is also owner of half of the stock of Precision Carting Company and had leased space to that company in 1980. The remaining stock in Precision Carting is owned by an individual, Dan Rossi—the Union's surprise witness at the hearing, as discussed below.

In the summer of 1980, Respondent had about 38 production and maintenance employees, none of whom were represented for collective-bargaining purposes by any labor organization.

The evidence offered by the General Counsel in his case-in-chief to establish that five employees were discriminatorily discharged was circumstantial in nature. The rebuttal evidence offered by Respondent raised relatively minor credibility issues. Virtually at the end of the case, however, the Union called as its only witness, Dan Rossi, part owner of Precision, as noted above. Rossi testified, as discussed in detail below, that he had a conversation with Respondent's officials shortly before the five discriminatees in this case were discharged and that he was told then of their intention to terminate the employment of those individuals because of their support for the Union. Rossi's testimony came as a surprise. Respondent then presented witnesses in its efforts to establish that Rossi was carrying out a threat to blackmail them. A major credibility issue was thereby presented. That matter is reviewed in detail, infra.

B. The Discharges on July 14, 1980, and the Related Circumstances

1. The work histories of the alleged discriminatees

The General Counsel called each of the five alleged discriminatees as witnesses. The first, Robert Thomas, testified as follows. He was hired on December 4, 1979, and assigned to Respondent's assembly department. After Christmas, he was moved to its shipping and receiving department. At that time, there were two other employees in the shipping and receiving department besides himself. By May 1980, Thomas was the only one regularly assigned to the shipping and receiving department. Of the other two employees who had been there, one had been transferred to the purchasing department and the other had left Respondent's employ. At one time, Plant Manager Donald Feis informed Thomas that Respondent was going to hire a supervisor for that department and also another helper.

The second alleged discriminatee was Juan Rivera. He testified that he had been hired in June 1979 as an assembler, that he received a raise in late 1979, and that he received another one a couple of weeks before he was discharged on July 14, 1980, as related below.

The third alleged discriminatee, Joseph Lomuscio, was hired by Respondent on December 3, 1979, and also was assigned to the assembly department. He received a $10 raise after he was employed for a month and he received a second raise in late April 1980.

The fourth alleged discriminatee, Tyrone Townsend, was hired by Respondent on March 18, 1980. He spent his first 5 or 6 weeks working in the tire department and then was transferred to the spray department.

The fifth alleged discriminatee, John Dantzler, was hired by Respondent as a welder.

2. The union activity

Robert Thomas testified for the General Counsel that he telephoned the Union's office in June 1980 and that, on the day after he called there, a representative from the Union, Al Green, came to see him while he was at work at Respondent's plant. According to Thomas, Respondent's president, Irving Worksman, came over to them while they were talking and Green began talking with Worksman as they left Thomas' work station. Thomas did not testify as to what, if anything, he heard them say to each other. Green did not testify at the hearing. Irving Worksman testified on other matters and made no reference to any discussion with Green.

Thomas testified also that he obtained union authorization cards from a leadman employed by Respondent who had been a member of the Union at one time. Thomas passed out those cards to a number of employees. The testimony of each of the other four alleged discriminatees indicates that they signed authorization cards for the Union in June 1980.[1]

Later in June 1980, one of the Union's business representatives, Joe Pave, met with Respondent's vice president, Mark Worksman, and asked that he recognize the Union as the bargaining agent for its production and maintenance employees. On Tuesday, July 8, according to alleged discriminatee Robert Thomas, Respondent's vice president, Mark Worksman, told him that he would be hiring two employees for the shipping and receiving department and that Thomas would be their supervisor. Mark Worksman represented Respondent at the hearing before me and also testified for Respondent. He did not controvert that aspect of Thomas' testimony.

Also, on July 8, the Union filed a petition in Case 29-RC-5038 whereby it sought an election among Respondent's production and maintenance employees. A copy of that petition was served by registered mail on Respondent. It was received by Respondent's president, Irving Worksman, on Monday, July 14. At the end of that workday, all five alleged discriminatees in this case were notified that they were laid off under the circumstances disclosed below.

[1] The testimony thereon is not especially precise but the significance is clear. For example, one of the alleged discriminatees testified he received a card one day, was asked to sign it and gave it back later that day.

3. The discharges on July 14

Robert Thomas testified that he had been paid on the Friday of the preceding week in accordance with Respondent's normal practice and that nothing occurred on that Friday to suggest that he would be laid off on the next workday. On Monday, July 14, he worked again without incident until around 3:20 p.m. At that point, he was told by Respondent's plant manager, Donald Feis, that he was laid off. Thomas testified that he asked Feis why he was laid off and that Feis was at first hesitant and then mumbled something to the effect that business was slow. Thomas testified that, about 10 minutes later, he asked Respondent's vice president, Mark Worksman, why he was laid off. According to Thomas, Worksman stated that the reason was Thomas' ineffectiveness as a manager. Thomas testified that also present at that time were Respondent's president, Irving Worksman, coworker Willie Kennedy, and possibly another coworker, Timmy Murphy.

Thomas received a paycheck on Monday, July 14. That paycheck was for the day he worked during the preceding week and reflected also that he had received a wage increase for the hours worked that preceding week. Thomas testified that, in June 1980, he had asked Respondent's vice president, Mark Worksman, for a raise that he had expected to receive earlier that month and that Worksman told him then that he would be getting that raise.

The second alleged discriminatee, Juan Rivera, testified as follows as to his layoff. Respondent's plant manager, Donald Feis, told him on the afternoon of July 14, that he was terminated and he asked Feis why. Feis responded that he did not know. He then asked Feis to go to the office to get something in writing so that he would be able to file an unemployment claim. Feis went to the office and came out and told him not to worry about any such paper and that he was laid off because Respondent was overstaffed. Rivera received his pay for 2 days he worked in the preceding week and also for accrued vacation pay. Rivera had received a raise in pay just several weeks before he was terminated on July 14.

Alleged discriminatee Joseph Lomuscio testified that he was with Juan Rivera when Respondent's plant manager, Feis, told them that they were laid off. His account essentially parallels Rivera's. Lomuscio testified that his work had been praised on occasion by Feis and that another employee, Angelo Malafakis, was the least senior employee in Respondent's assembly department, where Lomuscio had worked.

Alleged discriminatee Tyrone Townsend testified that he saw the shop manager, Donald Feis, give Robert Thomas a paycheck on July 14 and he heard that Feis had told Thomas that he, Townsend, had to go. Townsend testified that he was thus laid off and that shortly afterwards he told Lomuscio and Rivera of his layoff. He testified that he, Lomuscio, and Rivera then spoke to Plant Manager Feis, and that Feis told them he had no idea what was going on. Townsend testified also that Feis went inside the office and asked for "pink slips" for Lomuscio, Rivera, and himself, and that Feis came out a few minutes later and said that they did not need pink slips to collect unemployment insurance as everything would be taken care of.

The last alleged discriminatee, John Dantzler, testified as follows respecting his layoff on July 14. He had worked through his lunch hour that day and finished work around 2:50 p.m. He came to the timeclock to punch out and noticed that his card was not in the time rack. He then went to the main office to see his supervisor and was told by one of the Worksmans to wait outside because the supervisors were having a meeting. About 10 minutes later, the meeting ended and his supervisor, Tossils, approached him and told him that he had to be laid off. Dantzler asked him why and Tossils responded that he did not know. Dantzler asked Tossils why he was being laid off as there were three others with less seniority than he in the welding department. Tossils responded that he did not know. Respondent did not call Tossils to controvert Dantzler's account.

C. The Representation Case Proceedings

As noted above, the Union had filed a petition to represent Respondent's employees. Respondent received that petition on July 14, 1980. On July 21, a hearing was held in that case. The transcript in that proceeding was received in evidence in the instant case. It discloses that Respondent's representative at that proceeding, its vice president, Mark Worksman, took the position that the five alleged discriminatees in this case had been "permanently discharged." The transcript of that representation case proceeding also discloses that Respondent sought to exclude the approximately six employees on its payroll who were actually performing work for Precision Carting Company, the firm jointly owned by Respondent and Dan Rossi. Further processing of the petition in that representation case has been blocked by reason of the matters involved in the instant case.

D. Reasons Proffered by Respondent for Terminating the Employment of the Five Alleged Discriminatees

Respondent contends that it had been overstaffed since December 1979, that that fact was readily evident since January 1980, and that the five discriminatees in this case were discharged as part of a long-term plan to alleviate its overstaffing problem. Respondent introduced various exhibits to establish that the national bicycle manufacturing business had been, by early 1980, in a downturn and that the projected outlook then for the bicycle business generally was not favorable. Testimony was offered by several of Respondent's witnesses that they had commented at various times to Respondent's Vice President Mark Worksman that Respondent's production and maintenance work force was overstaffed. One of those witnesses indicated that he so told Mark Worksman even before Respondent relocated its plant from Brooklyn to Queens in late 1979. Several employees testified that an individual named Robert Steinburger had observed the operations in detail in the plant around April 1980. They testified that Steinburger had told them that he was there to familiarize himself with the bicycle manufacturing operations as he was going to Israel to manage a similar facility being established there apparently by Respondent. Respondent's vice president, Mark Worksman, testified that Steinburger told him that Respondent would do well to reassign five employees classified as floaters to permanent departmental assignments. Mark Worksman was so informed sometime around June 1980, according to Worksman's testimony.

Mark Worksman testified further that he met with the Union's business representatives in late June, as stated above, to discuss the Union's initial demand for recognition. Worksman testified that, also in late June, a meeting was held in his office among management personnel to discuss various problems. Worksman testified that he could not recall whether that management meeting occurred before or after his meeting with the union representative. Worksman testified that present at the management meeting were himself, his father, Irving Worksman, Sales Manager Wayne Sosin, Plant Manager Donald Feis, and the individual referred to earlier, Robert Steinburger. Mark Worksman testified as follows respecting the matters discussed at that meeting. Sosin began it by commenting on the industry forecast for the ensuing 6 months. Then Plant Manager Feis talked about material handling problems. Robert Steinburger suggested that Respondent was overstaffed and indicated that there were floaters who were working in excess capacity with no specific jobs. Irving Worksman indicated how important it was to cut down expenses and to be more conservative. There were discussions about the excessive heat loss in the building, that real estate taxes were high, and that overhead cost had to be cut. An understanding was reached that Mark Worksman and Plant Manager Feis would later set up a plan of action respecting what Worksman termed "the floater elimination" and that a long-term plan would be prepared for the following 6 months involving the discharge of from 7 to 10 employees. Mark Worksman stated in the meeting that "the Urban Employment people were going to become full wage people [and Respondent's] wage costs are going to go up."

The references to "full wage" pertains to the arrangement whereby the Urban Development Corporation subsidized the wages of some new employees during their initial training period. When such an employee works beyond that period, his wages are paid in their entirety by Respondent and he is then referred to by Respondent as a "full wage earner."

The testimony of Mark Worksman suggests that he considered the status of the alleged discriminatees and others in considering the matter of "overstaffing." At one point, he testified that, after that management meeting, he met with Plant Manager Feis but did not discharge any employees then as he had "some moral obligation to the city for some of the [employees]." It was not made clear to me why that concern vanished by July 14 or that the representation petition filed on July 8 had nothing to do with it. I was also confused by Respondent's evidence respecting its view as to the status of the alleged discriminatees as "full wage earners." Respondent's evidence initially indicated that their status as such had been reviewed in early July 1980 by Mark Worksman and that the payroll records considered by him then reflected that Joseph Lomuscio and Juan Rivera had become "full wage earners" on June 6, 1980, that John Dantzler would become a "full wage earner" on July 3, and that Robert Thomas would become one on July 3 and Tyrone Townsend on July 10. When Mark Worksman's testimony indicated that Rivera never had been employed under the plan Respondent had with the Urban Development Program, exact payroll data was procured at the hearing. Those records disclosed that Lomuscio became a full wage earner on March 6, 1980; Thomas became a full wage earner on March 25, 1980; Dantzler on April 7, 1980, and Townsend on July 1, 1980. Rivera was never employed under the plan Respondent had with the Urban Development Corporation; he was at all times in Respondent's employ a "full wage earner."

Worksman testified that he and Plant Manager Feis met sometime after the July 4 holiday to carry out the decisions reached at the management meeting discussed above. Worksman testified that, in his meeting with Feis, he informed him of the Union's demand for recognition and that the purpose of their meeting was in part to "get our act together" in the event the Union "came in." Worksman's testimony indicated that he and Feis reviewed various records and that they at that time had a written list containing the names of seven employees. Worksman testified that he knew that five of those people had to be discharged and he wanted to consider how best to do it. He testified that he discussed in detail with Feis the reasons why the names of those seven employees were on that list. Worksman testified that that list was considered over the following weekend and that on Monday, July 14, he and Feis met again and decided that they were going to discharge five employees and that Feis was responsible for discharging those employees. Mark Worksman testified that he held that meeting on July 14 with Plant Manager Feis after the coffeebreak which takes place around 10:20 a.m. Later in his testimony, Mark Worksman testified that, during the weekend preceding July 14, he himself had made the ultimate decision to discharge the five employees involved in this case.

Plant Manager Feis testified as follows respecting the discharge of the five employees in this case. The discussions he had with Mark Worksman about selecting employees to be terminated started in May or June 1980. On the weekend of the 4th of July vacation, he learned from talking with Mark Worksman that Respondent was going to lay off five, six, or seven people and he, Feis, gave Mark Worksman a list of nine people that he thought should be laid off. He initially did not recall exactly when he was told by Mark Worksman which five employees were to be laid off and when he was so told. He estimated that he was told on the day before the employees were actually laid off the names of those employees. Later, he testified that he had "probably" been told their names on the Friday preceding the layoff on July 14. He then testified that he learned the identity of the five when Mark Worksman told him on Monday, July 14, to lay off those employees. He testified that Mark Worksman told him then that the reason for the layoffs was that Respondent was "overstaffed." He informed Tyrone Townsend, Juan Rivera, and Joseph Lomuscio when they were together at the timeclock of their layoff. He told him that the reason was overstaffing. When one of them asked him for a pink slip, he went back into the office to get one. He then talked to the bookkeeper and then came back to the employees and told them that they did not need any pink slips. The meeting he had with Mark Worksman on July 14 occurred at "9:00 o'clock or something," and that it was held before the coffeebreak.

Wayne Sosin and Irvin Worksman, sales manager and president, respectively, of Respondent, testified for Respondent at the hearing but did not make any reference to meetings with Mark Worksman or Danny Feis respecting the layoff or termination of the five employees in the instant case or of any other employees for "overstaffing."

Respondent placed in evidence charts to show that its overall productivity has remained stable, despite a reduction in personnel.

E. Offers of Reinstatement by Respondent

Respondent offered evidence which indicated that its vice president, Mark Worksman, discussed with several of the alleged discriminatees their reinstatement to employment with Respondent. It appeared that those discussions were held in January 1981. One of the alleged discriminatees testified that he was told that he could have his job back and several weeks backpay provided this case was withdrawn. Respondent's vice president, Mark Worksman, testified that he had contacted the five alleged discriminatees and had met with four of them. He testified that he took the initiative in this regard based upon his discussions with an agent at the Regional Office of the Board after he had made inquiry as to how best to "settle" the issues arising out of this case. Worksman's subsequent testimony clearly indicates that the discussions he had in January 1981 were all in the nature of settlement discussions.

At the hearing, I had overruled the General Counsel's general objection to Respondent's efforts to adduce testimony respecting reinstatement offers as the complaint in this case alleges that Respondent had failed to reinstate the alleged discriminatees. As the testimony that was developed at the hearing subsequent to that ruling discloses that the discussions between Mark Worksman and the alleged discriminatees were essentially settlement negotiations, they are not properly part of the record. I shall therefore on my own motion strike them from the record.[2]

F. The Surprise Testimony of Dan Rossi

As noted above, Dan Rossi was half owner of Precision Carting Company; Respondent owned the other half of its stock. Precision leased space at Respondent's plant and fabricated metal vending carts there. Its approximately six employees were listed on Respondent's payroll and were supervised directly by Rossi.

At the conclusion of Respondent's case, the General Counsel advised that he had no rebuttal witnesses. Counsel for the Union then called Rossi as a witness. As it turned out, Rossi's testimony was not in the nature of rebuttal evidence but rather it related to Respondent's alleged antiunion motivation in discharging the five employees in this case.[3] Rossi testified that, before the five employees in this case were discharged by Respondent in July 1980, he was approached by Mark Worksman and Irving Worksman and shown a list of seven names. He testified that Mark Worksman told him then that they had satisfied themselves as to the identities of the seven employees who were union supporters and stated that five of those employees worked for Respondent and the other two worked for Precision Carting Company. Rossi testified that Mark Worksman told him that he intended to discharge the five employees working on Respondent's operations and asked him to discharge the two performing work for Precision Carting. Rossi stated that he informed them that he would not discharge any of his employees. Rossi identified the five names listed on the sheet of paper he was shown by Mark Worksman in the summer of 1980 as the names of the five alleged discriminatees in this case.

Mark Worksman and Irving Worksman denied in essence having discussed the termination of the five employees in this case with Rossi. Respondent proffered testimony that, earlier on the day of the hearing, Rossi had had conversations with Respondent's Sales Manager Sosin, and its president, Irving Worksman, relative to a dispute existing between them as to the amount of moneys due Rossi by Respondent and as to Respondent's obligation, if any, to furnish Precision Carting Company with certain parts, particularly wheels. It appears that Respondent's lease of part of the premises to Precision Carting was canceled sometime after the five employees involved in this case had been discharged and that certain of its equipment was removed from the premises of Respondent. Of course, the relevant issue in this case is not the merit, if any, of Precision Carting's claims against Respondent, but rather the nature of the discussions between Rossi and Respondent's officials on the day of the hearing. In particular, Respondent contends that Rossi indicated to its officials sometime during the last day of the hearing that, unless Respondent gave in to his demand, he would fabricate testimony which would hurt Respondent in the instant case. Rossi testified that he had discussions with Respondent's representatives on the day of the hearing in an effort to resolve the particular matters involving Precision Carting and Respondent. The evidence is uncontroverted that it was Respondent's sales manager, Sosin, who took the initiative in meeting with Rossi on that day. He invited Rossi to lunch and suggested that Rossi contact Respondent's president, as Rossi did. Sosin asked Rossi to leave the hearing room and, in effect, not to testify.

[3] The circumstances under which Rossi's account came to the attention of counsel for the Union are set out in the record. Those events and related matters warranted a full explication of the issue and the parties were given the opportunity to develop the issue completely.

It is uncontroverted that Rossi and Respondent were unable to resolve the differences between them. Rossi denied that he in any way sought to blackmail Respondent by threatening to give testimony adverse to Respondent in the instant case. He testified instead that he was present at the hearing because he had heard that the name of Precision Carting Company was mentioned on a number of occasions, as indeed it was, and that he wanted to see for himself what significance such references had with respect to the matters between Precision Carting and Respondent. He testified that he learned while attending the hearing that it involved the alleged discriminatory discharges of the five individuals in this case and he testified that he could not in good conscience leave the hearing without stating what he knew.

Rossi identified also the two employees of Precision Carting who he states were named by Mark Worksman in July 1980 as the "Union troublemakers." Those employees were John Modicowitz and Jose Lopez. He acknowledged that Respondent in fact had hired those two employees within the month preceding the date of the hearing in this case and that one of those had since left Respondent's employ.

G. Analysis

Many significant points in this case are not in genuine dispute. Thus, the evidence is uncontroverted that one of the alleged discriminatees, Robert Thomas, initiated contact with the Union and obtained authorization cards from them which he helped pass out. All five of the alleged discriminatees signed cards on behalf of the Union in June 1980. Later that month, Respondent's vice president had a breakfast meeting with Joe Pave, a representative of the Union during which the Union sought recognition from Respondent as bargaining agent for the production and maintenance employees of Respondent. The Union filed a petition for an election on July 8 which was served by registered mail on Respondent and received by it on July 14. At the end of that workday, the five alleged discriminatees in this case were told they were laid off under circumstances as to which there is general agreement. Other areas of testimony are in dispute and will be discussed herein.

In their closing arguments, the General Counsel and the Union observed that the preponderance of the evidence in this case requires a finding that Respondent discharged the five alleged discriminatees because of their activities on behalf of the Union. That contention is offered on two bases. The initial theory of the General Counsel is that the totality of the circumstantial evidence in this case impels a finding that these employees were discriminatorily discharged. The General Counsel, as does the Union, separately contends that the direct testimony of surprise witness Rossi respecting Respondent's antiunion motivation should be credited and, on that basis too, they assert that the violation must be found.

Respondent contends that it was at all times motivated solely by economic considerations, that its decision to cut back the size of its work force was due to the fact that it was "over staffed" and that that determination has clearly been supported by its subsequent productivity records which indicate that Respondent has been able to produce as many bicycles per employee as it had prior to the reduction in force.

I credit Rossi's testimony that he was told by Mark Worksman that Respondent intended to get rid of the five individuals named in the complaint in this case as the "Union troublemakers." Respondent suggests that his testimony should not be credited on the grounds that it was but a vindictive act on Rossi's part, resulting from Respondent's refusal to capitulate to Rossi's demands on its separate dispute with Rossi. While I have some reservations that Rossi acted entirely out of unselfish considerations, I am satisfied that he is not so foolish as to risk a citation for perjury to obtain some measure of revenge against a former business associate. In assessing whether Rossi was involved at the hearing in an effort to blackmail Respondent, as has been asserted, I have to take into account also that the evidence discloses that it was Respondent who took the initiative in arranging a meeting with Rossi on the day of the hearing and that it was Respondent's sales manager who suggested to Rossi that he should leave the hearing without testifying. In making the foregoing credibility resolution, I note also the improbabilities and the inconsistencies in Mark Worksman's account respecting the reasons for the termination of the five individuals in this case. The confused testimony as to exactly when and how Respondent selected those employees for layoff raises considerable doubt in my mind as to its veracity. Some of the inconsistencies are small but nonetheless revealing. Thus, Plant Manager Feis stated that he first learned of the decision to terminate the five individuals after he had given a list of nine names to Mark Worksman. Worksman made no reference to such a list but instead indicated that he himself had made up a list of seven names. Feis stated that he learned for the first time on the Friday before the Monday, July 14, of the identity of the five to be laid off and then modified that answer to state that he was told of the names of those five on the morning of July 14 around 9 a.m., before the coffeebreak. Worksman's testimony respecting the details as to selection of the five employees for discharge was most convoluted. Without belaboring it, I note that he finally said that the decision to terminate the five employees was announced to Feis on July 14, after the coffeebreak. His effort to convince me that he made the decision to discharge the five employees in this case before Respondent was aware that the Union had filed a representation petition was a failure. I also find most unconvincing and confusing Mark Worksman's testimony respecting his statement, on the one hand, that he did not take immediate action in early July to reduce the work force because he felt a moral responsibility to the city under the Urban Development Program. His testimony suggested that he wanted to wait until the employees involved had at least completed their training programs. As it turned out, several of the discriminatees named in the complaint had as of then long since completed their training programs and had been "full wage earners" for several months. In its brief, Respondent pressed its view that the five employees were laid off because of overstaffing. The short answer to this is that Respondent had continued to hire employees long after it states it had become aware in January 1980 that it was overstaffed. For that matter, one of the very employees alleged as a discriminatee was hired in March 1980. I find no merit in Respondent's defense and conclude instead that the reasons it offered for the discharges of the five individuals in this case were pretextual.

In view of the activities of these five employees for the Union, the fact that Respondent was aware of the Union's activity, the timing of their discharges in relation to the filing of the Union's petition, the vacillating explanations given them on July 14 and the other circumstances (including the fact that several of the discriminatees received wage increases shortly before their layoff and that all were laid off without warning on the first day of the week), the pretextual nature of the reasons given by Respondent for having terminated those employees, and the credited testimony of Rossi, I conclude that those five employees were discharged because of their activities on behalf of the Union and because Respondent sought to discourage its employees from joining or supporting the Union.[4]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By having discharged the five employees named in the complaint in this case and by thereafter having failed and refused to reinstate them to their former positions of employment, because they engaged in activities on behalf of the Union and because Respondent sought thereby to discourage its employees from joining or supporting the Union, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act and has thereby engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and Respondent has discriminated against its employees to discourage their activities for and membership in the Union and has thereby engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

4. The foregoing unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. It having been found that Respondent unlawfully discharged the five employees named in the complaint, I shall recommend that it be ordered to offer them immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits. Their loss of earnings shall be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest thereon as set forth in Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Upon the foregoing findings of fact and conclusions of law, upon the entire record and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[5]

The Respondent, Worksman Trading Corporation, Ozone Park, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discharging any of its employees because of their activities on behalf of Local 29, Retail, Wholesale Department Store Union, AFL-CIO (herein called the Union), or to discourage its employees from joining or supporting the Union.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action, which I find is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer to Robert Thomas, Juan Rivera, Joseph Lomuscio, Tyrone Townsend, and John Dantzler immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent employment, and make them whole for all losses of pay they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against them in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its facilities in New York, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 29, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JENKINS, ZIMMERMAN, AND HUNTER

On September 15, 1981, Administrative Law Judge James M. Kennedy issued the attached Decision in this proceeding.[1] Thereafter, Respondent and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommendation.[2]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommendation of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the original Order in St. Elizabeth Community Hospital, 237 NLRB 849 (1978), be, and it hereby is, reaffirmed.

---

DECISION ON REMAND

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES M. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge: On August 24, 1978, the National Labor Relations Board issued its original Decision and Order in this proceeding granting the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.[1] The Board found that Respondent St. Elizabeth Community Hospital had committed unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, herein the Act, by refusing to bargain with the Charging Party, Hospital and Institutional Workers Union, Local 250, SEIU, AFL-CIO. Thereafter, Respondent petitioned the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit for review of the Board's Order and the Board's cross-petition for enforcement.

The court of appeals, in its per curiam opinion issued August 21, 1980, Judge Sneed dissenting,[2] remanded the case to the Board for consideration of Respondent's first amendment challenge to the Board's assertion of jurisdiction in light of the Supreme Court's decision in N.L.R.B. v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago.[3]

Accordingly, the remand was heard before me on May 14, 1981, in San Francisco, California. Upon a review of the entire record, the proceedings, and briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following:

I. BACKGROUND

The facts relating to the nature of Respondent's business are not in dispute. Respondent is a California nonprofit corporation, licensed as an acute care hospital, servicing the community of Red Bluff, California. The corporation is owned and operated by the Omaha (Nebraska) Provinciate of the Sisters of Mercy, a pontifical order of the Roman Catholic Church.[4] The Omaha Provinciate operated 14 health care facilities in the western portion of the United States. Nationally, the order operates, through other provinciates and mother houses independent of the provinciates, some 100 hospitals. Respondent's California corporate charter sets forth two purposes of the corporation. Its specific and primary purpose is to "own, operate and manage a charitable hospital . . . ." Its other general purpose is to operate the hospital "in compliance with the objectives and philosophy" of the Sisters of Mercy. Furthermore, the charter sets forth some limitations on the nature of the medical services to be performed. It prohibits "any direct abortion or any other medical or surgical services or procedures in conflict with the officially adopted policies of . . . the moral teachings of the Roman Catholic Church." It concludes, stating that the hospital will endeavor to provide medical assistance to "all persons regardless of race, color or religious affiliation."

The corporate charter also provides that Respondent's board of directors be composed of 50 percent Sisters of Mercy or mercypersons.[5] All of the directors are selected and approved by the Omaha Provinciate. They usually come from the local community. They are not required to be Roman Catholics but must follow the corporate charter and enforce the philosophy of the hospital. The title to the real property on which the hospital is located rests with Respondent Corporation.

The hospital currently employs approximately 250 employees. Four of these individuals are members of the order. One of these is Director Barry's assistant; the other three are associated with the pastoral care department. The purpose of that department is to provide spiritual assistance to patients and staff as needed. This includes a continual effort on their part to keep the spirit of Christian brotherhood alive as it relates to providing patient care.

[4] Unlike other orders of the Catholic Church, a pontifical order reports directly to the Pope, not indirectly through an Archdiocese.

[5] A mercyperson is an individual who is not a member of the order, but who has embraced the philosophy of the Sisters. R. Michael Barry, the hospital's administrator is a mercyperson and he, together with the four members of the order who are assigned to Respondent, sit on its board of directors.

As in all Catholic hospitals, Bibles, crucifixes, and other religious symbols can be found throughout. The hospital has a chapel which is used by Catholic priests for religious services such as communion. Clergymen of the other faiths use it as well. When not in use, it is open to patients.

All hospital meetings open with a prayer and a prayer is said twice daily over the hospital's public address system. Hospital employees are not required to participate in these ceremonies, although some do. Furthermore, the pastoral care department may ask the assistance of an employee to ready the chapel for a religious service. That duty is, however, not mandatory and may be refused. In that circumstance, naturally, the department relies on employees who are willing to perform that task. An employee may, however, be required to awaken, dress, and otherwise prepare a patient for a religious service.

Respondent observes religious holidays in the sense that they are celeberated; in addition, Respondent's employees receive seven paid holidays per year: all are Federal holidays, including Christmas.

Consistent with the teachings of the Catholic Church, and with its corporate charter, Respondent declines to provide birth control services and assistance and will not perform abortions in circumstances where the procedure is not medically indicated. In addition, of course, it will not engage in the practice of euthanasia, which in any event is prohibited by state laws governing homicide.

Respondent, like all hospitals in the State, is regulated by the State Department of Health and is annually licensed by it. If it, or any other hospital, wishes to increase the number of beds by constructing a hospital addition or wishes to provide new equipment involving substantial cost, it must demonstrate the community's need to a local board and then obtain the approval of the Department of Health. It is exempt from Federal income taxation. It does not receive any public grants, although some patients pay their fees through Federal, state, or county medical assistance programs.

In conclusion, it is fair to say that Respondent, as operated by the Sisters of Mercy, is a health care institution which attempts to combine medical science with that teaching of Christ encouraging the healing of the sick. As the General Counsel concedes, the Sisters of Mercy "try to inculcate into each employee the idea that service to the patients is service to the Lord." Both employees and patients are given statements of Respondent's philosophy to that effect. Thus, while Respondent's employees are not required to be Roman Catholics and are not required to participate in religious activities, nonetheless they are held to a standard of conduct which is measured by the Sisters' perception of "Christian morality." This concept appears to be somewhat fluid in application for as Sister Mary Kieran Harney, a director, said, the hospital would frown on an employee espousing philosophies contrary to those of the church while at work, implying that for the most part such conduct would be ignored if it occurred outside the hospital. Nevertheless, it appears that the hospital could become concerned about the lifestyles of epmployees when they are not at work. She cited an occasion where a managerial employee at another hospital was asked to resign because he engaged in wife swapping, conduct not meeting the Christian morality standard.

With regard to Respondent's ability to engage in collective bargaining, Administrator Barry testified that he could see a potential for conflict if the hospital negotiated an agreement containing a "just cause" clause governing the discharge of employees. He suggested that Church doctrine and the just cause concept would become antagonistic in the event an employee was discovered performing prohibited tasks such as providing birth control devices or performing abortions. In examining this hypothetically, while I do not wish to predict the future, it appears to me that his concern is factually unwarranted. An employer may, of course, choose not to engage in a certain type of business, as Respondent has here. It deliberately chooses not to engage in birth control assistance or abortions. The fact that its refusal is based on religious grounds appears to me to be of no significance, for a hospital may also choose not to perform other types of medical services, whether for religious reasons or simply because it deems them to be good business. In the event that an employee engaged in prohibited business, it seems unlikely that an arbitrator would find his subsequent discipline not to be for just cause. In any event, the probability of such an incident is very low indeed, particularly as there are other hospitals in the community which provide the services in question.

II. THE SCOPE OF THE COURT'S REMAND ORDER

This case was originally decided by the Board in summary judgment proceedings; accordingly, no testimony or documentary evidence was then adduced. Respondent had raised its first amendment challenge to the Board's jurisdiction during postelection procedures. The Board rejected it as not timely, but the court, in denying enforcement of the 8(a)(5) order which followed, held it was. The court's remand requires the Board to consider this case "in light" of N.L.R.B. v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, supra. It did not specifically discuss the applicability of the 1974 health care amendments to the Act, particularly Section 2(2) and (14).

When the Congress was considering that particular amendment, it was aware that religious institutions operated a large number of hospitals in the United States, and, in fact, considered exempting one or more religions from the amendment's coverage in order to avoid a conflict with those churches' religious doctrines.

The court did not discuss the congressional intent with respect to Section 2(2) and (14), although it may have done so by implication as its order requires the Board to deal with the constitutionality of the Act insofar as it is applied to this Respondent. Catholic Bishop, of course, was not decided by the Supreme Court until 1979 some 5 years after the passage of the health care amendments. Moreover, Catholic Bishop dealt with educational institutions rather than hospitals and nursing homes. The Court held that since the Act did not specifically authorize coverage of parochial schools, the Board's exercise of jurisdiction over them was erroneous.

Because of the differing natures of the two types of institutions, it appears appropriate to deal with the applicability of the 1974 amendments before addressing any constitutional question. Such analysis is clearly consistent with the Court's order to consider the matter in light of Catholic Bishop.

III. THE HEALTH CARE AMENDMENT OF 1974

In Mid American Health Services, Inc., 247 NLRB 752, 753 (1980), the Board set forth the history of the 1974 health care amendments and concluded they constituted a clear congressional mandate to assert jurisdiction over church-operated health care institutions, in that instance an arm of the Seventh Day Adventist Church. In that case, the Board said:

> The health care amendments, inter alia, removed the preexisting jurisdictional exemption accorded nonprofit hospitals by Section 2(2) of the Act.[6] Given earlier Board determinations,[7] the repeal of the exemption for nonprofit hospitals in effect brought all privately owned health care institutions within the Board's legal jurisdiction. The Seventh Day Adventist Church, throughout the amendment process, opposed repeal of the exemption, on grounds which included those constitutional claims advanced in this proceeding. Thus, the church advocated an amendment which would have maintained a jurisdictional exemption for any hospital which "opposes unionization because of historically held religious teachings or tenets."[8] No such amendment was introduced by any member of the Congress. Senator Ervin did introduce[9] a proposed proviso to the new Section 2(14) of the amendments (setting forth the definition of a "health care institution") which would have maintained a jurisdictional exemption for hospitals "owned, supported, controlled or managed by a particular religion or by a particular religious corporation or association." The Ervin amendment was rejected by the Senate.[10] This legislative history, when coupled with the enactment by Congress of other legislation specifically directed toward the problem of potential conflict between an employee's religious beliefs and collective-bargaining responsibilities,[11] removes, in our judgment, any doubt that the Congress clearly intended the Act to apply to health care institutions operated by religious institutions in general and the Seventh Day Adventist Church in particular.

In Catholic Bishop, the Supreme Court held that the Board did not have jurisdiction over the parochial schools in question because there was no showing of a specific congressional intent to mandate their coverage under the Act. Here, as the Board has held, such an intent is present. Reviewing the congressional record relating to the 1974 health care amendments, see the General Counsel's Exhibit 2, it is quite clear that Congress had the opportunity to specifically exclude religiously operated hospitals from the Act's coverage, but declined to do so. Therefore, the conclusion is inescapable that Congress intended those hospitals to be covered by the 1974 amendments. To that extent, therefore, Catholic Bishop of Chicago is distinguishable.

IV. THE CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUE

Under normal circumstances, there is a philosophical question regarding whether or not an administrative agency, such as the Board, should attempt to detemine the constitutionality of its own act. Indeed, the Board in Mid American Health Services, Inc. supra, stated that it would follow the congressional mandate and leave to the courts the "final determination concerning the constitutionality of that mandate . . . ." This, however, is not the normal case. The court of appeals has specifically directed the Board to determine whether or not the assertion of jurisdiction over Respondent is constitutional.

While Respondent acknowledges there is no doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church which, per se, condemns unionization of its employees or precludes bargaining with a union which is the exclusive representative of its employees,[6] it nonetheless asserts that the Board's assertion of jurisdiction would foster excessive entanglement between the Church and the State in the person of the Board. It reaches this conclusion by asserting that the religious environment of the hospital necessarily leads to a substantial potential for government entanglement with the affairs of the Church. The General Counsel disagrees, based on the evidence which he contends "fails to establish that the assertion of jurisdiction . . . would impair the ability of Respondent or the Sisters of Mercy to practice their religion or that the assertion of jurisdiction would infringe on their constitutional rights under the establishment clause or the free exercise clause of the First Amendment."

[6] Prior to the health care amendments, Sec. 2(2) provided, in relevant part, that: "The term 'employer' . . . shall not include . . . any corporation or associtition operating a hospital, if no part of the net earnings inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual."

[7] See Butte Medical Properties, d/b/a Medical Center Hospital, 168 NLRB (1967) (proprietary hospitals); University Nursing Home, Inc., 168 NLRB 263 (1967) (proprietary nursing home and related facilities); Drexel Home, Inc., 182 NLRB 1045 (1970) (nonprofit nursing homes and related facilities).

[8] See, generally, "Hearings on S. 794 S. 2292 Before the Senate Subcommittee on Labor of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, 93d Cong., 1st sess." 483–547 (1973) (hereinafter Senate Hearings).

[11] Sec. 19, added to the Act by the health care amendments, states:

> Any employee of a health care institution who is a member of and adheres to established and traditional tenets or teachings of a bona fide religion, body, or sect which had historically held conscientious objections to joining for financially supporting labor organizations shall not be required to join or financially support any labor organization as a condition of employment; except that such employee may be required, in lieu of periodic dues and initiation fees, to pay sums equal to such dues and initiation fees to a nonreligious charitable fund exempt from taxation under section 501 (c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code, chosen by such employee from a list of at least three such funds, designated in a contract between such institution and a labor organization, or if the contract fails to designate such funds, then to any such fund choosen by the employee.

Indeed, Sec. 19 closely resembles another proposal submitted to Congress in 1973 by the Seventh Day Adventist Church itself. See Senate Hearings, supra, fn. 8 at 409–510. In Catholic Bishop of Chicago, supra, the Supreme Court characterized Sec. 19 as "reflecting congressional sensitivity to First Amendment guarantees."

[6] Indeed, the Church officially encourages labor unions as a responsible means of implementing social justice in the workplace. Whether that encouragement is directed at itself as an employer is unclear. See "The Condition of Labor," Encyclical of Pope Leo XIII (1891), reprinted in "Four Great Encyclicals: Labor, Education, Marriage, the Socialist Order," Paulist Press, New York, New York (undated).

In Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 at 612-613 (1971), the Supreme Court established a three-pong test to determine the constitutionality of church-government relationships: First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose. Second, the law's principal primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion. Finally, the statute must not foster "an excessive entanglement with religion."

The first two tests are not at issue here. The legislative purpose of the Act, as amended, is a secular one: promotion of industrial peace in the health care industry. Further, the primary purpose of the law is to grant certain industrial rights to employees and employers; thus, it in no way advances or inhibits religion. The question, therefore, is whether the Act's assertion of jurisdiction will foster excessive entanglement between Church and State.

The Supreme Court has held that total separation of Church and State is not possible in an absolute sense.[7] To determine the extent of the entanglement, it said, there must be an examination of the character and purpose of the church-related institution affected, the nature of the intrusion, and the resulting relationship between the government and the religious authority.[8] In Lemon, the Court observed that "parochial schools involve substantial religious activity and purpose." The Court also noted that the teachers had been directed to follow a specific policy of proselytizing. It quoted a school handbook for teachers which said, "Religious formation is not confined to formal courses; nor is it restricted to a single subject area" and concluded that teachers were to stimulate interest in religious vocations and missionary work. Finally, the Court said that church "[d]octrines and faith are not inculcated or advanced by neutrals. With the best of intentions such a teacher would find it hard to make a total separation between secular teaching and religious doctrine."[9] The hospital here has given no similar instructions to its employees. The Court further observed in Lemon that the state activities there in question required the state annually to oversee the salary supplements and textbook purchasing programs under scrutiny. This ongoing relationship created an impermissible excessive governmental entanglement in the affairs of the church-operated schools.

In Catholic Bishop of Chicago, supra, as in Lemon, the Court was again concerned with religion and the State, this time in the context of regulation of employee representation through the Board. But it must be remembered that Catholic Bishop, dealt with parochial school systems, having an educational purpose through which religious doctrine can easily be taught, rather than as here, a hospital whose primary purpose is medical care and whose religious purpose is more neutral than that of a parochial school. But the Court did not decide Catholic Bishop on "excessive entanglement" grounds. Indeed it did not decide any constitutional issue. Instead it held that, as noted, the Congress had never specifically intended, in passing the National Labor Relations Act, for the Board to assert jurisdiction over parochial schools, a holding of statutory construction. However, the case has been read to be broader than that and it appears from its decisional language, that the court of appeals, in this remand, is concerned with the constitutional tension which Respondent sees between the Act and the first amendment, not statutory construction.

To put this alleged tension in perspective, I believe it is wise to recall first the constitutional underpinning of the National Labor Relations Act, as well as to note some subsequent constitutional developments. In its original decision holding the Act constitutional the Supreme Court said:

> in its present application, the statute goes no further than to safeguard the right of employees to self-organization and to select representatives of their own choosing for collective bargaining or other mutual protection without restraint or coercion by their employer.
> That is a fundamental right. Employees have as clear a right to organize and select their representatives for lawful purpose as the Respondent has to organize its business and select its own officers and agents. [Emphasis supplied.][10]

Subsequent to that decision the Supreme Court and various circuit courts of appeal further clarified the declaration of the fundmental right of employees to organize, finding it implicit in the first amendment's free assembly language. Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 at 432 (1944); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 at 485-487 (1960); McLaughlin v. Tilendis, 398 F.2d 287 (7th Cir. 1968); American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees v. Woodward, 406 F.2d 137 (8th Cir. 1969). These cases do no more than hold that the right of employees to self-organization is constitutionally protected. They do not go on to say that the right to organize includes other rights such as mandating employer recognition, collective bargaining, or striking. Those rights are legislatively granted through regulatory enactments such as the Act. Thus the Act has a clear constitutional foundation, even if that foundation is limited in scope. It cannot be said, therefore, that the Act is simply an exercise of the general legislative power. It is more than that. Consequently when the Act and a constitutional right such as freedom of religion become opposed, great care should be taken to protect both interests.

Undoubtedly, the test set forth in the Court's decision in Serbet v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 at 403 (1963), will be helpful in avoiding unnecessary infringement of either right.[11] There the Court held that constitutional rights may suffer an "incidental burden" if a "compelling state interest" in regulating other subjects can be shown. It has long been held that certain conduct, though impelled by religious beliefs, may be regulated or even prohibited because of such a compelling interest. Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 at 303–304 (1940); Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599 at 603–604 (1960); Cap Santa Vue, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 424 F.2d 883 (D.C. Cir. 1970).

The issue then is whether or not the Act is a legislatve expression of a "compelling state interest." On the basis of the congressional debate over the 1974 health care amendments, as well as awareness of our national history of labor strife leading first to the passage of the Wagner Act, followed by subsequent amendments, one must conclude that that it is. Cf. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., supra. Having reached that conclusion, all that needs be done is to determine if the Board's regulation of that interest will involve it is "excessive" or only "incidental" entanglement in religion as described in Lemon v. Kurtzman, supra.

Based on the facts adduced at the hearing, I find that the risk of entanglement is slight and at worst can only be incidental. That conclusion, it seems to me, is consistent with the District of Columbia Circuit's decision in Cap Santa Vue, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., supra, which presented a conflict even greater than that suggested here. There, the owners of two nursing homes were practicing members of the Seventh Day Adventist Church which, unlike the Roman Catholic Church, actually has a doctrine which in effect prohibits its members from joining or bargaining with labor unions. The Court held, nonetheless, that the nursing homes were obligated to recognize and bargain with the labor union which the Board had certified as the majority representative of their employees. It held that the certification in no way impeded the right of the Seventh Day Adventist owners to hold to their beliefs and ordered them to comply with the Act's secular purpose. The court in Cap Santa Vue foresaw no significant intrusion on the owner's religious beliefs. The intrusion was, therefore, only incidental.

The only factor distinguishing that case from this is that the nursing homes there did not make the "excessive entanglement" argument which the hospital is making here. Even so, the only entanglements envisioned by the hospital are the following:

> 1. It is conceivable the Hospital might discharge an employee for failing to meet "Christian morality" standards but the Bord might deem those standards a pretext if changes were brought under Section 8(a)(1) or (3) of the Act.
> 2. Assuming the Hospital negotiated a collective bargaining contract with the Union containing a requirement that employees be discharged only for "good cause," it is conceivable that an employee could be discharged for participating in birth control and/or abortion procedures using hospital premises. Since those procedures are prohibited by the Church, the Hospital surmises that an arbitrator might require it to reinstate such an individual.

With regard to the latter circumstances, as I have earlier alluded in the factual section of this Decision, it is highly unlikely that an arbitrator would reach such a decision, particularly in view of the corporate charter's specific prohibition. Moreover, the hospital's concern is only speculation. It may well negotiate a collective-bargaining contract covering such misconduct and it is certainly premature to assume that the Union would disregard such policies. With regard to the first concern, again, the matter seems entirely speculative and an unlikely scenario. Certainly it would not involve ongoing scrutiny by the Board which can act only when charges are filed. Even then the Board would have to respect the argument. If it did not, review of alleged Board abuse is available in the courts of appeal. Even if that constituted "entanglement," it would not be "excessive." Accordingly, I conclude that in the circumstances of this case the Board's exercise of jurisdiction is appropriate.

To reiterate, even though the hospital is church-related, its primary purpose is the delivery of medical care. There is little, if any, sectarian mission outwardly manifested in the hospital's purpose; indeed, the sectarian mission of the teaching of Christ regarding healing is carried out by example, not deliberate education. Therefore, I conclude that the right of employees to select and be represented by collective-bargaining agent will not interfere with the free exercise of religion or tend to establish a religion. Most importantly it will not result in excessive governmental entanglement in the Catholic religion, for there will be no intimate, continuing relationship between the Board and Respondent.[12]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent St. Elizabeth Community Hospital, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

2. Hospital and Institutional Workers Local Union No. 250, SEIU, AFL–CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The assertion of jurisdiction by the Board over Respondent will not cause the Board to become excessively entangled in the affairs of Respondent insofar as it is a religious institution and therefore will not infringe upon the free exercise of the religious beliefs of its owners.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On February 5, 1981, Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached Supplemental Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a brief in support thereof and in opposition to the General Counsel's and the Charging Party's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Lion Uniform, Janesville Apparel Division, Lake City, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

[1] The General Counsel in effect has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings. We do note, however, that Respondent sold its Lake City, Tennessee, facility in September 1979 not in September 1978 as noted by the Administrative Law Judge.

[2] In affirming the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that the strike in this proceeding has not been shown to have been an unfair labor practice strike, we do not rely on his comments that certain prior unlawful conduct of Respondent had been cured at the time the strike began by a then-outstanding settlement agreement. Rather, we agree that any unfair labor practices that were found were not sufficiently shown to have motivated the strike.

We further find it unnecessary to pass on Respondent's contention that the Administrative Law Judge was barred from considering the legality of its January 5, 1978, decision not to return its fire coat work to its Lake City, Tennessee, plant since we agree in any event with the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that this action did not violate Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard on September 8, 9, 10, and 11, and October 14 and 15, 1980, in Clinton, Tennessee. The charge in Case 10-CA-12938 was filed on July 19, 1977, and was amended on August 3 and 17, 1977. The charge in Case 10-CA-13089 was filed on September 19, 1977. The charge in Case 10-CA-13284-2 was filed on November 30, 1977, and amended on January 30, 1978. An order consolidating cases, complaint, and notice of hearing issued in Cases 10-CA-12938 and 10-CA-13089 on November 17, 1977. Subsequently, on February 9, 1978, a complaint issued in Case 10-CA-13284-2 along with an order consolidating cases and notice of hearing as to all three of the above-mentioned cases.[1] Pursuant to those complaints, a hearing was held before Administrative Law Judge Michael O. Miller on May 15 and 16, 1978, in Clinton, Tennessee. On June 8, 1978, Administrative Law Judge Miller issued a Decision and Order approving a settlement agreement. The General Counsel took exception to Administrative Law Judge Miller's Decision. On February 11, 1980, the National Labor Relations Board issued an order reversing the Administrative Law Judge and remanding this matter to the Regional Director. On May 8, 1980, the Regional Director issued a notice of hearing pursuant to which this matter was heard.

Upon the entire record,[2] my observation of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, the Charging Party, and Respondent, I hereby make the following findings:

During the spring and summer of 1977 Respondent's employees[4] engaged in a union organizational campaign.

[1] Although the three captioned cases were consolidated on February 9, 1978, the Regional Director elected not to consolidate the complaints. That procedure necessitates action which unnecessarily complicates isolation of litigable issues. It is necessary to review each separate complaint and answer in order to completely isolate and consider the issues. Such a process appears to violate the spirit and, perhaps, the letter of Rule 8(e) and (f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

[2] In accord with discussions during the hearing herein, I have based my findings of fact on both the record developed in the hearing before me and the exhibits received by both Administrative Law Judge Miller and me.

[3] Respondent admitted the commerce allegations in the complaint. On the basis of that admission, I find that Respondent is and has been at all times material herein an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(6) and (7) of the Act. Respondent also admitted, and I find, that the Charging Party (Union) is and has been at all times material herein a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

In the absence of opposition to Respondent's motion to correct the transcript, that motion is hereby granted.

[4] During the hearing, the parties stipulated, and I find, that the below-described unit constitutes an appropriate bargaining unit and is the unit for which the Union was ultimately certified as bargaining representative:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees employed by the Employer at its Lake City, Tennessee plant, including the leadman and plant clerical employees, but excluding office clerical employees and professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

On July 14, 1977, the Regional Office conducted an election to determine if Respondent's unit employees desired to be represented by the Union. The Union prevailed in that election and was certified by the Regional Director as bargaining unit representative on August 26, 1977. On October 6, 1977, that certification was sustained by action of the Board.

The complaint alleges and Respondent admits that it engaged in numerous actions in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act during its employees' union organizing campaign. However, Respondent denies allegations that it engaged in other 8(a)(1) violations as well as 8(a)(3) and (5) allegations which allegedly occurred at various times after the election.

On October 12, 1977, the unit employees struck Respondent's Lake City, Tennessee, facility. The General Counsel alleges that that strike was caused and prolonged by Respondent's unfair labor practices and is therefore an unfair labor practice strike.

At the time of its employees' strike, Respondent's production at its Lake City facility was limited to the production of firemen's clothing.[5] On October 24, 1977, Respondent removed its firemen's clothing production from its Lake City facility to a facility it owned in Beattyville, Kentucky. The General Counsel alleges that by moving its facility from Lake City without first negotiating with the Union, Respondent violated both Section 8(a)(3) and (5) of the Act.

By telegram dated October 23, 1977, Respondent advised the Union that its removal of fire coat production from Lake City was temporary. However, the Union received another telegram from an agent of Respondent indicating that the removal of the firemen's clothing production line was necessitated by the need to expand Respondent's facilities.

During October 1977 the parties began collective-bargaining negotiations. Negotiation sessions were held on October 25, November 1, 2, and 28, December 15 and 16, 1977, and on January 4, 5, 6, 23, and 24, March 21, May 24, and September 14, 1978.

By letter dated January 5, 1978, Respondent advised the Union that it had tentatively decided to leave the firemen's clothing production line at Beattyville. However, Respondent advised the Union that jobs would be available at Lake City for employees who desired to end the strike.

On May 16, 1978, the Union advised Respondent that it was ending the strike and offering, on behalf of unit employees, to return to work unconditionally.

Between May 31 and June 20, 1978, all striking employees were offered reinstatement by Respondent at its Lake City facility.

On September 28, 1978, Respondent sold its Lake City facility to FMK. The General Counsel did not contend that Respondent engaged in illegal activity by selling the Lake City facility.

By letter dated August 29, 1980, Respondent offered all employees engaged in the strike during October 12, 1977, through May 16, 1978, the opportunity to move to Beattyville with moving expenses, to make fire coats.

B. Findings

1. The preelection 8(a)(1) violations

The complaint in Cases 10-CA-12938 and 10-CA-13089 alleged, and Respondent admitted, the matters set forth below.[6] On the basis of the allegations and admissions, I find that the following activity occurred as alleged and that all the following constitute separate 8(a)(1) violations:[7]

(a) Respondent, by its following-named supervisors and agents, on or about the dates following their names, in and about the vicinity of its plant, interrogated its employees concerning their union membership, activities, and desires: Plant Manager Ray Roaden, May 23, June 10, 17, and July 7, 12, and 13, 1977; and Supervisor Faye McGee, May 27 and June 23, 1977.

(b) Respondent, by its following-named supervisors and agents, on or about the dates following their names, in and about the vicinity of its plant, threatened employees that selection of the Union as their collective-bargaining representative would be futile by telling the employees that Respondent would not negotiate with the Union, that Respondent would never have a union at its plant, and that the Union could not solve the employees' problems: Owner Clarence Lapedes, May 5 and June 1, 1977; Vice President Sydney Burns, July 7, 1977; and Plant Manager Ray Roaden, May 18, 23, 25, June 6, and July 12, 1977.

(c) Respondent, by its following-named supervisors and agents, on or about the dates following their names, in and about the vicinity of its plant, threatened its employees with discharge if they joined, or engaged in activities on behalf of, the Union: Plant Manager Ray Roaden, July 13, 1977; Supervisor Faye McGee, July 13, 1977; and Employee Lena Miles, May 27, 1977.

(d) Respondent, by its following-named officers, supervisors, and agents, on or about the dates following their respective names, in and about the vicinity of its plant, threatened its employees that Respondent would close its plant if the employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative: Owner Clarence Lapedes, May 5 and June 1, 1977; Plant Manager Ray Roaden, May 18, 25, 27, June 1, and July 11, 12, and 13, 1977; Employee Lena Miles, May 27, 1977; and Supervisor Faye McGee, July 7, 1977.

(e) Respondent, by its following-named supervisors and agents, on or about the dates following their names, in and about the vicinity of its plant, promised its employees employment for themselves and the relatives of its employees if its employees rejected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative: Plant Manager Ray Roaden, June 17, 1977; Supervisor Fay McGee, May 30, 1977; and employee Lena Miles, May 27, 1977.

[5] Firemen's clothing includes several items which make up firemen's coats and trousers. On occasion "firemen's clothing" is referred to as "fire coats."

[6] Respondent argued that the Regional Director erred by setting aside a prior settlement agreement on November 14, 1977. The settlement agreement was approved on August 28, 1977. In view of my findings herein that Respondent engaged in violative conduct on August 31 and October 12, 1977, I find no basis to rescind the Regional Director's November 14 action.

[7] In that regard, Respondent admitted that as to these proceedings all the persons named in this section were either supervisors and agents or agents at material times.

(f) Respondent, by its supervisor and agent, Plant Manager Ray Roaden, on or about July 11, 1977, in and about the vicinity of its plant, solicited its employees to influence other employees to vote against the Union.

(g) Respondent, by its following-named officers' supervisors, and agents, on and about the dates following their respective names, in and about the vicinity of its plant, threatened its employees that Respondent had canceled its plans for plant expansion and installation of air-conditioning in its plant because of their membership in, and activities on behalf of, the Union: Owner Clarence Lapedes, May 5, 1977, and Supervisor Faye McGee, July 14, 1977.

(h) Respondent, by its supervisor and agent, Supervisor Faye McGee, on or about July 7, 1977, in and about the vicinity of its plant, threatened its employees that Respondent would withhold wage increases from its employees because of their activities on behalf of the Union.

(i) Respondent, by its supervisor and agent, Plant Manager Ray Roaden, on or about July 11, 1977, in and about the vicinity of its plant, promised its employees that Respondent would establish a grievance committee if its employees rejected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

2. The contested 8(a)(1) allegation

The complaint in Case 10-CA-13284-2 alleged that Respondent's Lake City plant manager, Ray Roaden, threatened employees with discharge if they supported or engaged in activities on behalf of the Union.

Lynda Strong testified that she was employed by Respondent at Lake City on October 12, 1977, when she and other employees went out on strike. As the employees walked out, Strong had a conversation with Plant Manager Roaden. Strong testified that she was asked by Roaden to return to work under the same working conditions. However, Strong testified that none of the employees wanted to go back in and that after the employees refused to go back in, Roaden "told us we were fired. The final thing he said, we were fired."[8]

I find no reason to discredit the testimony of Strong. She impressed me as a candid, straightforward witness. Respondent offered evidence that it was unaware of the whereabouts of former Plant Manager Ray Roaden. Roaden did not testify. Therefore, I credit the testimony of Strong, and find that Roaden told her that the employees were fired upon their refusal to return at the beginning of the strike. I find Roaden's statement was precipitated by Respondent's employees' strike activity and constitutes a threat in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[9]

3. The alleged unilateral changes of August 31, 1977

The General Counsel alleged that Respondent's Plant Manager Roaden instituted numerous unilateral changes during an August 31 speech to the employees.

Former employee Doris Swatzell testified that Roaden called a meeting on August 31, 1977, and "he told us you will, he said we weren't to be talking anymore, we were going to cut out going to the restroom, there would be no more being absent one or two days a week, no more being late and that he intended to give warning slips for this." Swatzell went on to testify that prior to the August 31 meeting none of the rules mentioned by Roaden had been in effect nor had they been enforced. On cross-examination Swatzell admitted that she used the bathroom at times when she was not permitted to, but that she did not receive a warning.

Former employee Cleta Long testified about Roaden's speech: "Mr. Roaden said that we had a work stoppage and he said that there was too much talking and too much going to the bathroom, too much walking around pretending to be working when we wasn't and he said that we were going to make fire coats if he had to work us 10 and 12 hours a day, seven days a week, and if he had to he would put on a night shift and we would train them." According to Long, Roaden also told them: "And he said that he had quit making coffee because he wasn't collecting enough money to pay for it and until he decided, we got together and decided, that he would make more coffee and that he was going to be watching us and if he gave out warning slips, if we got three warnings we would be fired. And he said he wasn't going to put up with being late, being absent and that when we missed a day, we had to come into his office and if our excuse was o.k. with him we could go back to work and if it wasn't, we would be fired." Long testified that none of the rules mentioned by Roaden in that speech had been brought to the attention of the employees prior to that day. Long admitted on cross-examination that rules similar to those mentioned by Roaden during the August 31 speech may have been posted in the plant prior to the time of the employees' union activity.

Former employee Lynda Strong also testified concerning Roaden's speech. Strong testified: "Mr. Roaden called us all together and he told us that we would not be allowed to go to the bathroom except, you know, except once in between breaks. He told us we were engaged in a work stoppage, that we would not be able to take vacation when we were supposed to." Strong also testified: "If we were absent, now I remember him saying something about our department being tardy, if we were tardy or absent we had to go into the office and see him before we went out on the floor. . . . He said he was going to start issuing warnings. . . . We were not to place our lunch orders anymore." Strong testified that employees would place lunch orders by calling restaurants outside the plant. On cross-examination Strong admitted that Respondent had posted work rules on the employee bulletin boards prior to the time the employees commenced their union activity.

[9] Eastern Smelting and Refining Corp., 237 NLRB 1312 (1978).

Respondent witness Thelma Wilson, a former employee, testified that Roaden's August 31 speech was precipitated by a slowdown by Respondent's employees. Wilson testified that the employees stayed in the bathroom and that "there was one girl in particular, she always took a nap on the floor." Wilson testified that Roaden, during his August 31 speech, told the employees that the slowdown "had to be stopped because they couldn't put out any work because they were spending to much time in the bathroom and killing too much time." Wilson testified that Roaden did mention rules during that speech, but the rules he referred to were the same rules which had been posted in the plant prior to the commencement of union activities.

Respondent also called former Supervisor Faye McGee. McGee also testified that there was a slowdown among the employees during August 1977. She testified that "the girls were staying in the bathroom too much and they were just wasting too much time and not putting out enough work." McGee testified that there was a bad "decrease in production." McGee testified that Roaden's address to the employees was because of the slowdown. McGee identified Respondent's rules which were, according to her, posted prior to the employees' union activity. She testified that those rules were in force and were enforced before August 31, 1977.

No evidence was offered to rebut the testimony of Wilson and McGee that some of the employees engaged in a slowdown in production during August 1977. However, there was also no evidence which rebutted testimony of Swatzell, Long, and Strong evidencing that Roaden's remarks demonstrated an intent to engage in stricter enforcement of work rules. Additionally, there was no rebuttal of testimony that certain aspects of Roaden's remarks transcended the established rules. In that regard, it is unrebutted that Roaden announced that Respondent would no longer make coffee for the employees and that employees would not be permitted to continue placing lunch orders from outside restaurants.

Those items are the type which the Board has traditionally found to impact employee working conditions and, therefore, constitute mandatory subjects of collective bargaining.[10] The alleged slowdown had apparently gone on for a couple of weeks at the time of Roaden's speech. There was no showing that emergency action was required or that any other circumstances existed which prevented Respondent from taking the time to notify the Union of its problem and contemplated action. Therefore, I find that Respondent informed its employees on August 31 that work rules would be more strictly enforced and that the employee privileges of having coffee and placing lunch orders through outside restaurants were being removed. Respondent took those actions without notifying and bargaining with the Union as the employee's exclusive collective-bargaining representative.[11]

4. The October 24 transfer of the firemen's clothing line to Beattyville, Kentucky

The complaint alleged that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (5) by unilaterally moving its firemen's clothing product line from Lake City to Beattyville on October 24 and thereby abolishing the jobs of various employees.

The evidence in regard to Respondent's move is not in conflict. Respondent offered evidence that it purchased a facility in Beattyville, Kentucky, shortly before the July 14, 1977, election. However, that purchase flowed from management action which started several years before the actual purchase. The evidence, which was not rebutted, was convincing that Respondent was engaged in plans to purchase a facility which would ultimately house the firemen's clothing production, before its Lake City employees started their union campaign.

Although Respondent was also considering the option of expanding its Lake City facility, the unrebutted evidence demonstrated that that option would have involved substantial costs. That cost would have been reflected both in the cost of constructing an additional facility at Lake City and the cost of financing that construction.[12] The evidence demonstrated that there were no existing facilities at Lake City which were available for Respondent's expansion.

When the Lake City employees struck on October 12, Respondent had not commenced any operations in Beattyville. The evidence reflected that because of the strike, Respondent was unable to continue production in Lake City. Therefore, on October 24 Respondent started to move its machinery and work in process to Beattyville.

At the time of its move, and for the prior 2 years, Respondent's only production in Lake City involved firemen's clothing. Following its October 24 move, Respondent resumed firemen's clothing production in Beattyville.

Respondent did not afford the Union an opportunity to negotiate before the October 24 move. Respondent sent the following telegram on October 23, which was received by the Union on October 24:

> NOTICE IS HERE WITH EXTENDED TO YOU THAT BECAUSE OF THE WORK STOPPAGE AND OUR CRITICAL NEED TO MANUFACTURE FIRECOATS, LION UNIFORM, JANESVILLE APPAREL DIVISION WILL BEGIN MANUFACTURING FIRECOATS ELSEWHERE ON A TEMPORARY BASIS. WE ARE HOPEFUL THIS SENSELESS WORK STOPPAGE WILL END SO THAT LION UNIFORM CAN RESUME OPERATIONS IN LAKE CITY. FURTHER, CONTINUED UNLAWFUL CONDUCT IN THE FACE OF A COURT RESTRAINING ORDER WILL FORCE US TO EXAMINE THE POSSIBILITY OF A SUIT FOR DAMAGES

[12] The evidence reflected that an additional 20,000-square-foot facility at Lake City would cost $334,500. However, the contractor retained to consider Lake City expansion recommended removal of the old facility and construction of a new 40,000-square-foot facility which would cost $600,000. The Beattyville facility which Respondent purchased contained 53,000 square feet and cost Respondent $400,000. The $400,000 was financed at a lower interest rate than any available at Lake City.

> AGAINST OCAW. SYDNEY BURNS, VICE PRESIDENT OF MANUFACTURING.

However, confusion resulted from a second telegram sent to the Union on October 24. Richard DuRose admitted that his telegram, which was sent at a time when he was unaware of Sydney Burns' telegram, resulted in possibly misleading the Union. His wire read:

> THIS IS TO INFORM YOU THAT LION UNIFORM IS TRANSFERRING ITS JANESVILLE MFG FROM ITS LAKE CITY, TENNESSEE PLANT TO OTHER PLANTS BECAUSE OF THE INCREASE IN BUSINESS IN THAT LINE OF GOODS AND THE LACK OF ROOM TO EXPAND. WE WILL BE TRANSFERRING OTHER WORK TO LAKE CITY IN THE FUTURE TO CONTINUE EMPLOYMENT FOR ANY WHO SO DESIRE. RICHARD A. DUROSE, ATTORNEY FOR LION UNIFORM.

Nevertheless, unrebutted evidence indicates on several occasions between October 24, 1977, and January 5, 1978, Respondent advised the Union that its October 24 move was temporary. John Williams, the Union's district director, admitted that Respondent "had told us consistently that they were going to return the firecoats back to Lake City." Respondent's attorney, DuRose, testified:

> Mr. Williams made a comment to me that he didn't want to spend a lot of time negotiating this contract because the company didn't have any jobs for the people and I said no, I didn't know how he got that idea but said that what happened was that the company—he was referring to the fact that the machinery had moved out of the Lake City plant—I told him that that was only because the company had some customers that were in urgent need of these fire coats they made at the plant and I explained to him that the company originally, when the strike first started, the company originally thought that they could use supervisors, and as I recall there were a number of employees that didn't join the picket line, that came in to work, and the company originally felt that the supervisory staff and the employees that came in to work, they could fill that order, but, uh, and I told Mr. Williams that it quickly became apparent that we couldn't do that and the reason for that is that the employees were prevented from coming in to work by the pickets.
> Mr. Williams indicated that he knew that was so, he either said something—I know at least that he and the committee smiled about that. I think they were proud of the fact that they had been able to keep the employees out.
> I said that as soon as the strike was ended, that we would bring the equipment back and we would open up the plant again.

Unrebutted evidence also demonstrated that the October 24 move was precipitated by the strike. That evidence proved that the move was not planned until around October 21. Respondent's former warehouse manager at another of its plants, Don Meadows, testified that he assisted in the move from Lake City to Beattyville. According to Meadows' testimony, the move was disorganized, unplanned, and chaotic. Meadows testified that he was prevented from moving everything by Respondent's vice president, Sydney Burns, who told him that they would be moving back to Lake City.

The record provided no basis on which I could find Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) or (5) by its October 24 move. The evidence clearly reflected that Respondent was prevented from continuing production by its employees' strike. The evidence also demonstrated that as to the firemen's clothing production, time was of the essence. According to unrebutted testimony, and documentary evidence, Respondent had fallen behind on its fire coat production schedule and was receiving customer complaints about its delay in supplying those garments. Those facts clearly support Respondent's contention that it faced serious customer losses if it permitted the strike to stop production. Therefore, I find that Respondent proved that the move was temporary and was necessitated by business reasons brought on by its employees' strike.[13]

There was no evidence offered demonstrating that Respondent's move to Beattyville transcended the "reasonable measures necessary in order to maintain operations in such circumstances." Empire Terminal Warehouse Company, 151 NLRB 1359 (1965). Despite Respondent's apparent union animus as evidenced by its illegal antiunion campaign, the record shows that Respondent engaged in good-faith negotiations with the Union beginning in October 1977. Moreover, when the strike ended, Respondent reinstated the striking employees and announced to its employees that it denounced actions which did not fully respect the employees' rights to associate with the Union. Furthermore, following its move, Respondent continuously took the position in its discussions with the Union that it would provide work for the employees at Lake City.

I find that this case falls within the scope of the rule announced in Empire Terminal Warehouse Company, supra, which held that similar conduct by an employer does not constitute violative action.[14]

In reaching this conclusion I am bothered by evidence which tends to show that Respondent was motivated by its employees' union activities. In May 1977, Respondent's owner threatened employees that it would close the plant and cancel expansion plans because of the union activities. Those threats would have been persuasive if Respondent had either closed the plant or canceled expansion activity without the intervention of other motivating events. However, the evidence failed to show that Respondent either closed the plant or canceled actual expansion activity. Although expansion was considered, Respondent never undertook such activity and its studies showed Lake City expansion would have been unduly expensive. Moreover, Respondent's alleged illegal activity came at a time when any other action or inaction could have endangered its continued viability.

5. The January 5, 1978, letter

The General Counsel also alleged that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by moving the firemen's clothing product line from Lake City to Beattyville, Kentucky, on January 5, 1978.[18] In support of its position, the General Counsel cited Townhouse T.V. & Appliances, 213 NLRB 716 (1974). I find the facts here are not similar to those in Townhouse.

On January 5, 1978, Respondent delivered the following letter to the Union:

> In order to save its fire coat and other Lake city business during your strike, the Company moved the production elsewhere. The move presented many difficulties and cause a considerable interruption in the supply of garments to its customers.
> Production of fire coats, etc., is now proceeding, although demand is making it difficult to meet schedules.
> The Company has tentatively concluded that it cannot run the business risks of attempting to relocate the fire coat and other Lake City production back in Lake City again. This tentative conclusion is based purely on very serious business problems—the interruption which would occur if machinery and materials had to be relocated, the risk of loss in transit, the risk of higher production costs in reassembling and possibly retraining a work force in Lake City, and the further delays in shipment to customers which would occur if anything went wrong in starting up again at Lake City.
> We are prepared to discuss any aspect of this matter, including the tentative conclusion itself, in good faith.
> The Company does plan to resume production, but of other products, at Lake City, when the strike is over.

The General Counsel contends that the above letter evidences an 8(a)(5) violation. I find that the evidence does not support that allegation.

The Union's director, John Williams, testified that there was no bargaining on Respondent's tentative decision to keep the firemen's clothing at Beattyville. However, other evidence which was unrebutted demonstrates that the Union was offered the opportunity to negotiate on Respondent's tentative decision.

The January 5 letter (above) states that Respondent was prepared to discuss its tentative decision to keep the firemen's clothing line in Beattyville. Respondent's vice president, Jan Spornhauer, testified that Respondent's attorney, Dean Denlinger, tried to explain to the Union during the January 5 negotiating session why Respondent felt it could not return the fire coats to Lake City,[19] but that John Williams said he "didn't want to listen to [Respondent's] reasons and that he wanted the fire coats back at Lake City as a matter of principle." Spornhauer went on to testify that "Sydney Burns said that Lion was 120 days behind schedule, and that the return of fire coats production back to Lake City would cause an economic hardship to Lion Uniform."

During the hearing Respondent offered substantial evidence in support of its tentative decision to keep the firemen's clothing production in Beattyville. That evidence demonstrated that a consulting firm advised Respondent in 1973 that the Lake City facility was too small to continue as a facility for the manufacture of fire coats. When Respondent purchased the Beattyville facility in July 1977, it anticipated that eventually all its fire coat production would be at Beattyville. The Beattyville facility is substantially larger than the facility at Lake City—53,000 square feet versus 16,000 square feet.

Although, according to Respondent, the October 1977 strike required a premature transfer of fire coats to Beattyville, that transfer was temporary. However, as time passed the operation at Beattyville became more and more efficient until it reached the point in January 1978 where it became apparent from an economic standpoint, that it would be more disadvantageous to move back to Lake City than to stay in Beattyville.

In that regard, Respondent offered unrebutted testimony proving that the move back to Beattyville would involve substantial costs. In order to maintain fire coat production at the level maintained at Beattyville during January, Respondent would have to expand its Lake City facility. The cost of such an expansion, plus the cost associated with another move and delay associated with retraining personnel because of innovations in the manufacturing process since the strike started, would be considerable.

Furthermore, according to Respondent, a return to Lake City would again aggravate the delay of supplying fire coats to customers with a probable result that other customers would be lost.

The evidence demonstrating that the manufacture of fire coats required a great deal of floor space and that Lake City was too small to continue to serve as the exclusive facility for fire coat production was persuasive. Furthermore, no effort was made to rebut that evidence other than to show that Lake City had served as the exclusive fire coat facility before the strike. I find that fact insufficient to overcome the other evidence.

Before the strike Respondent has no facilities larger than Lake City available for fire coat production. Respondent had just purchased the Beattyville facility and, according to its version of corporate planning, the fire coat production was to be transferred to Beattyville in due course.

[19] The General Counsel argues that Respondent's January 5 letter presented the Union with a fait accompli. However, it is important to note that the employees at Lake City were on strike from October 12, 1977, to May 16, 1978. On January 5, 1978, Respondent had no reason to believe that the employees would have returned to work regardless of whether fire coat work was available. Therefore, I find no support for the General Counsel's contention that Respondent's January 5 notice did not afford the Union an opportunity to negotiate before the move to Beattyville became permanent. If the Union had elected to negotiate and those negotiations had been sucessful, there remained more than ample time to return fire coat production to Lake City.

Therefore, as to the process under which I must consider Respondent's defense, it is apparent that during January conditions had changed substantially from those which existed before the strike. There was the intervention of the purchase of the Beattyville facility. In considering that fact, I am aware that the General Counsel did not allege anything improper in the Beattyville purchase. Moreover, no evidence was offered which reflected upon Respondent's proof that the Beattyville purchase had its genesis long before the commencement of union activity.

Therefore, I must consider that on January 5 Respondent found itself faced with the possibility of removing the fire coats from a facility of sufficient size back into the Lake City plant which was too small.

According to Respondent's evidence, January 1978 presented a dilemma. A move back to Lake City would necessitate either the enlargement of the Lake City facility or splitting the fire coat production between two plants—Lake City and Beattyville.

Respondent offered substantial evidence proving that both the above alternatives would result in severe economic hardship to such an extent that the election of either alternative over retaining the fire coats in Beattyville would endanger the economic viability of Respondent. In that regard, Respondent proved that it considered expanding the Lake City facility during early 1977.[17] Unrebutted testimony demonstrated that Respondent continued to explore expansion possibilities until May 1977, when it discovered that it would be unable to finance expansion costs at an acceptable interest rate.

Therefore, in January 1978 Respondent was faced with the prospect of effectuating a business decision which it had rejected less than a year earlier as being unsound. Moreover, added costs would have been incurred in January, in order to dispose of the Beattyville facility and retrain Lake City employees. Additionally, the move back would result in additional delays in production with the possible loss of more customers.

As to the second alternative, producing fire coats at both Lake City and Beattyville, Respondent demonstrated that option would result in duplication of costs to such an extent that it would constitute an inefficient operation.

None of Respondent's evidence regarding the business bases for its January 5 decision was rebutted.

Therefore, I find that the General Counsel failed to offer substantial evidence in support of its allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by failing to negotiate regarding return of the firecoats to Lake City.[18] The evidence does show that Respondent did in fact offer to negotiate about that decision and, moreover, Respondent amply demonstrated that its tentative decision of January 5 was based upon business reasons rather than reasons which may be violative of the Act.[19]

6. The unfair labor practice strike

The law shows that strikes which are caused or prolonged by the employer's unfair labor practices are unfair labor practice strikes. There appears to be no significant issue here regarding the character of the October 12, 1977, strike since, as I find below, all unit employees were properly reinstated. Nevertheless, the issue was joined. On the basis of the record I am unable to conclude that the strike was caused or prolonged by Respondent's unfair labor practices.

I am aware of Respondent's conduct leading up to the July 14 election. However, in consideration of the employees' motivation in striking, at the time of the strike that particular conduct had been cured by a settlement agreement. The agreement was approved by the Regional Director on August 29, 1977, and the notice to employees had been posted since September 6. Ultimately, the settlement agreement was set aside by the Regional Director but not until November 14, 1977.

At the time of the walkout, Respondent had committed an additional 8(a)(1) and (5) violation by unilaterally announcing stricter enforcement of rules as shown above. As the employees were walking out on October 12, the plant manager threatened employee Lynda Strong that the employees would be discharged. However, there was no evidence demonstrating that Respondent was negligent, dilatory, or otherwise remiss in its obligations to meet and negotiate. In fact the only evidence offered demonstrated that it was the Union, not Respondent, that was unavailable to meet and negotiate during several days before October 25, 1977.

Moreover, there was no evidence offered regarding the motivation behind the Octobr 12 strike. The record contains no reference to employee meetings, conversations, or anything else which would show why they decided to strike. I am fully aware of the situations where motivation may be imputed by the Administrative Law Judge (for example, see Matlock Truck Body & Trailer Corp., and its Agent Roy L. Matlock, 217 NLRB 346 (1975)). However, there was insufficient evidence here demonstrating that I would be warranted in concluding that unfair labor practices must have played a part in the employees' decision to strike absence some evidence to that point.

[19] Compare International Chemical Workers Union, Local No. 112, AFL–CIO, CLC (American Cyanamid Company), 235 NLRB 1316, 1322–23 (1978). Unlike the situation in American Cyanamid, it appears that Respondent substantially complied with criteria established in Westinghouse Electric Corporation (Mansfield Plant), 150 NLRB 1574, 1577 (1965). The evidence is convincing that Respondent's action of January 5 was motivated solely by economic considerations, and Respondent had in the past transferred fire coat production from one plant to another. As I find below, the permanent transfer to Beattyville had no demonstrable adverse impact on employees in the unit. Moreover, Respondent, by its January 5 letter and subsequently during negotiations, demonstrated a willingness to negotiate over the permanent transfer. The Union did not put it to the test. There were no substantive negotiations on the issue because of union resistance. When Respondent attempted to explain to the Union why it wanted to leave the "fire coats" in Beattyville, the Union expressed disinterest indicating only that it demanded return of the fire coats.

I find that the General Counsel failed to sustain its burden of proof by showing either direct evidence that the employees were motivated by Respondent's unfair labor practices or that it was inescapable that those violations contributed to the initiation or prolongation of the strike. "Board law holds that an unfair labor practice strike does not result merely because unfair labor practices precede the strike. Rather, there must be a causal connection between the two events which demonstrates that the strike is the direct outcome of the unfair labor practices. Typoservice Corporation, 203 NLRB 1180 (1973)." John Cuneo, Inc., 253 NLRB 1025, 1026 (1981).

7. Reinstatement of strikers

Although the complaint does not allege any impropriety associated with Respondent's reinstatement of striking employees, evidence was presented in that regard primarily on the issue of whether the removal of the fire coat line constituted a unilateral change in working conditions. I have therefore considered the issue. The parties stipulated that all striking employees were offered reinstatement between May 31 and June 20, 1978. All the relevant evidence demonstrated that those striking employees who accepted reinstatement returned to work under substantially equivalent conditions to those which existed when they struck in October 1977. The only matter which arose as an issue in that regard was the question of whether work other than production of fireman's clothing could constitute substantially equivalent employment. In that regard, unrebutted evidence proved that the work actually performed by those striking employees upon their return: (1) was subjected to fewer layoffs and irregularity than work performed during the same period by employees at the Beattyville facility who were engaged in the production of firemen's clothing; (2) involved substantially the same job skills as the production of firemen's clothing. Although the supervisory and managerial coordination required in meshing the various pieces of fire coats into the final product differed from the meshing of other products, that did not materially affect the employees' work. Also, (3) the history of products produced by Respondent demonstrated that other products were manufactured at Lake City before 1976. In 1976 and 1977 fire coats were the exclusive product produced at Lake City. However, as found above, unrebutted evidence demonstrated that Respondent was in the process of securing other facilities to manufacture fire coats. The evidence proved that Respondent would have moved its firemen's clothing line away from Lake City in the absence of union activity.

Therefore, I find nothing in the record which demonstrated that Lake City employees were not offered proper reinstatement following their unconditional offer to return to work.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, Lion Uniform, Janesville Apparel Division, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. On July 14, 1977, the Union was and has been at all times since the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the bargaining unit described below within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act. The appropriate bargaining unit is:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees employed by the Employer at its Lake City, Tennessee plant, including the leadman and plant clerical employees, but excluding office clerical employees and professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. Respondent, by interrogating its employees concerning its employees' union activities; by threatening its employees that selection of the Union as a collective-bargaining representative would be futile by telling the employees that Respondent would not negotiate with the Union, that Respondent would never have a union in its plant, and that the Union could not solve the employees' problems; by threatening its employees with discharge if they joined or engaged in activities on behalf of the Union; by threatening its employees that Respondent would close its plant if the employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative; by promising its employees employment for its employees and their relatives if the employees rejected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative; by soliciting its employees to influence other employees to vote against the Union; by threatening its employees that Respondent had canceled its plans for plant expansion and installation of air conditioning in its plant because of their membership in and activities on behalf of the Union; by threatening its employees that Respondent would withhold wage increases from its employees because of their activities on behalf of the Union; by promising its employees that Respondent would establish a grievance committee if its employees rejected the Union; and by threatening its employees with discharge because they engage in strike activity, has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. Respondent, by unilaterally informing its employees that work rules would be more strictly enforced and that employees' privileges of having coffee and placing lunch orders through outside restaurants were being removed, at a time when the Union was collective-bargaining representative of the employees, has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

6. The strike among Respondent's bargaining unit employees, which commenced on or about October 12, 1977, was not caused or prolonged by Respondent's unfair labor practices.

7. Respondent did not otherwise engage in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[20]

The Respondent, Lion Uniform, Janesville Apparel Division, Lake City, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Interfering with, restraining, and coercing the employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed to them in Section 7 of the Act in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating its employees concerning its employees' union activities; by threatening its employees that selection of the Union as a collective-bargaining representative would be futile by telling the employees that Respondent would not negotiate with the Union, that Respondent would never have a union in its plant, and that the Union could not solve the employees' problems; by threatening its employees with discharge if they joined or engaged in activities on behalf of the Union; by threatening its employees that Respondent would close its plant if the employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative; by promising its employees employment for its employees and their relatives if the employees rejected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative; by soliciting its employees to influence other employees to vote against the Union; by threatening its employees that Respondent had canceled its plans for plant expansion and installation of air conditioning in its plant because of their membership in and activities on behalf on the Union; by threatening its employees that Respondent would withhold wage increases from its employees because of their activities on behalf of the Union; by promising its employees that Respondent would establish a grievance committee if its employees rejected the Union; and by threatening its employees with discharge because they engaged in strike activity.

(b) Unilaterally informing its employees that its work rules would be more strictly enforced and that the employees' privileges of having coffee and placing lunch orders through outside restaurants were being removed, without first negotiating with Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, its employees' exclusive collective-bargaining representative.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, to form, join, or assist a labor organization, or to refrain from any and all such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed and found necessary in order to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Rescind its action of instituting more strict enforcement of work rules and removal of the employee privileges of having coffee and placing lunch orders through outside resteurants.

(b) Post at its facility in Beattyville, Kentucky, and mail to all bargaining unit employees[21] copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[22] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 10, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT interrogate our employees concerning their union membership, activities, and desires.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees that selection of Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization, as their collective-bargaining representative would be futile by telling the employees that Respondent would not negotiate with the Union, that Respondent would never have a union in its plant, and that the Union could not solve the employees' problems.

[20] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[21] In view of evidence indicating that Respondent no longer maintains a facility in Lake City, Tennessee, but that some former employees of the Lake City facility are now employed at Respondent's Beattyville facility, I recommend the above Order in lieu of the normal recommendation which would have required Respondent to post the attached notice at its Lake City facility.

[22] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with discharge if they join or engage in activities on behalf of the Union.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees that we will close our plant if the employees select the Union as their collective-bargaining reprsentative.

WE WILL NOT promise our employees employment for themselves and their relatives if they reject the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT solicit our employees to influence other employees to vote against the Union.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees that Respondent has canceled its plans for plant expansion and installation of air conditioning at its plant because of their membership in and activities on behalf of the Union.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees that we will withhold wage increases because of our employees' activities on behalf of the Union.

WE WILL NOT promise our employees that we will establish a grievance committee if the employees reject the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with discharge if they engage in strike activity.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally inform our employees that work rules will be more strictly enforced and that the employees' privileges of having coffee and placing lunch orders through outside restaurants are being removed.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with our employees' rights protected by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL rescind our action in informing our employees that work rules will be more strictly enforced, and WE WILL reinstitute the employee privileges of having coffee and placing lunch orders through outside restaurants.

January 22, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On March 9, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Eleanor MacDonald issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision and in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt her recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the settlement agreement in Case 22-CA-9237 be, and it hereby is, reinstated.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the objections to the election conducted on August 3, 1979, in Case 22-RC-7887, be, and they hereby are, overruled and that the results be, and they hereby are, certified.

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

It is hereby certified that a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for Local Union No. 50, Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers Union, AFL-CIO, and that said labor organization is not the exclusive representative of all the employees, in the unit herein involved, within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ELEANOR MACDONALD, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Newark, New Jersey, on February 19, 20, 21, and 22 and March 11 and 13, 1980. The charge in Case 22-CA-9237 was filed on May 23, 1979; the charge in Case 22-CA-9401 was filed by Joseph Dones on August 1, 1979, and amended on August 20 and September 19, 1979; the charge in Case 22-CA-9423 was filed by Charles Skinner on August 8, 1979, and amended on August 21 and September 19, 1979. An informal settlement agreement in Case 22-CA-9237 was entered into on July 13, 1979, and was subsequently set aside by the Regional Director on September 21, 1979. The consolidated complaint issued on September 21, 1979, alleging that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), (4), and (5) of the Act including:

1. Engaging in threats, promises of benefits, interrogations, and solicitation of grievances (prior to execution of the informal settlement agreement).
2. Discharging Dones and Skinner for concerted activity (prior to the execution of the settlement agreement).
3. Engaging in harassment, interrogation, and threats, and creating the impression of surveillance (after the execution of the settlement agreement).
4. Giving certain employees money in order to refrain from voting in a Board election held on August 3, 1979.
5. Assigning Dones more arduous and less agreeable work after his reinstatement pursuant to the settlement agreement and issuing Dones warning letters and discharging Dones.
6. Assigning Skinner more arduous and less agreeable work after his reinstatement pursuant to the settlement agreement, and denying Skinner a wage increase and causing his termination.
7. Refusing to recognize and bargain collectively with Local Union No. 50, Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers Union, AFL-CIO, herein called Local 50, as the exclusive collective bargaining representative of its unit employees.

The complaint further alleges that the unfair labor practices set forth therein are so serious and substantial in character and effect as to warrant the entry of a remedial order requiring Respondent to recognize and bargain with Local 50 on an alleged majority of authorization cards from unit employees.

Respondent filed an answer denying the material allegations of the complaint and alleging that Dones and Skinner were discharged for cause.

In the representation case, a consent election was held pursuant to stipulation on August 3, 1979. After determination of the challenged ballots, the vote was eight for the Union and nine against union representation. One objection timely filed by the Union is before me for decision pursuant to the Order dated November 15, 1979, consolidating cases and referring the representation case to the Board.

Upon the entire record including my observations of the demeanor of the witnesses and after due consideration of the briefs filed by Respondent and the General Counsel in June 1980, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a New Jersey corporation, operates a bakery engaged in the manufacture and wholesale and retail sale of baked goods in Jersey City, New Jersey, where it annually purchases and causes to be delivered to it, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from other enterprises located within the State of New Jersey, which other enterprises receive said goods and materials in interstate commerce directly from States other than the State of New Jersey. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that Local Union No. 50, Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers Union, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

I will consider first the General Counsel's allegations that Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices after the execution of the settlement agreement,[1] since a finding of failure to comply with the settlement agreement or of postsettlement violation is a prerequisite to a finding of violation based on presettlement conduct. Interstate Paper Supply Company, Inc., 251 NLRB 1423 (1980).

A. Events Relating to Dones

Joseph Dones was one of the General Counsel's chief witnesses in this case. He testified that he was hired by Myron Chassen in September 1978, as a bench hand and helper. At first he worked 3 days a week on the oven and ran the cleaning machine, but subsequently his hours were changed so that he worked 6 days a week, excluding Saturday, from 1 or 2 a.m. until 10 or 11 a.m. Robert Chassen ran the bakery during most of these early morning hours.[2] Dones stated that he spent the bulk of his time twisting pastry on the bench, but that he also performed other work as follows: unloading the truck on Tuesday, helping in the wrapping room several hours per week, cleaning the bathrooms once a week, taking out the garbage every morning, cleaning "downstairs" every morning for 1 hour, and cleaning the "icebox."

Dones testified that he was discharged in May 1979.[3] As a result of charges filed by the Union, a settlement agreement was entered into and Dones was reinstated with payment of a sum for "net backpay." Dones testified that Leonard McGinley, the Union's business representative and organizer, told him that, from his reinstatement until the date of the consent election (August 3, 1979), Dones would work from 9 a.m. until 6 p.m. and that he would be excused from work on Sundays as well as the normal Saturday day off.

The need for an arrangement to last until the election arose from a change in the operations of the bakery. The uncontroverted testimony of several witnesses shows that, for some time prior to Dones' discharge, the bakery had been subject to repeated citations and threats of closure for uncleanliness by the Board of Health. This was due, in part, to the lack of sufficient facilities for cleaning separate from the baking area. As a result, Respondent undertook certain construction and renovation work and created additional cleaning areas. Further, the hours of the employees who performed cleaning functions were changed so that they began to work at noon which was generally after most of the mixing and baking was completed. (The bakers worked from 2 or 3 a.m. until 11 or 12 a.m.). This system permitted a more thorough cleaning of the bakery premises.

The new system and new hours were instituted prior to the settlement discussions in July 1979, and, when Dones was to be reinstated, Myron or Robert Chassen requested that Dones work new hours from 12 noon to 8 or 9 p.m. However, as a result of Dones' protests that he would be unable to talk union with his coworkers because some of them would be gone by the time he began work, it was agreed that, until the day of the election, he would work from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. Dones also testified that, as part of the settlement, he was excused from Sunday work so that he could function as a preacher. Before his discharge in May, Dones stated he had been excused by 11 a.m. on Sundays if the bakery were not too busy. With the new hours, this schedule would be impossible. Dones apparently believed that the Sunday excusal would be in effect beyond the election. However, Myron Chassen testified that his understanding of the settlement was that Dones would again work Sundays once the election was over. Chassen explained that Sunday was the busiest workday at the bakery and that he would never have agreed to excuse Dones from work on Sundays on a permanent basis.[4] Further, there was resentment among the other employees at the special treatment afforded Dones. Myron Chassen testified that it had been his understanding from the settlement discussions that a settlement of the charge in Case 22-CA-9237 and a consent election would be obtained only if he agreed to the special conditions for Dones which were to last until the day of the election.

[1] The settlement agreement was signed by the parties on July 13, and approved by the Regional Director on July 16, 1979.

[2] Myron and Robert Chassen, the two brothers who own and operate Respondent, are, respectively, secretary and president of Respondent. Myron Chassen is generally responsible for the operation of the bakery during normal business hours, while Robert Chassen is in charge of the premises in the early morning hours beginning at midnight while most of the mixing and baking is taking place. Robert Chassen personally conducts the mixing process. The hours worked by the two brothers are not rigidly fixed and they overlap. The bakery is a family enterprise that was formerly operated by the father and uncle of the Chassen brothers. The uncontradicted testimony shows that both Chassen brothers work side by side with their employees and perform many of the same tasks as their employees according to the particular requirements of the day. In fact, the testimony of all the witnesses clearly establishes that all employees, including the Chassen brothers, would normally lend a hand with any type of work that was available and needed to be done at the bakery.

[4] Other witnesses, including McGinley, agreed that Sunday was the busiest day in the bakery.

From Dones' testimony it is clear that he did not object to the requirement that after the election he would start work at noon as did the other employees who performed mostly cleaning work. Under the new system which was in force after his reinstatement, it is undisputed that Dones' working hours would not permit him to do much, if any, manufacturing, and that the tasks that remained to be performed would involve cleaning and other "porter" work.

Dones testified that pursuant to the settlement agreement he was to report to work on Tuesday, July 17, 1979, if certain personal business he was obliged to transact was completed by that date. He had promised to work even if he reported a little late. On direct examination, Dones testified that he was unable to report to work at all and that he therefore called the bakery and asked to speak to Myron Chassen in order to inform him of this fact. However, the woman who answered the phone hung up. Dones' wife also called the bakery, he stated, but the woman hung up on her as well. After having his recollection refreshed by looking at his telephone bill, Dones testified that he called the bakery twice. He also testified that he could not work because he was at the doctor's office. On cross-examination, Dones stated that he could not report to work late, as he had previously suggested he would do if he were able, because he was in court at the World Trade Center in New York City; although his appointment was for 11 a.m., the hearing did not conclude until 2 or 3 or 4 p.m. Dones stated that during a recess his wife had called the bakery. After counsel for Respondent called Dones' attention to the fact that Dones' phone bill indicated that calls had been made from Dones' home in New Jersey at 12:19, 12:31, and 12:35 p.m., Dones added the information that he had taken the train home during a recess and that he and his wife had called the bakery from their home. Counsel for the General Counsel did not seek to clarify this sequence of events on redirect examination, and so the record is barren of any further explanations which might make the testimony seem credible such as the amount of time required to travel back and forth from the World Trade Center, or the reason for Dones' original testimony that he was at his doctor's office.

From the time of his reinstatement until his discharge in August 1979, Dones testified that he did the "dirty work."[5] He testified that he scraped hand trucks in the sun, washed the garage door, washed the floor with a hose and a hand scraper that required him to kneel down, and cleaned the freezers with the doors closed. Concerning the freezers, Dones testified at great length that he was not permitted by Myron Chassen to turn off the blowers and leave the door open while he cleaned and scraped the ice. Dones stated that it was the usual practice to turn off the blowers and keep the door open, although in response to a question by the General Counsel he also testified that he had never seen anyone else clean the freezers.[6]

Dones testified that he spent a few hours cleaning floors every day, and that the areas where new floor had been installed as part of the renovations were "very easy" to clean compared to the condition that had existed previously. Dones stated that he still cleaned the bathroom after his reinstatement and also continued to take out the garbage. On cross-examination, Dones conceded that his post-reinstatement cleaning work resembled his prereinstatement work, except that he had to clean more carefully. Dones testified that after his reinstatement the bakery was like "a concentration camp" in that as soon as one task was finished he was given another, and that one day Robert told him not to talk so much.[7]

On Monday, July 23, 1979, Dones testified, he had a court appointment and was excused from work in advance by Robert Chassen. In August, Dones stated, he missed a day or two of work.

After having his attention directed to Friday, August 17, 1979, Dones testified that Myron Chassen told him that he had missed "quite a few Sundays" and that Dones would be fired if he did not start reporting to work on Sundays. Dones told Myron Chassen that the settlement agreement specified that he would not be required to work on Sundays and "you may as well let me go now." Chassen told Dones that the special arrangement was to apply only until the date of the election. Dones testified that he did not work the next Sunday, and that Mryon Chassen discharged him the next Monday. In response to a leading question by the General Counsel, Dones stated that during the Friday conversation he had offered to work Sundays if his hours could be adjusted; however, Dones could not recall what Chassen's response had been.

McGinley testified that his understanding of the terms of Dones' reinstatement was that Dones was to work as a porter, not a baker, and that he was to be required to work only 5 days a week. McGinley stated that Dones would not have to work Sundays at all, and that this would not change after the election.

Myron Chassen testified that Dones was hired as a porter and that his work consisted primarily of cleaning, helping with the wrapping machine, and helping out generally. After Dones' reinstatement, Dones did no wrapping because, under the new work schedule, the wrapping was completed before Dones appeared. The testimony was corroborated by that of Benjamin Vandross, a witness called by the General Counsel.[8] Vandross testified that, before Dones' discharge, he observed Dones at work and that his job consisted of porter work such as putting out garbage, cleaning the back of the bakery, and working on the wrapping machine. After [5] Dones could not recall any of the relevant dates in this proceeding. He was reinstated on July 18, and discharged again on August 20, 1979.

[6] The General Counsel did not ask Dones to explain how he was aware of the usual practice if he had never observed it in the past.

[7] Greg Simon, whose testimony and credibility are discussed below, testified that, after Dones' reinstatement, Myron Chassen stopped Simon from scraping the floors and said that he had someone to do the cleaning now and "that's the law." Chassen said Dones would clean.

[8] Vandross signed an authorization card for the Union. I found Vandross to be a generally credible witness; his testimony was consistent and given in a forthright manner.

Dones' reinstatement, Vandross saw him scraping floors, and cleaning the freezer, storage room, bathroom, and baking racks. Vandross testified that the freezers were cleaned more often after Dones returned and that he heard Myron Chassen tell Dones not to leave the doors open because the cakes would get soft.

Myron Chassen also testified about the incidents related to by Dones. He stated that he has cleaned the freezers at the bakery, and that, in the summer months, the freezer doors must be kept closed during this process or the goods stored within will begin to melt. He also stated that coats and gloves are kept in the freezers for the use of employees working in them. This testimony was corroborated by Terry Smith. Smith also testified that at the urging of other unit employees he gave a sworn statement to the Board to the effect that Myron Chassen closed the door while Dones was working in the freezer without a coat on. In fact, Smith never observed such an incident. Smith also testified that his sworn statement omitted facts he was aware of; namely, that there are jackets in the freezer for the use of employees and that Dones worked in the freezers with the doors open on occasion. Significantly, Dones was not called to rebut this testimony.[9]

Concerning Dones' attendance record, Myron Chassen stated that Dones was discharged for absenteeism in May 1979, because he missed at least 1 day of work every week. After Dones' reinstatement pursuant to the settlement agreement, Chassen testified, Dones missed 6 days in a 3-week period and two warning letters were issued to him. Chassen said that in the past he simply would have fired an employee for that amount of absenteeism, but that he was advised by counsel to send warning letters instead.[10] When Dones failed to report to work on Sundays after the elections, he was discharged. Myron Chassen testified that other full-time employees were absent less frequently than Dones, but that one employee who was absent the same number of days as Dones did not continuously miss Sundays. Chassen also testified that he had offered Dones reinstatement after August 20, if he would work Sundays, but Dones refused.

The General Counsel argues that Dones was discriminatorily discharged in violation of the Act, and contends that the unfavorable changes in Dones' working conditions, the insistence on Dones' working regular Sunday hours after the election, the use of warning letters to Dones, and other alleged acts of interference with the rights of unit employees all show that Respondent had union animus and prove that Dones' postsettlement discharge was an unfair labor practice. I note that the discussion in the General Counsel's brief relating to Dones, as well as to all the other issues in the case, presents a highly selective overview of the testimony and does not explain testimony unfavorable to the General Counsel's case. For reasons which I will discuss below, I am unable to share the General Counsel's view of the facts. In more than a few instances, the General Counsel's brief overzealously misstates the evidence in the record, and the brief also refers to nonexistent pages of the transcript. (To give only two examples, the brief states that Chassen "refused" to alter Dones' Sunday hours when there is no testimony at all to this effect, and the brief refers to "page 168" of the transcript as the source for several important factual assertions when there is no p. 168 in the record).

Dones' testimony is characterized by internal inconsistencies and by a seeming willingness to tell whatever story is best suited to the General Counsel's case. Further, Dones' testimony is contrary in many respects to the testimony of other credible witnesses.

Dones' testimony contradicts that of McGinley, the union representative who was called by the General Counsel in this proceeding.[11] McGinley clearly and unequivocally stated that, as a result of the settlement, Dones was reinstated as a "porter." Yet Dones spent a lengthy time on the witness stand denying that he was a porter and seeking to show that Respondent discriminatorily imposed porter work on him after his reinstatement in order to make his work less pleasant and more difficult than it had been before his first discharge.[12] In the same manner, Dones indignantly described being required to clean the freezer with the door closed contrary to the "usual" practice but later admitted that he had never observed anyone else cleaning freezers. Dones claimed that he could not return to work on July 17, 1979, but while he testified that he was at the doctor's office, he later changed the story to provide details of a day spent at the World Trade Center. And the progression of Dones' testimony, detailed above, concerning the World Trade Center episode is of such a nature as to lead me to believe that Dones fabricated explanations as he went along and as he was confronted with prior inconsistencies in his testimony.

This tendency is nowhere better illustrated than in Dones' testimony concerning his solicitation of authorization cards for the Union, a subject not directly relevant to this portion of the case. On direct examination, Dones identified a number of cards and stated that they had been signed and filled out in his presence, or that they had been signed and completed and handed to him by the individual employees. Based on the testimony of McGinley and of the individual signers, however, it is clear that Dones' testimony was inaccurate and that he had absolutely no memory of the events to which he willingly testified to on behalf of the General Counsel. The record shows that Dones' direct testimony was in error concernig the circumstances of the completion and signature of cards from employees Gibbs, Smith, Pickett, Vandross, Skinner, and Mitchell.

In contrast to the testimony of Dones, Myron and Robert Chassen testified in a credible and forthright manner; their testimony was internally consistent, and they did not seek to evade questions on cross-examination. The General Counsel's brief points out that neither Myron nor Robert Chassen specifically denied uttering certain of the presettlement statements that are alleged to constitute violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Indeed, this candor leads me to believe that both Chassen brothers testified in a direct and unguarded way. The general character of their testimony comports with the fact that, when the Union's demand for recognition was received in May 1979, Respondent was not represented by experienced labor counsel, and it was only some time after charges were filed that Respondent obtained advice from labor counsel and negotiated the settlement agreement.

[10] The letter of July 24 states that Dones missed two out of the last seven working days, including July 17 which was unexcused due to lack of notification to Respondent. The letter of August 6, 1979, mentions further absences by Dones and requests that he again report for work on Sundays.

[11] McGinley testified in a calm, forthright manner and did not seek to evade cross-examination. I find that he was a credible witness.

Since I have determined that Dones is not a credible witness, I must evaluate the issues relating to his testimony in light of this finding. Thus, I conclude that, by agreement of the parties, Dones was reinstated as a porter and that he was assigned substantially the same duties after his reinstatement as he had performed prior to his discharge on May 21, 1979. I find that any change in the manner in which he was asked to perform his duties was caused not by Respondent's desire to make his job more onerous and less pleasant, but by the reorganization and renovation of the bakery and by Respondent's desire to avoid further citations from the Board of Health. I also find that Dones was not required to work in a different manner from other employees and that Respondent's requirements as to his manner of cleaning the freezers, for example, were the same as those imposed by Respondent on other employees.

Turning to the question of whether Dones' excusal from Sunday work was to continue beyond the date of the election, I find that Myron Chassen's understanding of the arrangement is more reliable than that of Dones or McGinley. I have already explained that I do not regard Dones as a credible witness. Alhough I have found that McGinley is a credible witness, I believe his memory is less reliable than is Myron Chassen's on the subject of Sunday work for Dones. It is not plausible that Respondent would have agreed to excuse Dones from work on Sunday since it was acknowledged that Sunday is typically the busiest day of the week. It is much more likely that Respondent agreed, as it contends it did, to certain special conditions for Dones to last until the date of the election. From the demeanor of Myron and Robert Chassen and from their testimony, it is clear that they each have an intense commitment to the bakery and are familiar with the most minute details of the enterprise. Therefore, I find Myron Chassen's memory in the matter of Dones' Sunday hours more reliable than that of McGinley. I therefore find that Dones was properly expected to resume work on Sundays after the election.[13]

Both Myron Chassen and Dones himself testified that Dones was fired because he refused to begin regular Sunday work once the election was over. Dones testified that he indicated to Chassen that, if Chassen were to insist on Sunday work, Chassen "may as well let me go now." Although Dones responded to a leading question from the General Counsel by stating that he had offered to adjust his Sunday hours, I do not credit this. Significantly, Dones could not recall what Chassen's response to this offer had been, although Dones did not testify that Chassen had refused his offer. (The General Counsel's brief is quite incorrect on this point.) Further, when Chassen offered reinstatement to Dones on condition that Dones work on Sundays, Dones did not at that time agree to return provided some adjustment could be made in his hours.

I also do not find that Respondent engaged in unlawful conduct when it issued warning letters to Dones concerning his absenteeism and his failure to work on Sundays. Dones was indeed absent frequently and he did refuse to work on Sundays. There is no evidence that Respondent had any other purpose than to follow advice of counsel and make a record of warnings. Nor has the General Counsel shown that any other employee had a record quite as bad as Dones.[14] Finally, it is clear that Respondent repeatedly offered Dones a chance to continue working by improving his attendance record, especially his attendance on Sunday.

B. Events Relating to Skinner

Charles Skinner testified that he was hired as a baker's helper in April 1978, and that he was discharged on July 17, 1979. Skinner's testimony about the dates of his hiring, discharge, reinstatement, and second discharge was confused, as was much of the rest of his testimony. In fact, the record shows that Skinner was discharged on May 21, 1979, and that he was reinstated on July 17, 1979, pursuant to the settlement agreement.[15] There is a dispute as to the actual date and circumstances of his second discharge which will be discussed below. Skinner's hours were from 2 or 3 a.m. until 11 a.m. or noon, Sunday through Friday. Before his discharge in May 1979, he made pastry on the belt, scaled dough (weighed it by portion), fried doughnuts, operated the oven, and helped load the oven. After his reinstatement, he again made pastry on the belt but, after a time, Robert Chassen assigned him to operate the two ovens. This work consisted of loading and unloading ovens, and of watching goods in the ovens.

Skinner testified that he asked Robert Chassen for assistance to unload the oven, but that he was not given help. He stated that Chassen told him "that was my job. If I didn't like it . . . go back to the labor board." On direct examination, Skinner stated that no other employees worked the ovens without assistance; however, Skinner later testified that "Paul and George" worked alone. Skinner also stated that he asked Robert Chassen for a raise but that he was refused. Skinner gave it as his opinion that he should have been earning more money because he was working on the ovens. However, on cross-examination, Skinner testified that he did not know how much other oven men earned. He stated that he believed that one oven man who was a long service employee earned more than he did, and he acknowledged that the long service man also performed mixing, a task Skinner did not perform. There was no general wage increase at this time.

[13] I note also the paucity of testimony by Dones, an otherwise loquacious witness, concerning the precise nature and requirements of his preaching duties. Dones did not testify as to the hours of his preaching duties nor their location, and the record is therefore barren of any specific information as to when he would have to be released on Sunday. This leads me to believe that Dones' commitments were rather vague, and reinforces my belief that the Union agreed that the Sunday excusal would last only until the date of the election. Further, Dones testified that before his first discharge he was excused early on Sunday only if he could be spared; this circumstance lends weight to Respondent's position on this issue.

[14] I do not credit Dones' explanations that he gave notice of intended absences since, as discussed above, I do not believe him to be a credible witness. Further, I do not credit Dones' excuses for his absences, whether a doctor's appointment or a court appearance, since these stories seem to me to be fabricated.

Skinner testified that he was unable to get someone to watch the oven while he went upstairs to the bathroom but that he worked out a system for going upstairs while the ovens were loaded. Robert Chassen testified that he did not deny Skinner's proper requests for relief. Skinner testified that on August 6, 1979, he overproofed some crumb buns and Robert Chassen told him to "go home."[16] Skinner thought he was fired but he nevertheless finished out the day. Skinner testified that he overproofed the buns because "I forgot about it," and that while he was unloading the big oven he could not take the crumb buns out. Although his testimony on this point is confused, a careful reading of Skinner's testimony convinces me that Skinner forgot about the crumb buns and only realized that they were overproofed while he was unloading an oven, at which point it was too late to prevent damage. Skinner was working without assistance during this occurrence, and he testified that the damage occurred because he had no help.

Following the incident of August 6, Skinner testified, he did not return to work until about August 17. He received a letter dated August 9, 1979, from Myron Chassen stating that Skinner had previously been warned concerning damage to $700 worth of baked goods, and that Skinner had been absent from work on August 7, 8, and 9.[17] The letter stated:

> The purpose of this letter is to serve you with notice that your continued absence without notice or excuse will result in your dismissal.

Some time after receiving the letter, Skinner went back to the bakery. Upon seeing Robert Chassen, Skinner told him he "came back for my money and my clothes," and Chassen told him to get out. Skinner did not ask Chassen if he could go back to work.

Robert Chassen testified that the work of loading and unloading the ovens is a one man job. In fact, Chassen stated, some oven men also scale dough without assistance while loading and unloading but that Skinner was not asked to do this. The usual procedure is for one man to scale the dough and another to put it in the oven; Chassen said that in that circumstance he would consider that the men were helping each other. From a careful comparison of Skinner's testimony with the testimony of Robert Chassen on this point, I believe that when Skinner testified that an oven man often had assistance, he had reference to the times when one man did scaling and the other loaded and unloaded the goods.

Robert Chassen testified that he assigned Skinner to the ovens because a previous oven man quit and Skinner was next in line to do the work. This testimony was not contradicted by any witness. Robert Chassen stated that after his reinstatement pursuant to the settlement agreement, Skinner "took his time. He walked away a lot and he was a little arrogant and I couldn't talk to him. . . . I had no choice. I had to put up with him." Chassen testified that Skinner had burned merchandise on numerous occasions.

Concerning Skinner's discharge, Robert Chassen testified that one day Skinner ruined a whole rack of coffee buns because he walked outside for coffee.[18] Chassen was so upset because no more could be made that he told him to "go home for the day." He did not see Skinner thereafter. Both Robert and Myron Chassen testified that Skinner was fired because he was absent from work for 9 days. Apparently, a letter of discharge was sent to him.[19] Myron Chassen testified that, after his discharge, Skinner returned to the bakery and threatened him.

The General Counsel asserts that Skinner's August discharge was in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4), of the Act. An extended discussion of the General Counsel's brief is not required in that part of the case relating to Skinner since the brief is based on an erroneous view of the facts. Skinner's total inability to place in context the various incidents he was asked to relate and his inability to recall in what sequence these events took place (except in response to leading questions) leads me to believe that he had memorized a series of stories for the hearing in the instant proceeding and was unable to keep his stories straight. I will not, therefore, credit Skinner's testimony where it conflicts with that of Robert Chassen. I am convinced from my observation of Skinner and from a reading of the record that he had little recollection of many of the events he testified to and that much of his testimony had been suggested to him by someone else.

I find that Skinner was not harassed by being assigned to perform oven work in any way that was contrary to the usual practice at the bakery; even Skinner admitted that oven men often work alone. I find that Skinner was not improperly refused a wage increase; there was no testimony to show why he was entitled to an increase. I find that the warning letters were properly issued to Skinner for destruction of baked goods as claimed by Respondent. I find, as testified to by Robert Chassen, that Skinner was not fired on August 6, but that he was told to go home for the rest of the day. Skinner received a letter dated August 9, warning him that as he had been absent from work without excuse for 3 days he faced dismissal if he continued to be absent without notice or excuse. Skinner did nothing on receipt of this letter, and sometime later he returned to the bakery for his money and his clothes. He did not ask to be put back to work. Although, as set forth above, Robert Chassen candidly expressed a certain amount of resentment against Skinner and his "arrogant" postsettlement behavior, the General Counsel has not shown that this played any part in Skinner's termination. Rather, I find that Skinner gave ample cause to Respondent by damaging merchandise and by failing to report to work or to contact Respondent upon receipt of the August 9 letter.

[16] Skinner's testimony on this incident is not clear; at various points in the record, he placed the crumb bun incident before his reinstatement under the settlement agreement.

[17] On July 24, 1979, Skinner was given a note signed by Robert Chassen listing goods improperly baked by Skinner and warning that he might be dismissed. Skinner denied some of the allegations in this note.

[18] This is the "crumb bun" incident.

[19] This letter was not introduced into evidence.

C. Events Relating to Union Meetings and to the Election

The General Counsel presented the testimony of Greg Simon to show alleged instances of Employer surveillance and interference. Simon testified that he is a porter and that he works the hours of 4 to 10 or 11 p.m.; he stated that he was expected to work 6 days a week but that he occasionally did not work on Wednesdays.[20]

Simon testified that Dones called a union meeting on Saturday in late July 1979 at the Golden Skillet Restaurant. He testified that he and Charles Howard and Terry Smith talked to Myron Chassen about this time and that Chassen asked them to go to the meeting and report back to him concerning what was discussed.[21] Chassen then asked Simon who was for the Union and who would vote against representation. Simon testified that Myron Chassen told the three young men that their names were not on the list of eligible voters. Chassen allegedly told them that the Union was no good, that it slowed up business, and that one bakery which had a union was now closed.

On the Saturday of the meeting, Simon testified, he looked for the Golden Skillet with Howard and Smith but could not find it. The three then saw Myron Chassen near Newark Avenue, and he told them to look for the meeting and report back to him. Simon testified that they did not locate the meeting, but nevertheless, told Chassen that they attended it and that the fellows were drinking and saying "to vote for the Union." On cross-examination, when counsel for Respondent asked Simon about the lie involved in this report to Chassen, Simon testified that he did not lie and that Terry Smith did all the talking. After further cross-examination, Simon recalled that on this day the three young men saw employees Benjamin Vandross and Charles Skinner in a car; Vandross and Skinner told the three about the meeting and so enabled Terry Smith to tell Myron Chassen what had happened there. According to Simon, the three young men did not tell Vandross and Skinner about Chassen's interest in the meeting. It was during this encounter, Simon said, that Vandross told them they had a right to vote.

According to Simon, the day before the election of August 3, 1979, he was at work with Howard and Smith when they saw Myron Chassen at or about 10 p.m.[22] Chassen said "tomorrow" was the election, that they could not vote and he gave Smith $30 "to get lost tomorrow." When the three of them went outside, Smith gave $10 each to Simon and Howard.

On the day of the election, Simon testified, he, Charles Howard, and Terry Smith "got into Terry's car" and, with Terry Smith at the wheel they "went riding." Someone said: "[L]et's go around the bakery." (On cross-examination Simon testified that the car belonged to Smith's brother.) Simon stated that they drove to the bakery and parked in the public lot on the corner of Newark Avenue and Monmouth Street, and that their purpose was to vote in the election. The three young men then walked to another part of the lot toward First Street, the location at the back of the bakery where the election was being conducted in a garage area.[23] Before they left the lot or reached First Street, they saw Myron Chassen who stopped them and asked where they were going. Simon testified that Chassen said, "[Y]ou're not allowed to vote," and told them that their names were not on the list and that they should "go home, and come back to work this evening." After this incident, the three young men left. Simon stated that he, Smith, and Howard came to work at "four o'clock, on the dot" in the afternoon of the election, and that Chassen said, "thanks." On the next payday, Simon testified, there was $30 extra stapled to the outside of each of their pay envelopes, and Myron Chassen said, "Thanks again."[24]

Simon could not remember the day of the week on which the election was held; however, he gave a detailed account of his movements on that morning including a trip to an ice cream parlor. Simon did not recall seeing the union organizer, Leonard McGinley, near the bakery on that day. When McGinley testified, however, he said that on the day of the election, he had positioned himself on Monmouth Street near the bakery so that he could "observe the back where the election was being held." McGinley saw a car with Terry Smith and two other young black men in it which drove around the block once and then went on. McGinley did not see the car pull into the lot and park, nor did he see anyone emerge from the car. Further, he did not observe Myron Chassen talk to three men in the lot.

Charles Howard was called by Respondent and testified that he had been employed by Respondent for 1-1/2 years. From March through August 1979, he worked 6 days a week when there was work available. Howard testified that he recalled the day of the election, and that he remained at home and did not go to the bakery to vote in the morning while the election was held. Howard denied being in a car with Simon and Smith on the day of the election, and said that he had gotten to work by bus that afternoon.

[20] In fact, the payroll records for 1979 show that he often did not work a full week and that he often worked only 2 or 4 hours per day.

[22] The Employer's payroll records show that neither Simon nor Howard were at work on August 2, 1979, the day before the election, and that neither Simon nor Smith worked on the day of the election.

[23] The bakery faces Newark Avenue at the front and First Street at the rear. It is between Monmouth Street and Cole Street.

On cross-examination, Howard acknowledged that in June 1979 he borrowed money for a bicycle from Myron Chassen, but he stated that he had long since paid it all back (at the rate of $10 per week). He also testified that he was sometimes given extra money by Chassen for doing good work and that he received $20 at Christmas. Howard denied being given any money by Myron Chassen before the election, and he explained that he did not vote because his mother did not want him to get involved with the Union or with the Labor Board. He recalled that Myron Chassen had told him when the election would be held, although Chassen did not tell him whether or not to vote.

Terry Smith was called by Respondent, he testified that he had been employed at the bakery for about 3 years. Smith stated that on the day of the election, he first arrived at the bakery in time to work at 4 p.m. He denied being in a car with Simon and Howard that morning or going to the bakery to vote in the election.[25]

On cross-examination by the General Counsel, Smith acknowledged giving two sworn statements to the Board which were contrary to his testimony at the hearing. The statements, dated August 13 and 26, 1979, were introduced into evidence by the General Counsel. Smith testified that when he came to the Regional Office to give the statements he was accompanied by Greg Simon. The statement of August 13 is, in substance, to the following effect: On Friday, July 27, 1979, Myron Chassen asked Smith, Howard, and Simon to attend a union meeting and report back concerning statements made by Dones. Chassen also gave the young men $30 "to go the shore" and not vote in the election. The three tried unsuccessfully to find the union meeting on July 28, 1979, and then met "Benny" and "Lee" as these two returned from the meeting. Benny and Lee told the three men what Dones said at the meeting, but when Smith, Howard, and Simon saw Myron Chassen a few minutes later, Smith told Chassen that he could not find the meeting and had not seen anyone. On July 29, a payday, Chassen asked about the meeting and later gave Smith extra money and said, "[T]hank you for not coming." The statement then reads, "I believe he was referring to the election." The statement of August 16, 1979, is to the following effect: On August 2, 1979, Chassen gave Smith $30, mentioning a trip to the shore, and on August 3, 1979, Smith, Simon, and Howard appeared to vote and saw Myron Chassen who told them to go home and come back around 6 p.m.[26]

Pursuant to cross-examination by the General Counsel, Smith stated that he was coerced into giving the sworn statements by Benny Vandross, Joe Dones, and Greg Simon who "threatened, abused and scared" him. Smith testified that initially Vandross and Dones told him to go the Board and sign a statement and that he was beaten up by an unknown person when he failed to do so. Subsequently, when Greg Simon, Dones, and Vandross called him at home, Smith agreed to give a statement. After he gave the first statement, Smith testified, he was threatened again by Dones and Vandross and a gun was mentioned. Further, Smith stated that Greg Simon had called him shortly before the hearing and stated that the General Counsel would help him get into the Army and that if he changed his testimony he would be "lynched." Before this call, Smith had told Simon that he was going to tell the truth at the hearing because he had spoken to a family friend who is a Jersey City police officer earlier in the week, and had been advised about the seriousness of the situation. Concerning the source for the untruths in his statements, Smith explained that Greg Simon coached him in the story and that Dones "put some more lies with it." Smith recalled being told to say that Myron Chassen asked them to go to the meeting, that he gave them money before and after the election and prevented them from voting, and that Dones worked in the freezer without a coat. Finally, Smith testified, Dones approached him while he waited to testify outside the court room and said, "[I]ts for your benefit, and if you tell the truth they're going to throw you in jail." He testified, in great detail, that on the day of the election he spent the morning with his girl friend and later went to work with Howard and Simon. Smith stated that the election was held on a Monday or Tuesday; he denied receiving extra money after the election.[27]

After Smith's testimony was given, the General Counsel recalled Simon, Dones, and Vandross. Simon denied coercing Smith in any way, and stated that Smith had suggested giving an affidavit to the Board, and that Dones also suggested filing a complaint. Vandross denied threatening Smith; he stated, however, that he had called Smith at home about coming to the Board. Vandross testified that, on the night of the election, he and Lee Archer met Smith, Simon, and Howard and that they discussed what had happened and he told them that they were entitled to vote. Dones also called Smith after the election; however, Dones denied threatening Smith. Dones testified that Smith, Simon and Howard told him about being chased from the polls and asked his advice, and that he told all three to file a complaint with the Board.

Myron Chassen testified that he arrived at the bakery at or about 7:30 a.m. on the day of the election. He decorated cakes with whipped cream until about 10:30 a.m. when the Board agent directed him to leave. Thereupon, both Chassen brothers and their counsel stayed in the bakery office for about one-half hour until an employee entered the office to say that a pot of whipped cream had been left out right near the office. At that point, Myron Chassen walked through the manufacturing area to the door of the garage where he attracted the Board agent's attention by waving to him. The Board agent directed Chassen to return to the office and the latter did so. Myron Chassen testified that he was concerned that the cream would spoil in the heat of the day, and that he wanted the Board agent's permission to refrigerate it. Chassen denied being near the parking lot and denied seeing either Smith, Howard, or Simon during the time the election took place.

[27] In fact, August 3, 1979, was a Friday.

Manifestly, a major issue in this case is the relative credibility of the three young men—Greg Simon, Charles Howard, and Terry Smith. Charles Howard testified in a careful, consistent, and forthright manner. He testified that his mother had strong feelings against his involvement with the Union and, for that matter, with the Board. I am convinced from his demeanor and from the nature of his replies to questions posed by counsel that he did indeed shun any involvement with the Union and that his testimony was in all respects truthful. Thus, I credit his testimony that he was not bribed, interrogated, or prevented from voting by Myron Chassen. As will be seen below, I do not credit any of Greg Simon's testimony about alleged unfair labor practices committed by Respondent.

There are many reasons, aside from the truthfulness of Howard's testimony, for discrediting the version of events given by Simon. For one, Simon's stories do not make sense. As an example, if Simon had indeed been asked by Myron Chassen to find the Golden Skillet meeting and report back to him, Simon would surely have mentioned this fact to Vandross and Skinner (two union supporters), when he met them on the day of the meeting and discussed with them what had taken place there. Vandross, a witness called by the General Counsel and whose testimony I credit, did not testify at all about his encounter; Vandross testified that he met the three young men after a postelection meeting which was held at a bar one block from the bakery and that he was accompanied by Lee Archer, not Skinner. Significantly, Simon would not accept responsibility for allegedly reporting back to Chassen and lying about the meeting; he testified that Terry Smith had done the talking. Another example of a story that does not make sense is Simon's version of the alleged bribe. Simon claims that the money was given to Terry Smith in order to insure that the three young men would not vote "tomorrow." However, the payroll records introduced into evidence by the General Counsel show that neither Simon nor Howard were at work on the day before the election. Further, no reason has been shown why Chassen would give the three any money to stay away from the election, and there is no testimony to show Chassen had any basis for believing they intended to vote. Their names were not on the list of eligibles, and Chassen had not been informed that they intended to cast ballots. Indeed, even Simon did not testify that he had expressed any intention of voting before the election.

Simon's story about the election day ride also strains credulity. Simon was able to testify in detail about the ride and the events of the day, but he could not recall seeing McGinley near the bakery during the election although the car allegedly drove close to where McGinley was standing. Further, if Simon had indeed been prevented from voting, why did he not immediately seek out the union organizer and make this fact known? McGinley, a witness called by the General Counsel and whose testimony I credit, had stationed himself so that he could observe the relevant locations during the election. McGinley saw a car with three youths in it, but he was unable to say that Simon or Howard was in the car. McGinley saw the car drive once around the bakery and then depart. If the car had been parked and if the three young men had emerged and had been confronted by Myron Chassen, McGinley would have observed this. His failure to see any of the events testified to by Simon leads to the conclusion that these events did not occur.

Terry Smith admitted giving two false statements to the Board, and there is thus no need to dwell at length on the reasons for finding all of his testimony and his sworn affidavits open to serious question. Although it is difficult to sift fact from fiction in Smith's testimony, it is interesting to note that his first affidavit reads like a badly remembered version of Greg Simon's testimony: for example, the alleged bribe is given on the day of the Saturday union meeting and a second bribe is given before the election. This would seem to lend some credence to Smith's story that his affidavits are false and were given at the urging of Greg Simon and Joseph Dones who also provided the false details to be included in the affidavits. This is not to say, however, that I find his testimony at the hearing to be entirely reliable. For example, Smith gave a very detailed account of his supposed activities on the morning of the election, and yet he was unable to recall what day of the week he was testifying about, nor did he recall that he did not work on the day of the election. In view of the fact that Smith is a self-admitted teller of untruths and in view of the fact that it is impossible to determine when Smith might be giving accurate testimony, I shall disregard all of Smith's testimony and his affidavits. Although the General Counsel urges that Smith's affidavits should be credited, no basis has been shown to support a finding that the statements contained in the affidavits are true.

The General Counsel called Ulyssee Mitchell to testify concerning alleged instances of surveillance by Respondent.[28] Mitchell was hired as a baker's helper in 1978, and he was discharged on August 25, 1979, following an altercation with Robert Chassen during which the police were called. As Mitchell described it, the fracas arose over an order given by Myron Chassen to put away certain goods which was not promptly carried out by Mitchell. Mitchell was accused of "pushing" Robert Chassen and criminal charges were filed by both parties. According to Mitchell, Chassen did not touch him. After the police came, both Joseph Dones and one of the police officers advised Mitchell to leave the scene and "cool off." Mitchell was clearly hostile to both Myron and Robert Chassen, and volunteered the information concerning Robert Chassen that "he's no match for me. I could have washed up the floor with him." On direct examination, Mitchell was confused despite the extensive use of leading questions by the General Counsel, and testified as though he was telling a story by rote. Further, Mitchell resisted counsel's questions on cross-examination and answered evasively.

In response to a series of leading questions by the General Counsel, Mitchell stated that he had called a meeting at the Lucky Seven bar on the Saturday before the election, and that on the next day Robert Chassen asked him if he had attended the meeting. Mitchell allegedly answered, "[N]o . . . I went to Staten Island." Mitchell testified that employee Paul Mueller was 5 feet away when this conversation took place, and that, when Robert Chassen went over to Mueller's work station to look for something, Mueller said: "I was in the bar. I should have found out who all was in there." Thereupon, according to Mitchell, Robert Chassen said: "That's a good idea. Go over to the bar today and find out who all was in the bar, in the meeting." Mitchell testified that, on the next Tuesday, he asked Robert Chassen: "Didn't you tell Paul to go and find out who all went to the meeting." According to Mitchell, Chassen acknowledged that he had and further said that the Union would not win "because we have the majority of the votes in the back." Chassen continued by saying: "But you can vote the way you want to vote . . . because no one would ever know."

[28] Mitchell signed a card for the Union and was known to support the Union.

Mitchell testified in response to questions by the General Counsel that he had observed Dones' duties after the latter was reinstated and that Dones was given "filthy work" such as cleaning racks in the hot sun, "clean out refrigerators with the motors on . . . got on top of steam things and cleaned them off." Mitchell did not explain how he could observe Dones at work at this time: during the summer of 1979, Mitchell worked in the wrapping room and he began work at 2 a.m., while Dones did not appear until 9 a.m. and worked in other areas of the bakery. The nature of Mitchell's testimony on the subject of dones, and the manner in which it was given convinces me that Mitchell was testifying to matters of which he had no direct knowledge.

In evaluating Mitchell's testimony concerning alleged instances of interrogation and surveillance, I have taken into account his gratuitous expression of hostility to Robert Chassen, his demeanor while testifying, the General Counsel's extensive use of leading questions on direct examination and his unreliable testimony on the subject of Dones. Further, I have considered the likelihood that the story related to by Mitchell is accurate. I have determined that Mitchell is not a reliable witness and that he should not be credited. Although no other witness testified about these events, and Mitchell's testimony is uncontradicted, I am not convinced that the testimony is truthful or accurate. The story told by Mitchell is incredible on its face. As discussed above, certain presettlement statements by both Robert and Myron Chassen, admitted in the testimony of both brothers, were in the nature of interrogations, threats, and the like. The record is clear, however, that once labor counsel was retained by Respondent and the settlement agreement entered into, neither of the brothers made speeches to employees or discussed the Union with employees in informal meetings. Yet the General Counsel would have us believe that less than 1 week before the election, after compliance with the settlement agreement including posting of a notice and reinstatement of two alleged discriminatees, Robert Chassen approached a known union adherent and asked him about a union meeting and further asked another employee to obtain information about the meeting in the presence of this same union activist. It may be that Mitchell dimly remembered some occasion when Robert Chassen may have engaged in improper conduct. However, since the General Counsel supplied the time and place of the union meeting to Mitchell in his very first question about the transaction, Mitchell had no opportunity to try to remember when the conversations occurred. The use of a leading question here is particularly crucial to my evaluation of the testimony because several meetings were held at the bar, and Mitchell should have been permitted to testify of his own recollection concerning the timing of Chassen's remarks. As the record stands, it may be that Mitchell was testifying about a premeeting conversation which took place before the settlement agreement was executed.

Further, there is testimony by Myron Chassen that he was especially friendly with certain employees including a few who told him early in the Union's campaign that they did not favor union representation. Mueller is one of these named employees. If the Chassen brothers wished to spy on the union meeting, it is not reasonable to suppose they would approach Mueller in front of a known union supporter. It is even less likely that Robert Chassen would have admitted such surveillance to Mitchell 3 days before the election. The testimony of both brothers shows that they were well aware of the consequences of the alleged unfair labor practices committed before the settlement agreement, and it is most unlikely that Robert Chassen would have admitted a further unfair labor practice to one of the Union's chief supporters right before the election was to take place.

Since I do not find Mitchell to be a credible or reliable witness, I am unable to find that Respondent engaged in acts of interrogation and surveillance as alleged by the General Counsel.

In summary, I find and conclude that the General Counsel has not shown any violations by Respondent in connection with the union meetings or the election.

D. The Presettlement Allegations

On September 21, 1979, the Regional Director vacated and set aside the settlement agreement. As I have found that no unfair labor practices were committed by Respondent after the execution of the settlement agreement, I also find that the Regional Director had no grounds for setting aside the settlement agreement. Therefore, I shall recommend that the settlement agreement in Case 22-CA-9237 be reinstated, and it is therefore unnecessary to make any findings concerning the alleged unfair labor practices predating the settlement agreement. Deister Concentrator Company, Inc., 253 NLRB 358 (1980).

E. The Refusal To Bargain

The General Counsel maintains that the unfair labor practices alleged herein are so serious and substantial in character and effect as to undermine the alleged majority status of the Union, and that a bargaining order should issue pursuant to N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575 (1969). In view of my findings that none of the unfair labor practices alleged by the general Counsel did in fact take place, I conclude that Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act and that there is no basis for the issuance of a bargaining order pursuant to the rationale of Gissel.

Conclusions of Law

1. Chassen Brothers, Inc., d/b/a Ann's-Schneider Bakery, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local Union No. 50, Bakery, Confectionary & Tobacco Workers Union, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Based on the findings of fact set forth above, I conclude that Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), (4), or (5) of the Act as alleged by the General Counsel, nor violated the Act in any other manner.

The Representation Proceeding

The objection filed in connection with this proceeding is that Respondent prevented Greg Simon, Terry Smith, and Charles Howard from entering the polling place and voting in the election on August 3, 1979. This objection is coextensive with certain of the unfair labor practices alleged, as to which have made a finding above that they are without merit. Therefore, I find no merit in the Objection.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[29]

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the settlement agreement in Case 22-CA-9237 be reinstated.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the objections to the election conducted on August 3, 1979, in Case 22-RC-7887 be overruled and that a certification of results shall issue.

[29] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Lord Jim's and Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local 2. Cases 20–CA–15570 and 20–CA–15793

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On May 14, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and Respondent filed cross-exceptions and an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Lord Jim's, San Francisco, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.[2]

---

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

In adopting the conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge, we find it unnecessary to rely on his discussion of Amoco Production Company, 239 NLRB 1195 (1979), in view of the lack of any evidence to show that anyone other than the members of Bartenders Local 41, which was only one of the unions involved, was given any opportunity to vote on the merger.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAY R. POLLACK, Administrative Law Judge: These consolidated cases were heard before me in San Francisco, California, on February 20 and March 9, 1981. The charge in Case 20–CA–15570 was filed by Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local 2 (herein called the Union) on August 18, 1980, and a copy thereof was served on Lord Jim's (herein called Respondent) on August 19, 1980. On November 10, 1980, the Regional Director for Region 20 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing in Case 20–CA–15570 alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. Sec. 151, et seq., herein called the Act. On November 18, 1980, the Union filed the charge in Case 20–CA–15793. Following investigation thereof, the Acting Regional Director issued a complaint and notice of hearing on December 17, 1980, alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. On that same date, the Acting Regional Director ordered that the two cases be consolidated for purposes of hearing.

The Issues

On March 9, 1981, the second day of the hearing, I granted Respondent's motion to dismiss the complaint alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act (Case 20–CA–15570) on the ground that the General Counsel and the Union had failed to prove a prima facie case. The basis of that ruling will be set forth herein. The principal issues presented for decision in Case 20–CA–15793 are as follows:

1. Whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging its employee Regan Foiles on October 21, 1980.
2. Whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating Foiles regarding her union sympathies; by instructing Foiles to disassociate herself from the Union; by creating the impression that Foiles' union activities were under surveillance by Respondent; and by threatening Foiles with physical harm because of her union sympathies.

All parties were given full opportunity to appear, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Upon the entire record, from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the post-hearing briefs of the parties, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a sole proprietorship of Spiro Tampourantzis[1] engaged in the operation of a bar and cocktail lounge in San Francisco, California. In the course and conduct of its business, Respondent annually derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and annually purchases directly from suppliers located outside the State of California goods and materials valued in excess of $5,000.

Accordingly, Respondent admits and I find Respondent to be an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[1] The transcript contains various spellings of Tampourantzis' name. The spelling used herein is that given by Tampourantzis on the witness stand.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union represents employees in the hotel and culinary trades in dealing with their employers for purposes of collective bargaining. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

The Failure To Prove a Prima Facie 8(a)(5) and (1) Violation

As discussed above, I granted Respondent's motion to dismiss the complaint in Case 20-CA-15570 alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. In my view, the General Counsel and the Union had failed to prove an essential element of a prima facie case. The relevant complaint allegation reads as follows:

> Since an unknown date in the past, and at all times material herein, the Union has been designated exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in [an appropriate unit].[2] . . . and since that time the Union has been recognized as such representative by Respondent. Such recognition has been embodied in successive collective bargaining agreements, the most recent of which is effective by its terms for the period October 7, 1973 to October 31, 1980.

In support of this allegation, the General Counsel presented evidence that on October 7, 1973, Respondent entered into an agreement with six labor organizations[3] covering the terms and conditions of employment of its bartenders and cocktail waitresses. These six labor organizations have ceased to exist. Prior to 1975, Waiters and Dairy Lunchmen's Union No. 30 and Waitresses & Cafeteria Employees Union No. 48 merged into Dining Room Employees Union, Local 9. In 1975, the remaining five labor organizations were merged into a single labor organization, the Union herein. The five labor organizations went out of existence and a new labor organization, the Union, was formed. Although not pleaded in the complaint, the General Counsel contends that the Union is a successor to the six contracting unions. Evidence was presented that members of Bartenders, Local 41, were given notice of and voted in an election relating to the merger. There was no evidence that the employees of Respondent were members of Bartenders, Local 41, were given notice of the election, or voted in the election. Further, there was no evidence that cocktail waitresses (the only other contract classification in which Respondent employed employees and who comprised half of the bargaining unit), whether union members or not, participated in any election relating to the merger. To the contrary, I was requested to take, and took, judicial notice of the case of Karl Kahn, et. al. v. Hotel and Restaurant Employees, etc., 469 F. Supp. 14 (N.D. Cal. 1977), affd. per curiam 597 F.2d 1317 (9th Cir. 1979), in which the district court found that the instant merger was unilaterally ordered by the president of the Hotel and Restaurant Employees' and Bartenders' International Union and that there was no vote on the merger.

In deciding whether a union is a successor to another union in any particular unit, the Board "looks to a number of factors, including whether democratic procedures have been followed in any vote on affiliation or merger, whether the new organization has succeeded to the assets and liabilities of the predecessor, whether the employees in the bargaining unit have had an opportunity to register their desires, and whether there is a continuity in the leadership and representation of the employees in the bargaining unit." See, e.g., Local 294, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Gene Graham Ford, Inc.), 188 NLRB 515, 518 (1971). The Board has indicated that whether the employees in the unit have had an opportunity to pass on the change of representative is "the primary concern" in such cases. Newspapers, Inc., Publishers of the Austin American and the Austin Statesman, 210 NLRB 8, 9, fn. 4 (1974), affd. 515 F.2d 334 (5th Cir. 1975). See also William B. Tanner Company (formerly Pepper & Tanner, Inc.), 212 NLRB 566, 567 (1974), enforcement denied 517 F.2d 982 (6th Cir. 1975), and Factory Services, Inc., 193 NLRB 722 (1971).

In Jasper Seating Company, Inc., 231 NLRB 1025 (1977), the Board refused to find a successor union based on the fact that nonmembers of the union were not given an equal unqualified opportunity to participate in the affiliation vote. In Amoco Production Company, 239 NLRB 1195 (1979), remanded 613 F.2d 107 (5th Cir. 1980), the Board overruled Jasper Seating stating:

> The fact that union merger or affiliation votes are basically internal organizational matters, coupled with the employees' opportunity to exercise their right to choose whether to participate or to refrain from engaging in concerted activity, persuades us to find that union affiliation votes limited to union members are valid.
> An affiliation is the alignment or association of a union with a national or parent organization. An affiliation does not create a new organization, nor does it result in the dissolution of an already existing organization.

Thus, the Board expressly distinguished the creation of a new labor organization from an internal union matter such as an affiliation vote.[4] Where a new labor organization is formed and the existing bargaining representative is dissolved, the rights of all unit employees and not just union members are affected. Such a change goes beyond internal matters and affects representative status. See, e.g., Independent Drug Store Owners of Santa Clara

[2] The appropriate unit alleged in the complaint is as follows: All employees employed by Respondent at 1500 Broadway, San Francisco, California, who are employed in the job classifications listed in the Independent Restaurant & Tavern Agreement effective October 7, 1973; excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act.

[3] The six unions were waiters and Dairy Lunchmen's Union No. 30; Waitresses & Cafeteria Employees Union No. 48; Bartenders, Local 41; Cooks, Pastry Cooks and Assistants Union, Local 44; Miscellaneous Culinary Employees Union, Local 110; and Hotel, Motel, Club and Service Workers Union, Local 283.

County, 211 NLRB 701 (1974), enfd. 528 F.2d 1225 (9th Cir. 1975).

In Amoco, the Board restated the principle that affiliation procedures must meet due process requirements; for example, proper notice to all members, an orderly vote, and some reasonable precautions to maintain the secrecy of the ballot. In the instant case, the merger ordered by the president of the International Union does not meet those requirements. Further, the only evidence of an election showed that members of the Bartenders Union voted in favor of the merger. There was no evidence that members of the other labor organizations voted in any election. Thus, even if an election limited to union members were sufficient, there would be insufficient evidence in this case to find proper successorship.

The General Counsel and the Union have failed to prove by any other means that Respondent was obligated to bargain with the Union. In his post-hearing brief, the General Counsel contends that Respondent has recognized the Union and complied to some extent with the 1973 collective-bargaining agreement. However, no evidence in support of this contention was offered. Evidence was presented that in 1977 the trust funds[5] brought suit against Respondent seeking payment pursuant to the provisions of the 1973 bargaining agreement. In that suit, a settlement was reached by the assignee of the trust funds and Respondent. That evidence was presented with the express purpose of showing attempts by the Union to enforce the agreement and, therefore, that the Union had not abandoned its representative status. However, the settlement was not offered and could not be used as an admission that Respondent had recognized the Union or an admission that Respondent had a bargaining agreement with the Union. See Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 408.

Accordingly, for the failure to prove a prima facie case, the recommended Order will provide for dismissal of the complaint in Case 20-CA-15570.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES IN CASE 20-CA-15793

Regan Foiles first worked for Respondent as a cocktail waitress in 1974. She was fired in 1974 and rehired 2 years later. Thereafter, Foiles, a student, worked for Respondent from time to time amounting to 4 or 5 months a year. Foiles voluntarily quit on these occasions and was always permitted to return when she needed work. In early September 1980,[6] Foiles returned to work for Respondent as a cocktail waitress. Her regularly scheduled hours were 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., Saturdays and Sundays. Foiles also worked as a fill-in for 1 weekday each week.

Foiles was not a member of the Union. She testified that in early October she had a conversation with a bartender in which she suggested that the employees would have better working conditions and more job security "with the Union."[7] in mid-October, Foiles had a similar conversation with Rhonda Riley, a cocktail waitress and friend of Tampourantzis.[8] Shortly after her conversation with Riley, on October 16, Foiles was questioned by Tampourantzis concerning the Union. Tampourantzis, who was talking to Riley, called Foiles over to him and asked her how she voted in the union election. Foiles asked if there had been an election and Tampourantzis answered asking Foiles how she would vote if there was an election. Foiles then asked Tampourantzis if there was going to be an election. Tampourantzis said there had already been an election and told Foiles to keep out of the Union and to "keep away from the whole thing." Tampourantzis was not questioned about this conversation and Riley did not remember the conversation. As indicated above, Foiles' testimony is credited.

I find that Tampourantzis' questioning of Foiles tended to convey displeasure with union activity and thereby tended to discourage such activity. See PPG Industries, Inc., Lexington Plant, Fiber Glass Division, 251 NLRB 1146 (1980). Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Further, Tampourantzis' instruction to Foiles not to have anything to do with the Union unlawfully restricted Foiles' union activities and, therefore, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Interstate Transport/Security Division of PJR Enterprises, Inc., 240 NLRB 274 (1979).

On October 21, Foiles, who was not working that day, went into Respondent's bar to use the pay telephone. Tampourantzis approached Foiles and told her that she had betrayed him. Tampourantzis also said that Foiles had gotten him in trouble with the Union. He then told Foiles that she was fired and that he did not want her in the bar any more. Tampourantzis said he felt like hitting her and that he should slap her face. Foiles said she would talk to him again, when he was sober. Tampourantzis again told Foiles to leave the bar. Foiles then left the bar and went home.[9]

Tampourantzis testified that he had been at the bar for a day and a half prior to this incident. However, at the time of the incident, Tampourantzis was suffering from insufficient sleep and too much drink. For these reasons, Tampourantzis' was unable to recall what he said while discharging Foiles. However, while testifying, Tampourantzis' moved his arms in such a manner as to confirm the threatening manner described by Foiles in her testimony. Foiles' testimony regarding this incident is credited.

[5] San Francisco Culinary, Bartenders and Service Employees Welfare Fund and San Francisco Culinary, Bartenders and Service Employees Pension Plan.

[7] At the time of this conversation, the charge in Case 20-CA-15570 was pending but the complaint had not yet issued. On August 6, Respondent filed a petition in Case 20-RM-2319 seeking a Board-conducted election to resolve the question of union representation. On November 5, the Regional Director dismissed the petition based on the complaint in Case 20-CA-15570. On December 29, the Board reversed the Regional Director and reinstated the petition in Case 20-RM-2319.

[8] Foiles testified in a candid and straightforward manner and, therefore, her testimony is credited. Riley testified that she did not recall this conversation, but did not deny that the conversation occurred.

[9] Tom Glendenning, employed by Respondent as a bartender, was present during this conversation. At the hearing, counsel for the General Counsel represented that he had subpenaed Glendenning but that Glendenning had failed to appear to testify. Respondent, concurrent with its post-trial brief, moved to strike, inter alia, these representations on the ground that proof of service was not established. Further, Respondent moved that I draw an adverse inference against the General Counsel for not calling Glendenning to corroborate Foiles' testimony.

Glendenning, apparently still employed by Respondent, was equally available to Respondent to refute Foiles' testimony as he was to the General Counsel to corroborate it, but Respondent also failed to call him as a witness. Under such circumstances, no inference should be drawn. See Local 259, United Automobile, Aerospace, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (Atherton Cadillac, Inc.), 225 NLRB 421, 422, fn. 3 (1976).

I find that Tampourantzis remarks in discharging Foiles created the impression of surveillance of employees' union-related conversations and/or other union activities. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Further, Tampourantzis' threatening statements, in the presence of employee Glendenning, tended to threaten employees that Respondent would resort to force to halt union activities among its employees. By such conduct, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Respondent's defense is that it discharged Foiles because, during the week prior to her discharge, Foiles spent 10 minutes talking to another employee, leaving Riley to wait on all the customers. On the evening in question, Foiles, believing that no waitress was scheduled to relieve her, called a waitress named Betty to work as her relief. Unbeknownst to Foiles, Tampourantzis had called another waitress to work that shift. Foiles was directed by Tampourantzis to tell Betty that she could not work. Thus, when Betty arrived, Foiles told her that she could not work and would not be paid showup time. Understandably, Betty was upset and Foiles tried to explain the mixup to her. At the tail end of this conversation Foiles suggested that, if the employees were represented by the Union, Betty would have been paid showup time.

Riley testified that Foiles, who was normally a very good employee, was talking with Betty for 10 minutes, while Riley had to wait on Foiles' customers.[10] Riley was displeased by this fact and mentioned it to her friend, Susan O'Neil, who was also a close friend of Tampourantzis. Riley testified that on October 18 she had drinks with O'Neil and at that time mentioned that Foiles had been talking to Betty about the Union, while Riley had to wait on her customers. O'Neil testified that on October 19 she repeated this conversation to Tampourantzis. O'Neil testified that she told Tampourantzis that Foiles had talked to Betty about the Union, while Riley had to wait on Foiles' customers. Tampourantzis denied that O'Neil mentioned the Union to him. Tampourantzis' denial is not credited.

Tampourantzis testified that, after he learned that Foiles was talking instead of working he decided to fire her. He fired Foiles on October 21, the first time he saw her after that decision. As discussed above, he was not able to recall the conversation and Foiles' version of the discharge is credited. Tampourantzis testified that he has fired many other employees for breaking rules. However, he said he gave employees many chances and that it was only after they continued to break his rules that he fired them.[11] No evidence was offered that Foiles had ever broken a rule before. Foiles had never received a warning or reprimand during her employment with Respondent. Further, from the credited testimony of Foiles and Riley it appears that Tampourantzis knew that Betty was the same waitress who Foiles had called in to work as her relief. Thus, Tampourantzis knew that Foiles had a legitimate reason for talking to Betty. Foiles credibly testified that Tampourantzis was present in the bar during this conversation.[12] Finally, while Tampourantzis testified that he investigates complaints against employees to ascertain whether the complaints are true, he took no such action with respect to Foiles. Tampourantzis did not question either Foiles or Riley about this incident.

The critical issue herein is Respondent's motive for discharging Foiles. Accordingly, the General Counsel must first make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that an intent to discourage union membership was a "motivating factor" in Respondent's decision. Upon such a showing, the burden shifts to Respondent to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of such an intent. See Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

Clearly, the General Counsel has established a prima facie case. On October 16, Foiles was instructed not to have anything to do with the Union. On October 21, she was told that she had betrayed Respondent and gotten Tampourantzis in trouble with the Union. She was threatened with physical harm and discharged. The only conclusion to be drawn from such circumstances is that Foiles was discharged for her union sympathies. It is no defense that Foiles did not join the Union or engage in union activities of any substance. It is violative of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act to discharge an employee in order to prevent or discourage such activities.

Respondent has failed to rebut this prima facie case. The evidence presented in Respondent's defense establishes that, upon hearing that Foiles discussed the Union with Betty, Tampourantzis decided to terminate Foiles. He had known that Foiles had a legitimate reason to talk to Betty about the scheduling mixup that evening. In fact, Tampourantzis had told Foiles to inform Betty that she (Betty) was not needed that evening. Thus, all Tampourantzis learned from O'Neil was that Foiles discussed the Union with Betty. In discharging Foiles, Tampourantzis made no reference to the alleged reason for the discharge to any other work transgression. He only said that Foiles had betrayed him and gotten him in trouble with the Union. Further, no opportunity to explain the incident was afforded Foiles, in spite of Tampourantzis' alleged practice of giving employees such opportunities prior to discharging them. Finally, there was no evidence that Foiles had ever before violated any of Respondent's rules. According to Tampourantzis, he gave other employees "five, ten or twenty chances" before firing them.

[10] Riley testified that, except for the evening in question, Foiles "always worked, she never used to fool around or talk to customers when she was working."

[11] Tampourantzis testified that he fired employees after he gave them "ten chances." He also testified that he gave some employees "twenty chances." He did not deny Foiles' testimony that she was never warned or reprimanded during her employment with Respondent.

[12] Riley's testimony to the contrary, that Tampourantzis had left the bar momentarily, is not credited.

In sum, I find that Foiles' union sympathies were a "motivating factor" in Respondent's decision to fire her and that Respondent's defense was not a true reason for firing Foiles. A fortiori, Respondent has failed to establish that Foiles would have been discharged in the absence of her union sympathies. Therefore, I find that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Foiles for such unlawful motive.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by questioning an employee about her union sympathies; by directing an employee to disassociate herself from the Union; by creating the impression of surveillance of its employees' union conversations and activities; and by threatening an employee with physical harm because of her union activities or union sympathies.

4. Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by unlawfully discharging Regan Foiles in order to discourage union activities among its employees.

5. The unfair labor practices specifically found above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. Respondent has not engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act as alleged in the complaint in Case 20–CA–15570.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

Respondent shall be required to offer Regan Foiles reinstatement to her former position of employment or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges. Respondent shall be required to make Foiles whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered by reason of her unlawful termination, with backpay to be computed on a quarterly basis, making deductions for interim earnings, F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[13]

The Respondent, Lord Jim's, San Francisco, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Questioning employees concerning their union activities or union sympathies.

(b) Directing employees to disassociate themselves from Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local 2, or any other labor organization.

(c) Creating the impression of surveillance of its employees' union conversations or union activities.

(d) Threatening employees with physical harm because of their union activities or union sympathies.

(e) Discharging employees in order to discourage membership in or activities on behalf of the Union or any other labor organization.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the purpose of the Act:

(a) Offer to reinstate Regan Foiles to her former position of employment or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges, and make her whole for any loss of pay and benefits she may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against her, in the manner set forth above in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its San Francisco, California, facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[14] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 20, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 20, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

[13] All outstanding motions inconsistent with this recommended Order hereby are denied. In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint in Case 20-CA-15570 be dismissed in its entirety.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection
To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT question employees concerning their union activities or union sympathies.

WE WILL NOT direct employees to disassociate themselves from Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local 2, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT create the impression of surveillance of our employees' union conversations or union activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with physical harm because of their union activities or union sympathies.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees in order to discourage membership in or activities on behalf of the Union or any other labor oraganization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer to reinstate Regan Foiles to her former position of employment or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges, and WE WILL make whole Foiles for any loss of earnings she may have suffered by reason of our discrimination against her, plus interest.

LORD JIM'S

The Maumee Stone Company, Union Quarry Division and Ronald W. Taylor. Case 8-CA-13815

January 25, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On April 15, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Lewis F. Parker issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed an answering brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified herein.

The Administrative Law Judge found that Respondent excluded Ronald Taylor, the elected steward, from a collective-bargaining negotiation session. However, the Administrative Law Judge then concluded that "an entry of an order with respect to this violation" is not appropriate because "the union representative did not complain about Mr. Taylor's exclusion and none of the hourly employees or the representative objected to negotiating without Mr. Taylor."

The General Counsel excepts, contending that the Administrative Law Judge applied an improper test in determining whether Respondent's actions violated the Act. We find merit in this exception. Absent unusual circumstances, an employer cannot refuse to bargain with a person who represents a labor organization. Booth Broadcasting Co., 223 NLRB 867 (1976). The fact that Ronald Taylor was not an employee of Respondent when he was asked to leave the negotiation session is not an unusual circumstance sufficient to bar him from the session, for he had been chosen, as the union steward, to represent the employees in bargaining. Whether Respondent's actions were objectionable to others or had any adverse impact on the negotiations is not the test; that was the Administrative Law Judge's subjective reaction. The test is whether Respondent's conduct reasonably tends to interfere with protected rights. We find here that it did so, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and that a remedy is required.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Maumee Stone Company, Union Quarry Division, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent, by Paul Pruitt, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by refusing to permit Ronald Taylor, a representative chosen by the employees for purposes of bargaining, to participate in collective-bargaining negotiations.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in the unfair labor practice set forth above, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Maumee Stone Company, Union Quarry Division, Scott, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Insisting or demanding that a person selected by the employees as a representative for bargaining be excluded from participating in collective-bargaining negotiations.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

[1] The Administrative Law Judge found that agents of Respondent announced to Respondent's employees that they saw no reason why the employees would join a union because they would receive all the same benefits as Respondent's unionized employees. He further found that inasmuch as the statements were not made with the intent to discourage union activity and did not have the effect of discouraging that activity, they were not unlawful.

The General Counsel excepts, contending the Administrative Law Judge's credibility findings are erroneous and that he applied an improper standard in reaching his conclusion. We agree that the Administrative Law Judge applied an erroneous standard, for the test is not whether Respondent intended to discourage union activity or whether its conduct had that effect, but whether Respondent's conduct "reasonably tends to interfere with the free exercise of employee rights under the Act." Hanes Hosiery, Inc., 219 NLRB 338 (1975). Although the Administrative Law Judge applied an inappropriate standard in determining whether the statements violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act, in the circumstances of this case, including the nature of the statements and the nonexistence of union activity at the time the statements were made, in our opinion, the agents' comments did not constitute a promise of benefit.

(a) Post at its premises in Scott, Ohio, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[2] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 8, after being duly signed by an authorized representative, shall be posted as herein provided immediately upon receipt thereof, and be so maintained for a period of 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director for Region 8, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT insist or demand that any person selected by the Union to be a member of its bargaining committee not be present at or participate in bargaining negotiations.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

THE MAUMEE STONE COMPANY,
UNION QUARRY DIVISION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

LEWIS F. PARKER, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard on February 4, 1981, in Van Wert, Ohio. The complaint, which issued on June 30, 1980, and which was amended at the hearing,[1] alleges that Respondent The Maumee Stone Company, Union Quarry Division, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by: (1) promising, through its agents and supervisors, benefits to its employees if they refrained from engaging in union activities; (2) prohibiting an employee from engaging in protected union activity, and; (3) discharging or terminating the employment of Ronald Taylor, the Charging Party, to discourage employees from engaging in protected union activity. The complaint also alleges that Respondent, by discharging Taylor, violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

Upon the entire record and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I hereby make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

A. Commerce

Respondent admits that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

B. Background

Union Quarry Company operated a quarry, an asphalt plant, and a road construction business in Scott, Ohio, for several years. Wiley Sauls was the owner of Union Quarry. Bernie Fisher, an employee of Union Quarry since 1960, was its superintendent, and he now fills the same capacity for its successor, Maumee Stone. Vondale Taylor was, prior to its takeover by Maumee Stone, general manager of Union Quarry.

Ronald W. Taylor, the Charging Party, had been, as of the date of his last employment with the Company (November 24, 1979) an employee of Union Quarry for 4-1/2 years. Until 1978, when he suffered a back injury and was placed on medical leave, Ronald Taylor worked primarily in the quarry. On his return to the Company on June 4, 1979, Vondale Taylor told him he could not return to his job because it was filled. After some discussion, Ronald Taylor was given a job at the asphalt plant. He stayed there until he was laid off on November 24, 1979.

In late December 1979, Maumee Stone purchased the quarry, its equipment, and buildings from Union Quarry. The asphalt plant was purchased by a company named Oamco and Fred R. Creager & Sons purchased Union Quarry's road construction operation. After the takeover of Union Quarry, Vondale Taylor was hired by Fred R.

[1] Upon motion by the General Counsel, I amended the third sentence of par. 2 of the complaint to read: "Annually, in the course and conduct of its business, the Employer received goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Ohio."

Creager & Sons. Sauls, the former owner, was retained as a consultant by Maumee Stone but Michael Uhl, the treasurer of that company, denied that either Sauls or Vondale Taylor had any authority on the day that it began to operate the quarry to speak on behalf of Maumee. Maumee Stone began operating the quarry on January 2, 1980.

1. The January 2 meeting

On January 2, a morning meeting of all employees of Maumee Stone was held at its new quarry.[2] Vondale Taylor addressed the employees and informed them of the change of ownership. According to Routt, who attended this meeting, when one of the employees asked about a union, Vondale Taylor stated: "All the other quarries is union and chances are that we would be union, too, but he said he saw no reason why we'd want to go union, because we get the same as others."

Later that same day Uhl of Maumee Stone was introduced to the employees by Sauls who also discussed a union: ". . . . he sees no reason why we'd want to go union, because we'll get the same as what others get."

Another employee, Mace, corroborated Routt's description of the statements made by Vondale Taylor and Sauls. Mace believed that Sauls was speaking for the new company. Uhl told the employees that no changes would be made for the time being and that the 10 quarry employees then working would be retained and paid the same salary as before. He also said that he could not make any further commitments to them but that Maumee Stone's president, Kirkby, would speak to the employees about a week later.

In mid-January, Kirkby spoke to the Union Quarry employees, told them that all Maumee Stone quarries were union and said that if they wanted to they could form a union. He asked them to choose two or three representatives and said that negotiations would begin in about 2 weeks. The quarry employees contacted a representative of the International Union of Operating Engineers. Two meetings took place, and in late January all active quarry employees signed union authorization cards.

2. Ronald Taylor's status after his November 1979 layoff

Although Ronald Taylor had been laid off in November 1979, he continued to have some connection with the quarry, for he went with his wife, Connie, to pick up her check at the quarry office during the first few months of 1980. At one of these visits, Bill Snyder, the weigh master, gave him a W-2 form to fill out.

On January 18, 1980, while Ronald Taylor at the quarry, he asked Vondale Taylor and Bernie Fisher about the possibility of employment with the new company. They answered that they did not buy the company and that, "They didn't know nothing about it."

Sometime during January 1980, three Union Quarry employees visited Jack Smith, a union steward at another Maumee Stone quarry. He arranged for a union representative to be at his house on the following Saturday; on that day, the whole quarry crew signed union cards. Ronald Taylor was not at this meeting.

On January 30, 1980, Vondale Taylor and Bernie Fisher called two quarry employees, Brent Harris and Leo Carrier, to a meeting at the quarry. Harris testified that Taylor and Fisher said that they heard the employees were going union, that they did not have 100 percent of the employees to sign union cards,and that if they were going to be 100 percent, Rock (Ronald) and Connie Taylor would have to sign union cards. Fisher also repeated his statement to other employees on the same day.

On February 13, 1980, Ronald Taylor was invited to a union meeting at the Holiday Inn in Van Wert, Ohio. He signed a union card at this meeting. On March 6, 1980, at a union meeting in Scott, Ohio, the quarry employees present elected Ronald Taylor as steward. The next day he went to the quarry to pick up his wife's check and saw Vondale Taylor and Bernie Fisher:

> Q. What, if anything, was said?
> A. Well, I was joking, I said, I see you got a new steward. And he said, Who? And I said, I'm your new steward. And he said, No, you won't ever be my steward. He said, because you're on lay-off.

On March 10, 1980, Fisher telephoned Ronald Taylor at home and told him that he should attend a Federal safety meeting which was to be held at the Auglaize Quarry on April 8. On March 14, 1980, Fisher told Ronald Taylor to attend another safety meeting scheduled for March 29 at the Union Quarry. Quarry employees are required by Federal law to attend these meetings. Fisher testified that he decided to send Ronald Taylor to the meetings in case he was hired.

On March 28, 1980, Ronald Taylor went to the Union Quarry offices after he was informed that there would be a negotiating meeting at 10 a.m. He testified that shortly before 10 a.m.:

> . . . Fred, the union representative, come in. They all walked in the office. Fred walked right on by me. I tailed in right behind him. I got about ten feet inside the door.
> Q. And what, if anything, happened when you got ten feet inside the door?
> A. Mr. Pruitt come over, put his hand on my shoulder and asked me to leave without any further explanation.
> Q. He didn't say anything more than please leave?
> A. No, sir.

Pruitt (Respondent's general manager) explained at the hearing that he asked Ronald Taylor to leave because he thought it would be inappropriate to sit down at a negotiating table and discuss wages and benefits of employees with someone who was not an employee.

[2] Maumee Stone hired all 10 employees who were working in the quarry as of that date. Ronald Taylor was not one of them, since he was on layoff.

Ronald Taylor left. Later, when the union representative came out of the meeting, Ronald Taylor said, "Hey, what's the story?" He said, "The company don't recognize you as an employee, until you're an employee. I can't help you one bit."

Ronald Taylor then asked Pruitt, "Just where do I stand with the company?" Pruitt said that he had no record of Ronald Taylor's seniority with the Company, had never seen Ronald Taylor before that day, and asked Ronald Taylor to explain what he had done before the takeover. Pruitt told Ronald Taylor that he would be called if the quarry needed help that summer. Later that day, Bernie Fisher told Brent Harris to inform Ronald Taylor not to attend the safety meetings. Although Bernie Fisher told him that some employees were a little upset about Ronald Taylor's exclusion from this meeting, Pruitt testified that none of the hourly employees or the union representative objected to conducting negotiations without Ronald Taylor being present. In April 1980, Union Quarry and the Union signed a collective-bargaining agreement effective February 1, 1980, through January 31, 1983. Ronald Taylor did not appear at union meetings to discuss the agreement, nor did he vote on ratification.

3. Ronald Taylor's Blue Cross coverage

Although he was laid off in November, Ronald Taylor used the last pay which he received from Union Quarry to pay $240 for Blue Cross coverage until February 1981. At that time, although he was not on Maumee Stone's payroll, he received a new policy from Blue Cross which was paid for by Maumee Stone. From that time until September 16, 1980, he received no bills for Blue Cross insurance. Uhl stated at the hearing that Ronald Taylor's Blue Cross coverage was mistakenly paid by Maumee Stone after February because Sauls gave him a list of road crew employees whose Blue Cross coverage should be continued even though they had been laid off. Ronald Taylor's name was included in that list. At the direction of Vondale Taylor, Fisher sent a letter to Ronald Taylor canceling his policy effective October 10, 1980.

Ronald Taylor testified that as far as he knew, Maumee Stone had taken no action against any other employees because of their union activities, and Routt agreed that Maumee Stone did not do anything actively to prevent the Union Quarry employees from having a union. Ronald Taylor has not been hired by Maumee Stone, although a temporary employee was taken on in November 1980.

C. Legal Discussion

1. The authority of Wiley Sauls and Vondale Taylor

Respondent denies that either Sauls or Vondale Taylor were its agents or supervisors when they made the statements which the General Counsel claims are illegal, but the evidence convinces me that their statements are binding on Respondent.

Sauls was the former owner of Maumee Stone who, at the time he talked with the quarry employees on January 2, 1980, was a consultant to that company. Vondale Taylor was not, according to Uhl, employed by Maumee Stone on that date, and denied that either Vondale Taylor or Sauls had authority to speak for the Company on that date, yet Fisher, the quarry supervisor, testified that until January 1981, Vondale Taylor was "over me" and he later canceled Ronald Taylor's Blue Cross policy on Vondale Taylor's orders. Uhl also conceded that employees of the quarry had been in the habit of talking to Vondale Taylor for 10 years. Furthermore, he stated that while Vondale Taylor was employed by the Creager Company, "I'm not saying there wasn't some flow over from before," the "before," I take it, referring to his job with Union Quarry.

After considering the evidence on this point, I reject Uhl's conclusion that Sauls and Vondale Taylor had no authority to speak for Maumee Stone. They may not have been directed to make the challenged statements, but both of them had a past history of authority over the employees of the quarry. Sauls was a consultant with the new company, and Vondale Taylor was employed by a company whose operations were apparently closely related to the quarry's operations.[3] Vondale Taylor also took actions on behalf of the quarry after the takeover which are consistent with the conclusion that he was still acting as a de facto supervisor at Union Quarry. Finally, Uhl's failure to disavow the statements made by Sauls is inconsistent with the claim that he spoke without authority. See Cagle's Inc., 234 NLRB 1148, 1149 (1978), affd. 588 F.2d 943 (5th Cir. 1979). In conclusion, I find that Sauls and Vondale Taylor spoke at the January 2 meeting as agents of Respondent.

If this conclusion is incorrect, the statements made by Sauls and Vondale Taylor are nevertheless imputable to Respondent because the quarry employees had reason to believe that they spoke for the new owner. This belief, expressed by Mace at the hearing, was not unreasonable in light of Sauls' and Vondale Taylor's status, and the fact that Uhl, representing the new owner, accompanied Sauls to the meeting. Moreover, the fact that Uhl never disavowed Sauls' statement would indicate to the employees that Sauls spoke for the management of Maumee Stone. Broyhill Company, 210 NLRB 288, 294 (1974), affd. 514 F.2d 655 (8th Cir. 1975); Crawford Container, Inc., 234 NLRB 851, 859 (1978); *P.E. 2. The promise of benefits

According to the Board in American Telecommunications Corporation, Electromechanical, 249 NLRB 1135, 1136 (1980), an employer's statement that "employees would receive all the benefits of a union contract without a union was promise of benefits made for the purpose of coercing the employees into rejecting the Union."

[3] See Budget Marketing, Inc., 241 NLRB 1108, fn. 1 (1979).

[4] Dayton Food Fair Stores, Inc., 399 F.2d 153 (6th Cir. 1968), cited by Respondent, is not inconsistent with this ruling, for there the court held on the basis of a different factual situation that an employee did not have just cause to believe that a supervisor's remarks were made on behalf of the employer.

The Board reached this conclusion because American Telecommunications' director of operations did not limit his comments on benefits to "informing the . . . employees that in the past Respondent had a practice of giving the same benefits at all of its plants." Rather, his comments were interpreted as:

> . . . conveying the message that any benefits which would accrue to . . . employees pursuant to subsequent collective bargaining automatically would be granted to the Upland employees, and that these employees would receive such benefits whether or not they also selected the Union as their bargaining representative. Id. at 1136.

Respondent argues that the facts presented in this case are far different from those in American Telecommunications, supra, and claims that the statements made by Vondale Taylor and Sauls amounted to nothing more than an argument that the quarry employees did not need a union, a claim which is lawful, citing Pearl Recycle Center, 237 NLRB 491, 494 (1978); Howard Johnson Company, 242 NLRB 386 (1979); and Gerry's Cash Markets, Inc., Gerry's I.G.A., 238 NLRB 1141, 1153 (1978), in all of which the Board agreed that statements to the effect that union representation was unnecessary did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

After considering the statements of Vondale Taylor and Sauls and the context in which they were made, I find that they were not promises of benefits made for the "purpose of coercing the employees into rejecting the Union." American Telecommunications Corporation, supra.

There is no doubt that on January 2, the employees of the quarry were concerned about their jobs, but the General Counsel insists that the challenged statements were made to discourage the formation of a union, not to alleviate fears about future employment. The evidence presented by the General Counsel does not support this argument. The purpose of the meetings on this day was to reassure the quarry employees about their positions with the new company, not to discourage the formation of a union by the promise of benefits, for unionization was discussed only after some employees asked questions about this subject. Indeed, it was only several weeks later (and after Kirkby said that he did not oppose a union) that the quarry employees began serious union activity. Considering the timing of the challenged statements, and the lack of substantial evidence of union animosity, I conclude that they were, at most, expressions of opinion that employees would be as well off without a union as with one, Gerry's, supra. The statements were not made with the intent of interfering with the formation of a union at the quarry. Furthermore, the statements did not have such an effect, for a collective-bargainin agreement with the employees was signed only a few months after the allegedly intimidating statements were made.

3. The refusal to permit Ronald Taylor to participate in a collective-bargaining meeting

Absent unusual circumstances, an employer cannot refuse to bargain with a person who represents a labor organization. Eskimo Radiator Mfg. Co., 243 NLRB 1127 (1979). Although Ronald Taylor was not an employee of Union Quarry when he was asked to leave the bargaining meeting, this is not an "unusual circumstance," for the quarry employees elected him as a union steward and were entitled to his representation at the meeting.

However, Respondent's violation of Section 8(a)(1), while not strictly justifiable, is understandable. Pruitt asked Ronald Taylor to leave the bargaining session because he did not feel that it was appropriate to discuss employee benefits with a nonemployee. Although Pruitt was wrong as a matter of law, "the union representative did not complain about Mr. Taylor's exclusion and none of the hourly employees or the representative objected to negotiating without Mr. Taylor." Thus, while Pruitt's act was a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, it was objectionable, apparently, only to Ronald Taylor, a nonemployee, and it had no adverse effect on negotiations which, very shortly, resulted in the signing of a collective-bargining agreement. Under these circumstances, I do not believe that the entry of an order with respect to this violation is appropriate. See Bowling Corporation of America, Inc. d/b/a Alganquin Bowling Center, Inc., and Edgar Meyer, 170 NLRB 1768, 1770 (1968).

4. The claim that Ronald Taylor was discharged because of his Union activity

The General Counsel alleges that on March 28, 1980, when Pruitt told Ronald Taylor that he was not an employee of Union Quarry, Ronald Taylor had status as a laid off employee and that his status was unlawfully terminated as a result of his union activities.

The General Counsel's burden in this case is to establish that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in Respondent's treatment of Ronald Taylor. Wright Line, A Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

The General Counsel claims that Ronald Taylor possessed "the status of a laid off employee with full recall rights." These rights were supposedly recognized by Respondent or its agents through their treatment of Ronald Taylor after the takeover. These facts are discussed fully above, but they do not indicate that Respondent unequivocally recognized Ronald Taylor's "recall rights." Ronald Taylor's Blue Cross coverage was continued, not because he was an employee, but because of a mistake. He was scheduled to attend safety meetings in case of a recall, not because he was considered an employee with an absolute right to be recalled. Thus, I cannot agree with the General Counsel that the facts of this case "establishes the Respondent considered Ron Taylor to possess employment status with recall rights from January 1 through March 28."

However, I will assume for purposes of discussion that the General Counsel's conclusion is correct, and that Ronald Taylor was entitled to be recalled if there was an opening. Assuming this to be true, none of Respondent's actions with respect to Ronald Taylor unlawfully affected this status, for he was never told that he would not be rehired if there was an opening. Pruitt told him on March 28 that he was not an employee, but specifically advised Ronald Taylor that he would be considered for any future opening at the quarry.

Despite this conclusion, I will further assume for the sake of argument that Ronald Taylor's status as employee with recall rights was terminated on March 28, 1980; however, after considering the arguments presented by the General Counsel, I find that his status was not terminated because he was engaging in protected activity. In reaching this conclusion I have considered those factors which the Board has in past cases looked to for assistance in determining the "true, underlying motive" for a discharge. W. H. Scott d/b/a Scott's Wood Products, 242 NLRB 1193 (1979). These are: knowledge of union activity, antiunion bias, demonstrated unlawful hostility, and the timing of the discharge, Jeffrey P. Jenks d/b/a Jenks Cartage Company, 219 NLRB 368, 369 (1975); N.L.R.B. v. Dan River Mills, Incorporated, Alabama Division, 274 F.2d 381 (5th Cir. 1960). The validity of the reason for the discharge must also be considered. Paramount Metal & Finishing Co., Inc. and Paramount Plating Co., Inc., 225 NLRB 464 (1976).

Neither the management of Maumee Stone nor Pruitt has any history of union bias; in fact, other Maumee quarries are unionized. Before Pruitt excluded Ronald Taylor from the bargaining session because he was not recognized as an employee, Kirkby had told the quarry employees that he did not oppose a union and it is, therefore, not credible that Pruitt's action on March 28 was the result of union animus, or animus toward Ronald Taylor because he knew of his status as the union steward.

The reason for Pruitt's action of March 28 is explainable as due to puzzlement over the reason for Ronald Taylor's appearance at the bargaining session. Pruitt was concerned that a nonemployee was to bargain over employee rights. His action was incorrect as a matter of law, and Ronald Taylor should have been admitted to the bargaining session, but he was not excluded because of his status as a union steward or because of unwillingness to negotiate with the union, for Pruitt did negotiate with the union representative on this day and thereafter. These negotiations were apparently conducted without rancor, and they resulted in an agreement. There is, furthermore, no evidence that Respondent took any adverse action with respect to other employees who supported the Union.

Considering all of the evidence presented by the General Counsel, I find that Pruitt's action on March 28, 1980, was not prompted by Ronald Taylor's union activities or any desire to discourage union activities.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Maumee Stone Company, Union Quarry Division is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 18, AFL-CIO, has been, and is now, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent did not, by its agents and supervisors, promise benefits to employees if they refrained from engaging in union activities.

4. Respondent, by its agent, Paul Pruitt, at its facilities, refused to permit an elected union steward, who was not an employee, from participating in collective-bargaining negotiations, thus prohibiting him from engaging in union activity protected by Section 7 of the Act; nevertheless, because of the circumstances described above, the entry of an order with respect to this violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act would serve no purpose.

5. Respondent did not unlawfully discharge or terminate the employment of Ronald Taylor on March 28, 1980.

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On February 13, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Bruce C. Nasdor issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting brief, and Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a brief in support thereof and in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.

1. The General Counsel excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to find that Respondent additionally violated Section 8(a)(1) by interrogating employees Darlene Stambaugh, Sonia Shaeffer, and Rosa Jones about their sentiments regarding the Union. We find merit in these exceptions.

About 3 days before the July 16, 1979,[3] election, Stambaugh was called to the desk of her supervisor, Greg Nash, and asked whether she was "for the Union." When she replied that she did not have to tell him, he said, "No, you don't." She went on, however, and stated that she planned to vote for the Union. The Administrative Law Judge, relying on J. K. Electronics, Inc., d/b/a Wesco Electrical Company,[4] found no violation in this conduct. We find that the facts here are significantly different from those in Wesco. In that case, a supervisor first asked an employee whether she had been to any union meetings, and then took the question back, saying that he could not ask her that question. The Board found no violation, finding that the supervisor immediately took the question back and that it was clear that he did not wish the employee to respond. Here, in contrast, Nash did not withdraw his question but simply conceded, when challenged, that Stambaugh was correct in saying she did not have to answer. By that time, he had already confronted Stambaugh and, if she did not answer, her silence could be construed as support for the Union.[5] Accordingly, we find that, by Nash's conduct, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

A few days before the election, Sonia Shaeffer was asked by her former supervisor, McArthur, what she thought the Union "could get for her." She replied that she expected better pay and benefits. The Administrative Law Judge found that this conversation did not constitute interrogation within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act because Shaeffer was openly active on behalf of the Union and the question came up in the context of a personal conversation about McArthur's baby and included a general discussion of union benefits and wages around the country. The Board has held, however, that the coercive impact of such questions is not diminished by the employee's open union support or by the absence of attendant threats, PPG Industries, Inc., Lexington Plant, Fiber Glass Division, 251 NLRB 1146 (1980), and that such an interrogation is not made lawful by being conducted in a "friendly" manner, Quemetco, Inc., a subsidiary of RSR Corporation, 223 NLRB 470 (1976). The fact that McArthur was no longer Shaeffer's supervisor does not require a different result, since he remained one of Respondent's supervisors and hence its agent.

On July 18, employee Rosa Jones was approached at her desk by Supervisor Danfelt, who asked her how she felt about the Union. She told

[1] The General Counsel and Respondent have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] In adopting the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act when it transferred employee David Reisinger, we disavow his finding that at the time of the transfer Reisinger had not identified himself as a union organizer or supporter, since Reisinger had already been interrogated by Supervisor Lehr upon returning from a lunchtime visit to the union hall. Nevertheless, the General Counsel has not established a violation of the Act by a preponderance of the evidence. Further, in view of the Administrative Law Judge's discrediting of Reisinger's testimony that Lehr told him he was being transferred because he was talking too much about the Union, we find it unnecessary to pass on the Administrative Law Judge's statement that, even assuming arguendo that Lehr had made such a statement, there would still be no violation of the Act.

Although we find, contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating employees Stambaugh and Shaeffer, we nevertheless find that the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act by transferring Stambaugh and reprimanding Shaeffer.

Danfelt that she did not want to talk about it, and he replied that nothing would happen if she did. Jones testified that, when she replied that she thought the Union was "all right," Danfelt's complexion changed and he left the area. He returned shortly thereafter and asked if she thought a union could get her more money. When she answered that she did not know, Danfelt asserted that it was by no means certain that it could. The Administrative Law Judge concluded that Danfelt's assurance that nothing would happen to Jones as a result of her answering his question rendered his conduct lawful. We do not agree. Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, an inquiry into an employee's views toward a union, even in the context of assurances against reprisals, reasonably tends to interfere with the free exercise of an employee's Section 7 rights.[6] We therefore conclude that Respondent additionally violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when Danfelt questioned Jones.

2. The General Counsel excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Respondent did not violate the Act by prohibiting handbilling on Respondent's property. We find merit in this exception. On July 18, Supervisor Lehr ordered employee Jill Strayer to "get the hell off" Respondent's parking lot, saying that she was not allowed to distribute "junk" on company property. The Administrative Law Judge found that Lehr was aware that the literature Strayer was distributing related to the Union, but that his conduct was not unlawful since Strayer was able to reach even more employees from outside the parking lot, and both Strayer and other employees were allowed to distribute literature in the plant itself. It is well established, however, that employees have the right to solicit union support by handbilling during nonworktime while on their employer's premises,[7] and a violation of this right is not cured by the fact that an employer did not prohibit distribution on other occasions.[8]

3. The Union filed timely objections to conduct affecting the results of the election which were based on conduct which was also the subject of the unfair labor practice allegations. Based on his conclusions that Respondent had engaged in only three instances of coercive interrogation involving 2 of approximately 180 employees, and that these incidents were isolated and not pervasively disseminated, the Administrative Law Judge recommended that the objections be overruled. We have found, however, that Respondent committed additional unfair labor practices directly involving at least six employees. Further, it is clear that word of these unfair labor practices was disseminated to additional employees. In these circumstances we find that Respondent's unfair labor practices were not isolated. Since five of Respondent's unfair labor practices occurred during the critical period we find that by this conduct Respondent interfered with its employees' free and untrammeled choice in the election. Accordingly, we shall order that the election in Case 4–RC–13685 be set aside, and we shall direct that a second election be conducted.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Insert the following new Conclusions of Law 3 and 4 and delete Conclusion of Law 5:

"3. By coercively interrogating employees Diana Oberdick, David Reisinger, Darlene Stambaugh, Sonia Shaeffer, and Rosa Jones, and by interfering with employee Jill Strayer's lawful distribution of union literature, as found above, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

"4. By engaging in the conduct described above which took place during the critical period prior to the election, Respondent has interfered with its employees' freedom of choice in the election conducted on July 16, 1979."

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Graham Architectural Products Corporation, York, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Insert the following as new paragraph 1(b) and reletter the subsequent paragraph accordingly:

"(b) Interfering with the lawful distribution of union literature on Respondent's property."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election held in Case 4–RC–13685 be, and it hereby is, set aside, and that said case be, and it hereby is, remanded to the Regional Director for Region 4 to conduct a new election when he deems the circumstances permit the free choice of a bargaining representative.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing during which all parties were given an opportunity to present evidence and argument, it has been determined that we violated the law by committing unfair labor practices. In order to remedy this conduct, we are being required to post this notice. We intend to comply with this requirement, and to abide by the following commitments:

We will not coercively interrogate our employees concerning their union membership or activities.

We will not interfere with the lawful distribution of union literature on our premises.

We will not in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

Graham Architectural Products Corporation

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Bruce C. Nasdor, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in York, Pennsylvania, on March 6 and 7, 1980. The charge in Case 4-CA-10333 was filed by District No. 98, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO (hereinafter referred to as the Union or Petitioner), on July 16, 1979. On July 23, 1979, the Union filed objections to the election.[1] Thereafter, first and second amended charges were filed on July 31 and September 19, 1979, respectively. On February 13, 1980, an order consolidating the unfair labor practice case and Case 4-RC-13685 issued. The allegations in the complaint and the objections to the election parallel each other. The complaint alleges that Graham Architectural Products Corporation (hereinafter called Respondent) violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (hereinafter referred to as the Act), by interrogating employees, preventing an employee from handbilling during nonwork hours on company property, threatening to stall negotiations by engaging in dilatory tactics, telling employees they were not getting a raise because they were seeking union representation, transferring union adherents to other jobs, and disciplining a union adherent.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs, I make the following:

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Pennsylvania corporation, is engaged in the manufacture of commercial aluminum replacement windows. Its facility located at East Street and Penn Central Railroad York, Pennsylvania, is involved herein. During the preceding year, Respondent purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Respondent is an employee engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

District Lodge No. 98, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE EVIDENCE

The Union commenced its organizational efforts in the spring of 1979[2] and filed a petition on May 7, 1979. Prior to the election, which was held on July 16, 1979, the Union filed a request to proceed.

Interrogation

Diana Oberdick testified that, sometime in early July, her supervisor, Robert Reichard, approached her where she was working and asked if she knew how the Union got started in there (hereinafter the plant). She said she did not know. Oberdick allegedly communicated this conversation to three of her coworkers.

Oberdick testified further that, on July 10, Reichard asked her if they could go outside the plant and talk. They went outside and stood between the main building and the warehouse where they discussed her personal problems[3] and her relationship with another company supervisor. She testified that after the conversation "he asked me what my opinion was, what did I think about the union situation and I told him." She responded that the Company had mistreated her and it did not really matter to her, but she "would be for the Union if it would get in."

The conversation lasted approximately 30 minutes. Reichard did not testify.

David Reisinger testified that, during his lunch hour on July 9, he went to the union hall with another employee, Alan Johnson, and picked up a union badge and union literature. When he returned to the plant at 12:30 p.m., he was called into the office of Michael Lehr, his supervisor. On his way to Lehr's office, Reisinger met him at the timeclock. He testified that Lehr asked him where he had been to lunch. Reisinger responded that he went to Turkey Hill. Upon further questioning, Reisinger responded he had gone to the union hall. Lehr asked him what he had gotten from the union hall and he said he wanted to see it. Reisinger told Lehr he could not see any of the material. Reisinger testified that he usually played basketball with Lehr at lunchtime. The conversation lasted 15 or 20 minutes and other subjects were discussed. Lehr did not testify.

[1] Respondent moved to dismiss the objections because the Union executed a request to proceed. It avers that this constituted a waiver to the right to file objections.

[3] A couple of weeks prior, Oberdick had walked out of the plant as a result of some dissatisfaction.

Darlene Stambaugh testified that, on July 13, her supervisor, Greg Nash, called her over to his desk[4] and asked whether she was for the Union. She replied that she did not have to tell him and Nash responded, "No, you don't." Stambaugh did proceed to tell Nash that she was not ashamed of the fact that she was voting for the Union. Thereafter they engaged in an hour and a half conversation discussing the pros and cons of the Union. The latter part of the conversation is not alleged to be violative of the Act.

Stambaugh testified further that she openly engaged in union activities by wearing a union button and handing out union literature and pins. According to her testimony, she made no effort to hide these activities and performed them in the open where she was observed by Nash and other supervisors.

Sonia Shaeffer testified that, a few days before the election, Supervisor Michael McArthur came to her desk and said hello, and she asked McArthur about his baby. McArthur then asked Shaeffer what she thought the Union could get for her. She replied that the Union would get her more money and better benefits. They then talked about different wages, the cost of living across the country and the west coast, and that if the employees went on strike they could not collect unemployment benefits.

Shaeffer testified that she and McArthur were friends, and she openly engaged in union activities, by handing out union literature at the plant gate, helping to solicit signatures on union authorization cards, and discussing the Union with employees. At the time of her conversation with McArthur she was wearing a union button.[5] McArthur was not called to testify.

Rosa Jones testified that, on July 18, she was approached at her desk by Art Danfelt who asked her how she felt about the Union. Jones testified that she told Danfelt that she did not want to talk about it, and he told her that nothing would happen if she talked about it. Jones told him that the Union was "all right." Danfelt then left the area. Danfelt was not called as a witness.

Prohibiting Handbilling

Jill Strayer testified that on July 18, at 6:30 a.m.,[6] she began handing out union literature on the company parking lot. After 15 or 20 minutes, Supervisor Michael Lehr drove into the parking lot and, according to her testimony, "he told me that I wasn't allowed to hand junk out on company property." Strayer advised him that she had a right to distribute union literature on the company parking lot, but Lehr told her to get off the company property and to move to the railroad tracks, approximately 100 yards away.[7] After a few minutes, Strayer went into the plant where she continued handbill to her coworkers. It took her 5 minutes to go into the plant, clock in, and begin work. Therefore, if Lehr's conduct interfered with Strayer's activities it was for a 5-minute duration. Strayer did not offer a handbill to Lehr.

The Threat To Engage in Dilatory Tactics

Reisinger testified that about 3 weeks prior to the election he attended a meeting in Respondent's cafeteria with several other employees and Donald Graham, Respondent's president. The purpose of the meeting, which Reisinger testified he called, was to discuss a rumor that two plant managers were going to be fired. The employees told Graham they did not want these individuals terminated. Graham replied that the rumor was false and that one of the individuals was being promoted to another position.

The first subject matter testified to by Reisinger was the meeting with Graham. Initially, Reisinger did not remember much of the meeting and testified "but over the time, I don't remember it. I have a hard time remembering." After some prodding by counsel, Reisinger testified that Graham stated, "If the Union came in he would bargain in good faith, but it would take a year to a year and a half to reach an agreement, a contract." On cross-examination, he qualified his testimony to the extent that Graham said, regarding the negotiations, "it might take a year, a year and a half."

Graham testified that at the meeting one employee stated that the Union would quickly resolve all of their problems. In response to this, Graham told the employees that if the Union won the election the Company "would negotiate in good faith as we had in other union plants that we have, and that we might reach a contract quickly as we did in the New Kensington,[8] or that it might take a substantial length of time and they might have higher benefits or lower benefits."

Graham testified that a week before the election he spoke to the entire complement of employees in small groups of 15. He clarified, in his words, as best he could, what would take place after the election and stated that negotiations might take a significant period of time or they might not, and no one could project such a thing. He testified that there were those of the employees who had been told that July 21 would be an immediate solution to all problems if the Union won the election. He was attempting to clarify this.

On July 13, Respondent disseminated to all employees by means of a leaflet the following:[9]

[4] Stambaugh testified that Nash's desk was on the production line in an open area where the employees worked in close proximity to the desk, which was not walled or partitioned off.

[5] McArthur was not Shaeffer's supervisor nor was he on the same shift as she.

[6] Her shift started at 7 a.m.

[7] This location was the entranceway for people coming into the plant, according to the testimony of Strayer. Moreover, she testified that at the initial location where she was handbilling, not all of the employees would pass her, but when she moved to the tracks at the plant entrance she was at a position where most of the employees would pass her as they came to work.

[8] New Kensington Container is a related plant owned by Graham and it is organized, and under contract.

[9] The leaflet which was received in evidence, contained many questions and answers; this quote is only one of the questions and answers.

> Q. If the Union won the election, how long would it take to negotiate a new labor agreement?
> A. Who can tell!! One thing is for certain at every clause, every word and every punctuation mark must be negotiated, It's not just their proposals. They have to bargain over our proposals and counterproposals, it is quite common for "first" contracts to take months to negotiate.

Threat To Withhold Raises

Jill Strayer testified that she had a conversation with Respondent's vice president, Russell Trout, at which time she asked him about a rumor that the other plant[10] was getting raises. Strayer testified that she did not remember Trout's exact words but, "that they were working on it or something like that." Strayer was prompted by leading questions to testify further that she specifically asked Trout about raises for the plant where she worked, which is the subject of this litigation. She testified that Trout responded "that we were asking for a union and the other plant was not." She allegedly then said to Trout, "Well in plain words, we are the bad guys and they are the good guys." According to her, Trout merely grinned but made no verbal response.

Strayer admitted that during the conversation she told Trout that if Graham would give the employees a wage increase "that this union thing would go away." On cross-examination, she admitted that Trout stated that during the union campaign Respondent could not give a raise that was not scheduled. According to her testimony, Trout also said that the reason he was telling her this was because he had been told by his lawyers that Respondent could not give a wage increase.

Strayer testified that on June 6 she and all other employees received a company leaflet on company stationery, that stated, inter alia:

> Q. If Graham does not want a union, why doesn't he offer us something?
> A. Federal law prohibits a company from making any unscheduled changes in wages, hours or working conditions once a union files a petition.[11]

The Transfers of Reisinger and Stambaugh

Reisinger's conversation with his supervisor, Lehr, has been set forth supra, in the section herein captioned "Interrogation." This alleged conversation occurred on July 9. According to Reisinger, Lehr concluded the conversation by stating that Reisinger was going to have to stop talking union and that he was being sent back to the warehouse to separate metal. Later in his testimony, his version was, "I was talking too much about the union, trying to get the union in." Reisinger testified on direct examination that he had never worked in the warehouse before and that he was not busy at the warehouse, but spent most of his time throwing a frisbee. He testified that he received the same pay while working in the warehouse as he received before his transfer. Another employee, Robert Hillegas, was sent to the warehouse at the same time as Reisinger. Reisinger was reassigned to the inspector's job sometime after the election.

During his cross-examination, Reisinger deviated from his earlier testimony and admitted that he was a troubleshooter for the Company, that he annually performed inventory work in the warehouse in January and July, and that he was taken off his regular work as inspector and assigned to other jobs on a temporary basis. He testified that he had actually been sent out of the plant to other cities to perform installation work on jobs in Ohio, Chicago, Boston, and Baltimore.

Reisinger testified further that, in July 1979, the Company was busier than it had ever been, and that there were more parts in the warehouse to be inventoried than ever before. Furthermore, because a supervisor of the crew that performs inventory work had been injured and was not working, the warehouse was a mess and parts were scattered all over the floor, rather than being in their place on racks. Thus, there was work to be done, but it required two individuals to carry the metal. In view of the fact that no one was willing to help him, he spent his time, as stated earlier, throwing a frisbee.

On cross-examination Reisinger admitted that, at the time of his conversation with Lehr, his union activities were not known.

Stambaugh began working for Respondent in mid-April as an "Assembler C," her job was that of "dropping sash." The job involves carrying glass portions of the windows to the windowframe and placing them in the frame. Sometime during the middle of the week of July 16, Nash instructed Stambaugh to "wrap windows." She was told that she would be wrapping for just that 1 day, but in fact continued until January 1980. She testified that it was a less preferable job, because there is heavy work involved and it requires very little skill. Her classification and pay remained the same. "Wrapping windows" is to prepare the windows for shipment by placing cardboard between them and wrapping them in paper.

Stambaugh testified that persons in the assembler C classification performed various duties besides "dropping sash." She testified further that it is a rare occurrence for employees to be transferred among the various jobs on the production line.

She also testified that her worksite was located 6 to 8 feet from where she worked "dropping sash." Moreover, according to her testimony, there were three or four people less to talk to, although she concedes that during breaks she could talk to more of her coworkers. She also worked with another employee who helped her wrap windows. She did not complain to Nash when he asked her to wrap windows. Nash did not testify.

Stambaugh admitted that during her tenure with the Company she built sash, wrapped windows, dropped sash, and screwed sash. These transfers occurred before she engaged in any union activities.

[11] The document was received in evidence as Resp. Exh. 1.

The Reprimand of Sonia Shaeffer

Shaeffer engaged in union activities by handbilling the plant, helping to get cards signed, talking to employees about the Union, and wearing a large union button at the plant. She was one of the Union's observers at the election.

Shaeffer testified that, on July 25, she was ill and instructed her daughter to call the personnel office at approximately 4 p.m. to report her absence. The next day, July 26, she sent her daughter to pick up her paycheck and to report her absence for that day. She testified that on July 27 her husband called the personnel office around 3 p.m. to report that she would be out.

She did not call in herself on these occasions because it was a "hassle" to call.

When Shaeffer reported to work on July 30 she was given a written reprimand[12] by her second-shift supervisor, Phillip Armold.

Respondent's work rules provide for disciplinary action when an employee fails to call in when absent.

Armold testified that, on July 25 and 26, Shaeffer failed to report to work and did not call in to report her absences. He testified that he checked with the receptionist whose job it is to report (by writing down the names of people who call in) their absences. According to Armold, Shaeffer's name was not on the call-in sheet. He also testified that on July 26, at or about 5 p.m., which was an hour and half after the shift started, Shaeffer's daughter came to the plant to pick up her check. Her daughter did not mention Shaeffer's absence. On Friday, July 27, when Arnold reported to work, he was told by an employee in personnel that Shaeffer had called in that afternoon, to report that she was sick.

Armold testified that she was disciplined for failing to report to work on 2 consecutive days without calling in, which violates the company rule. The parties stipulated that for the period beginning January 1, to the date of the instant litigation, five employees of Respondent were disciplined or discharged for being absent from work without calling in.

Shaeffer testified that she was aware of the rule and knew of an employee, Paul Moxley, who was fired for not reporting in.

CONCLUSION AND ANALYSIS

Although Reichard's interrogation of Oberdick was arguably in the nature of a casual conversation, and the two are friends, in my opinion the two instances of interrogation are in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The fact that Reichard and Oberdick were friends does not provide an effective barrier interference and coercion inherent in the interrogation. Quemetco, Inc., a subsidiary of RSR Corporation, 223 NLRB 470 (1976). I also conclude that the interrogation of Reisinger,[13] by his supervisor, Lehr, was violative of the same reasons in this proceeding. Lehr did not testify in this proceeding.

Nash's question to Stambaugh was, in my opinion, of no consequence and not coercive. Nash immediately withdrew his inquiry and assured Stambaugh she did not have to answer. Moreover, it is clear from Stambaugh's testimony that she understood she did not have to respond and advised Nash of this. There was an incident in J. K. Electronics, Inc., d/b/a Wesco Electrical Company, 232 NLRB 479 (1977), which is distinguishable from the allegation in this case. The Administrative Law Judge, with Board approval, dismissed the allegation. I will similarly recommend that this allegation of interrogation be dismissed.

I find that McArthur's interrogation of Shaeffer, if it can be characterized as interrogation, is not violative of the Act. The conversation occurred in the context of a personal discussion about Shaeffer's baby and, generally, union benefits and wage rates across the country. McArthur was not even Shaeffer's supervisor, and did not work on the same shift. There was no reason to think that McArthur was trying to ascertain Shaeffer's sentiments, in view of the fact that she was openly active on behalf of the Union and was wearing a union button at the time. In my view this is not the kind of questioning that is threatening or coercive, and the circumstances of this conversation would not induce any fear of reprisal. I will recommend dismissal of this allegation.

In my opinion the character of the conversation between Supervisor Danfelt and Jones and Danfelt's assurance to Jones that nothing would happen to her as a result of the conversation render this allegation meritless. This type of interrogation does not interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees (Jones) in the exercise of Section 7 rights within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Moreover, I do not believe that this incident rises to the level of the interrogation alleged and found in Paceco, a Division of Fruehauf Corporation, 237 NLRB 399 (1978). Accordingly, I will recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

In my opinion the state of the evidence is such that it does not establish that Respondent prohibited Strayer from distributing union literature at its facility.

Respondent argues that Lehr acted ambiguously when he told Strayer to move to another location, because he, Lehr, did not know what Strayer was handing out. Although the evidence indicates Strayer did not reveal specifically what she was distributing, I think it reasonable to assume, under the circumstances, that Lehr was aware of what was being distributed.

Although Lehr did not testify, Strayer establishes in the record that, after her conversation with Lehr, she continued to hand out union literature to employees arriving at the plant entrance, and indeed was able to reach and communicate with more employees. All employees pass through the plant entrance where she was directed to stand. Furthermore, she continued to distribute handbills upon entering the plant before her shift started. Moreover, other witnesses testified that they freely distributed union literature in the plant and solicited employees without any interference by Respondent.

Respondent argues that I should interpret Lehr's action as a concern that distribution of material in the middle of a busy parking lot jeopardizes the safety of individuals arriving at the plant, as well as the safety of the individual engaged in the distribution. This is a valid argument, the only problem is, there is no probative evidence in the record to support this contention, inasmuch as Lehr did not testify.

In conclusion, the weight of the evidence convinces me that by moving Strayer to another location, where in fact she was able to reach more employees, Respondent did not in any way prohibit or interfere with her distribution of union literature. Accordingly, I will recommend dismissal of this allegation.

The Threat To Stall Negotiations

Reisinger was called as a witness to testify in support of this allegation. I completely reject Reisinger's version of what Graham stated at the meeting. He admitted that he did not remember what happened at the meeting, and on cross-examination qualified his testimony. He also admitted that his testimony was not accurate and contained omissions. On cross-examination, Reisinger added allegations that did not appear in his direct testimony or in his affidavit.[14] Furthermore, he admitted that he "skipped over" his affidavit rather than reading it.

I find Graham to be a completely credible and reliable witness, and I accept as truth his version of what he said at the meeting. Moreover, the propaganda disseminated by the Company in its leaflet supports Graham's version of what he articulated verbally at the meeting. Accordingly, I will recommend dismissal of this allegation.

Threat To Withhold Raises

Strayer's testimony, that what Trout told her was the same as that which was reflected in the leaflet she received, convinces me that there is no merit to this allegation. I believe that her testimony on cross-examination reveals specifically what Trout said. In my opinion, Trout told Strayer in effect that Respondent would not engage in an illegal act by paying a wage increase to get rid of the Union. Her testimony on direct examination was less than convincing. She testified that she did not know what Trout said and that she could not remember his exact words. She finally testified about the incident after leading questions were propounded to her. I discredit her testimony. In my opinion, her testimony on direct examination is worthless and, accordingly, I will recommend dismissal of this allegation.

The Transfer of Reisinger

Reisinger's credibility has been discussed supra. On the state of the evidence, counsel for the General Counsel has not sustained his burden of proof that the Company discriminated against Reisinger by transferring him to the warehouse.

I specifically discredit the comment he attributes to Lehr, regarding antiunion motivation for sending him to the warehouse, even though I earlier credited that part of his testimony relating to Lehr's earlier interrogation. Assuming, arguendo, that Lehr's statement to transfer Reisinger came on the heels of a comment that he was being transferred because he was "talking too much about the union," my conclusion would remain the same. I would still find that the transfer was based on business considerations.

It is true that Reisinger's assignment to the warehouse did not affect terms or conditions of his employment in an adverse manner, and that he enjoyed throwing the frisbee. It is also true that he told his supervisor he enjoyed working in the warehouse. These factors are not necessarily mitigating, if discrimination was the basis for the decision to transfer. What is dispositive is that the probative evidence supports the proposition that the transfer was based purely on a business decision. Thus, on cross-examination Reisinger changed his story and admitted that he had performed inventory work for 5 years in January and July. Moreover, at least some of this work was performed in the warehouse.

He also conceded that he was one of the few individuals who was qualified to perform the inventory duties, because of his long-term duration with Respondent, and the fact that he was able to identify most of the parts.

Reisinger also testified on cross-examination that, at the time of his conversation with Lehr, when he was told that he would be sent back to the warehouse to separate metal, he had not identified himself as a union organizer or supporter. Accordingly, I will recommend dismissal of this allegation.

The Transfer of Stambaugh

Stambaugh was moved approximately 6 to 8 feet away from where she had been working dropping sash. The evidence is consistent with the fact that she was not in any way isolated from her fellow employees; indeed, she had a partner wrapping windows with her. The record is devoid of any evidence that she was transferred in retaliation for her union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Her wages and conditions of employment were not adversely affected. She herself testified that she remained on the same line with the same supervisor and coworkers. She also testified that she did not like the job as well because it involved heavier work and less skill. Moreover, she was moved to the end of the production line and, according to her testimony, was not able to move around and talk to her coworkers as she had before while working. In my opinion, assuming arguendo, that she did not have the same exposure to her coworkers as before, this in and of itself does not establish a violation of the Act.

Furthermore, Stambaugh admitted that during her relatively short tenure with the Company she was transferred among several jobs prior to any of her union activities. There is no evidence to indicate that her transfer was motivated by union animus. Accordingly, I will recommend dismissal of this allegation.

The Reprimand of Shaeffer

Respondent does not dispute its knowledge of Shaeffer's union activities. Record testimony and documentary evidence reveal, in my opinion, that the basis for the reprimand was not because she failed to call in by

---

[14] It is questionable whether or not he ever read his affidavit.

3 p.m., but rather that she was absent from work for 2 consecutive days and Respondent was not apprised of these absences.

I believe the reference in the reprimand to reporting in by 3 p.m. when absent is merely an instruction for the future.

It is clear that the company rules require employees to apprise Respondent of their absences, and other employees have been disciplined for not adhering to this rule.

I credit the testimony of Supervisor Armold, that he reprimanded Shaeffer because she failed, on two consecutive occasions, to report in. Armold testified that the reference to the 3 p.m. reporting time was so that he could utilize help from other departments if necessary. Armold testified that Respondent had been advised, on July 27, that Shaeffer had called in that afternoon to report that she was sick. The evidence is clear that she was not disciplined for July 27.

It is also noted that neither Shaeffer's daughter nor husband was called to testify that they, in fact, notified Respondent of her absences. The inference I draw is that their testimony would be adverse to Shaeffer's case. Furthermore, several months after the election Shaeffer, a union observer, received a promotion which she had requested.[15]

The record evidence does not establish disparate treatment between Shaeffer and other employees. Accordingly, I will recommend dismissal of this allegation.

Respondent argues that the Union waived its right to file objections to the election, by virtue of the fact that they executed a request to proceed 4 days before the election. On this basis Respondent moved to dismiss the objections to the election. I agree with counsel for the General Counsel that the request to proceed is merely a device to permit the Board to conduct an election, despite the fact that there are unfair labor practice charges pending. The motion to dismiss is denied.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By coercive interrogation of its employees, Respondent has committed unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The allegations of the complaint that Respondent has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(3), and other 8(a)(1) violations of the Act, have not been supported by substantial evidence.

5. The allegations of the complaint which have been found to be meritorious are of an isolated nature, de minimis, and did not affect the results of the election.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Out of a unit of approximately 180 eligible voters, I have concluded that Respondent engaged in coercive interrogation in three instances involving 2 employees. I conclude that they were isolated and too minimal to warrant invalidating the election.[16] The tally of ballots reflects 68 votes cast for the Union and 93 against, with 7 challenges. Accordingly, I recommend that the objections be overruled and that an appropriate certification be issued.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I issue the following recommended:

ORDER[17]

The Respondent, Graham Architectural Products Corporation, York, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Coercively interrogating employees concerning their union membership and/or activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.[18]

2. Take the following affirmative action which will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Post at its premises at East Street and Penn Central Railroad, York, Pennsylvania, copies of the notice marked "Appendix."[19] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being duly signed by an authorized representative of Respondent, shall be posted immediately upon receipt thereof and maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Respondent shall take reasonable steps to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director for Region 4, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

IT IS ALSO ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

[15] She hedged somewhat in this regard but finally answered without equivocation that she was receiving a higher wage rate than previously.

[16] The dissemination of the interrogations was limited in nature, rather than pervasive.

[17] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[18] A broad injunctive order is not warranted in this case. Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

[19] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

International Printing and Graphic Communications Union, Local 391 and Salem Gravure Division of World Color Press, Inc. Case 14–CB–5423

January 25, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS JENKINS AND HUNTER

Upon a charge filed on June 29, 1981, by Salem Gravure Division of World Color Press, Inc., herein called the Charging Party, and duly served on International Printing and Graphic Communications Union, Local 391, herein called the Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 14, issued a complaint and notice of hearing on August 5, 1981,[1] against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge, complaint, and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act since on or about May 6 by disciplining Maintenance Foreman Edward Rinehart and Assistant Maintenance Foreman Billy Olden for acting in according with their supervisory duties.

On August 14, counsel for the General Counsel received a letter, dated August 13, from Respondent, discussing the allegations of the complaint and generally denying that it has engaged in certain unfair labor practices affecting commerce.[2] On August 21, counsel for the General Counsel mailed a certified letter to Respondent, explaining that its letter of August 13 was not sufficiently specific to meet the requirements of Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, which require that an answer specifically admit, deny, or explain each of the facts alleged in the complaint. Respondent was further advised that, unless an answer complying with the Board's Rules and Regulations was filed on or before noon, August 28, counsel for the General Counsel would take further action, up to and including a Motion for Summary Judgment. On August 28, counsel for the General Counsel received a letter, dated August 27, from Respondent, stating that the August 13 letter was a clear and sufficient answer. No further response from Respondent was received.

On September 10, counsel for the General Counsel filed with the Board a motion entitled "Motion for Summary Judgment on Complaint and Notice of Hearing for Failure to File an Adequate Answer." He asserts that Respondent failed and refused to file an adequate answer, and that no issue of fact exists warranting or requiring a hearing. He moves that the proceedings be transferred to the Board, that all allegations contained in the complaint and notice of hearing be deemed admitted true, and that an order be entered for an appropriate remedy for the violations alleged, without holding a hearing or without taking evidence in support thereof. Thereafter, on September 16, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted, stating that a response should be filed on or before September 30. Respondent did not file a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, provides as follows:

> The respondent shall, within 10 days from the service of the complaint, file an answer thereto. The respondent shall specifically admit, deny, or explain each of the facts alleged in the complaint, unless the respondent is without knowledge, in which case the respondent shall so state, such statement operating as a denial. All allegations in the complaint, if no answer is filed, or any allegation in the complaint not specifically denied or explained in an answer

[2] In the letter, Respondent stated:

> The charges filed by the Employer against the Union have quite a few mis-givings in them. The Union does not feel it has engaged in, and is engaging in, certain unfair labor practices affecting commerce.
> The Maintenance Foreman and Assistant Maintenance Foreman have always been members of the Union and I would hope they continue to be.
> The Maintenance Foreman and Assistant Maintenance Foreman direct the work force on their shift. I have never seen them at the bargaining table for collectivebargaining nor have I seen their names on grievances for adjustment of. I have seen the Department Manager performing these functions.
> The union members felt and still feel that the members in question did not meet their initiation pledge they gave in joining the Union.
> The Union did issue a verbal reprimand to brothers Edward Rinehart and Billy Olden as union members wronging a brother member, but not as supervisors representing the Company.

> filed, unless the respondent shall state in the answer that he is without knowledge, shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board, unless good cause to the contrary is shown.

The complaint and notice of hearing served on Respondent specifically stated that unless an answer is filed to the complaint within 10 days from the service thereof "all of the allegations of the complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and may be so found by the Board." As outlined above, and as set forth in the uncontroverted allegations of the Motion for Summary Judgment, Respondent replied to the complaint by a letter dated August 13, in which it generally denied that it had engaged in unfair labor practices. By a letter dated August 21, counsel for the General Counsel informed Respondent that its answer was not sufficiently specific to comply with the Board's Rules regarding valid answers. In addition, counsel for the General Counsel advised Respondent of the consequences of the failure to file an answer complying with the Board's Rules and Regulations. However, the only response received from Respondent was a letter dated August 27, stating that its letter of August 13 was a sufficient answer. Thereafter, on September 10, no adequate answer having been filed, counsel for the General Counsel filed the instant Motion for Summary Judgment.

Respondent's answer is improper under Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, because it does not specifically admit, deny, or explain each of the facts alleged in the complaint. Therefore, as Respondent has not filed an answer acceptable under the Board's Rules and Regulations within 10 days from service of the complaint, or within the extended time afforded it by the General Counsel, and as no good cause for its failure to do so has been shown, in accordance with the Rule set forth above, the allegations of the complaint are deemed to be admitted to be true and are so found to be true. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE CHARGING PARTY

The Charging Party, Salem Gravure Division of World Color Press, Inc., is an Illinois corporation engaged in the manufacture of, and the nonretail sale and distribution of, magazines and related products, at its principal office and place of business at Selmaville Road, Salem, Illinois. During the year ending July 31, a representative period, Salem Gravure Division of World Color Press, Inc., in the course and conduct of its business operations, manufactured, sold, and distributed at its Salem, Illinois, facility, products valued in excess of $50,000, of which products valued in excess of $50,000 were shipped from said facility directly to points located outside the State of Illinois.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that the Charging Party is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

International Printing and Graphic Communications Union, Local 391, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

At all times material herein, Edward Rinehart, maintenance foreman, and Billy Olden, assistant maintenance foreman, were selected for and occupied the above positions for the Charging Party, and have been supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and representatives of the Charging Party for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances. Furthermore, at all times material herein, Edward Rinehart and Billy Olden have held membership in Respondent.

Commencing on or about May 6, Respondent subjected these two men to investigation and, on or about June 6, to verbal reprimand for acting in accordance with their duties as supervisors and as representatives of the Charging Party for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

Accordingly, we find that by the conduct described in the above paragraph, Respondent did restrain and coerce and is restraining and coercing the Charging Party in the selection of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances, and thereby did engage in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with the operations of the Charging Party described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and that it take certain affirmative action, set forth below, which is designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act.

Specifically, we shall order that Respondent Union be required to send letters to Edward Rinehart and Billy Olden, stating that it will not subject them to investigation or verbal reprimand for acting in accordance with their duties as supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and as representatives of the Charging Party for purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Charging Party, Salem Gravure Division of World Color Press, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent International Printing and Graphic Communications Union, Local 391, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Edward Rinehart and Billy Olden are supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and representatives of the Charging Party for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

4. Edward Rinehart and Billy Olden have held and hold membership in Respondent.

5. By subjecting Edward Rinehard and Billy Olden to investigation and verbal reprimand for acting in accordance with their duties as supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, Respondent restrained and coerced the Charging Party in the selection of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances, and thereby violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, International Printing and Graphic Communications Union, Local 391, Effingham, Illinois, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Subjecting Edward Rinehart and Billy Olden to investigation and verbal reprimand for acting in accordance with their duties as supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and as representatives of Salem Gravure Division of World Color Press, Inc., for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing Salem Gravure Division of World Color Press, Inc., in the selection of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Send a written notice to Edward Rinehart and Billy Olden, stating that it will not subject them to investigation or verbal reprimand for acting in accordance with their duties as supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and as representatives of Salem Gravure Division of World Color Press, Inc., for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

(b) Post at its offices at Effingham, Illinois, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Sign and deliver sufficient copies of said notice to the Regional Director for Region 14 for posting by Salem Gravure Division of World Color Press, Inc., at its Salem, Illinois, facility where notices to its employees are customarily posted, if said Employer is willing to so post.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 14, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

[3] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

NO. 391

The Celotex Corporation and United Cement, Lime and Gypsum Workers International Union, AFL–CIO. Case 26–CA–8246

January 25, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On November 5, 1980, Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Linton issued the attached Decision in this proceeding and, on December 5, 1980, he issued an erratum to the Decision. Thereafter, the General Counsel and Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs,[1] and Respondent filed a brief in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, The Celotex Corporation, Texarkana, Arkansas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had the opportunity to present their evidence, the National Labor Relations Board has found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act and it has ordered us to post this notice and to comply with its provisions.

WE WILL NOT maintain any rule, such as General Rule of Conduct 10, prohibiting you from distributing or removing union literature in nonworking areas during nonworking time, and requiring our prior authorization to so distribute or remove union literature, on company premises, and WE WILL revoke Rule 10.

WE WILL NOT threaten you that we will go strictly by the book if you support United Cement, Lime and Gypsum Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT warn you, suspend you, or otherwise discriminate against you because you support United Cement, Lime and Gypsum Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT institute and implement a policy of stricter enforcement of work rules without first affording United Cement, Lime and Gypsum Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, the opportunity to bargain over such decision and the effects it would have upon you, and WE WILL revoke that policy which we adopted in early January 1980.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, coerce, or discriminate against you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL revoke the warnings we issued to William Norris and Wayne Ryan on January 16, 1980, and WE WILL physically expunge such warnings from their personnel files.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, Larry McCommas and William Norris for our suspending them on January 15, 1980, and June 25, 1980, respectively.

WE WILL revoke all warnings and suspensions which we imposed on you from January 3, 1980, to June 30, 1980, as a result of the policy we adopted, and will now revoke, about early January 1980, and WE WILL physically expunge all such documents from the personnel files of the affected employees, and WE WILL make whole, with interest, all employees suspended during the period of January 3, 1980, to June 30, 1980.

[1] The General Counsel also filed a letter with the Board requesting that his brief be amended concerning the proposed formula for the backpay remedy.

[2] The General Counsel has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

In adopting the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act by suspending William Norris for 3 days on June 25, 1980, we rely solely on the ground that, in assessing this discipline, Respondent relied on Norris' prior unlawful January 16, 1980, warning and that Respondent failed to demonstrate what discipline Norris would have received absent reliance on this unlawful warning. See Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

THE CELOTEX CORPORATION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. LINTON, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me at Texarkana, Texas,[1] on July 28 and 29, 1980, pursuant to a complaint issued on April 2, 1980, by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Regional Director for Region 26. The complaint is based on a charge filed on January 25, 1980, by United Cement, Lime and Gypsum Workers International Union, AFL-CIO (herein Union), against the Celotex Corporation, Texarkana plant (herein Respondent, Celotex, or Company).

An amended charge was filed by the Union on March 5, 1980, and the complaint was amended on April 30, 1980, and, over Respondent's objection, at the hearing.

In his complaint, as amended, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining an improper no-distribution rule and by threatening employees; Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by requiring a doctor's statement for illness absences to be excused, and warning and suspending employees; and Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by unilaterally instituting and pursuing a policy of stricter enforcement of its employee work rules.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following:

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent corporation maintains a facility at Texarkana, Arkansas, where it is engaged in manufacturing foam insulation. During the past year, Respondent sold and shipped goods valued in excess of $50,000 from its Texarkana plant directly to points located outside the State of Arkansas. Celotex admits, and I find, that it is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Chronology

As outlined by Plant Manager Robert Hawkins, Respondent's Texarkana facility began operations in the summer of 1978 with Frank Boone as the plant's manager. Hawkins testified that, although the plant's beginning production figures were satisfactory, its 1979 progress was not. According to Hawkins, Celotex made a dual transfer in order to solve problems at two plants. Thus, it transferred Boone to its Pennsauken, New Jersey, plant to straighten out problems there, and assigned Hawkins to replace Boone at Texarkana. Hawkins arrived at Texarkana on October 23, 1979. Upon his arrival, Hawkins met with his salaried staff and decided on a course of action needed to reduce the production reject rate and to increase overall efficiency. He testified that he initially devoted his attention to equipment/machinery problems and then, beginning in December 1979, to the "people" problems such as absenteeism and tardiness which were adversely impacting on production.

Although not precisely established in the record, it appears that Hawkins' October 23, 1979, arrival approximated the early stage of an organizing campaign by the Union among Respondent's production, maintenance, and warehouse employees. The Union filed its representation petition in Case 26-RC-6131 on November 16, 1979.[2] By his six-paragraph letter[3] dated November 20, 1979, Plant Manager Hawkins, in part, advised Respondent's employees as follows:

> Dear Fellow Employees:
> I am certain that you have by now learned that an outside third party is attempting to unionize all of our hourly employees. Because of these efforts, I will try to keep you informed as to the facts concerning their attempt to take control over your working life.
> My basic philosophy is pro-employee. I only hope that you will give me the chance to demonstrate that during the coming months and years, by turning away this outside third party.

The General Counsel does not allege the letter to be violative of the Act in any manner. Hawkins testified that he thereafter spoke to the employees, apparently along the same lines as his letter, only once about the Union.

The Union won the January 3, 1980, Board-conducted election,[4] and on February 27, 1980, following resolution of the Employer's objections, it was certified as the exclusive representative of the production, maintenance, and warehouse employees, including scrap disposal driver and leadmen, employed by Celotex at its Texarkana, Arkansas, facility.

[1] The transcript cover suggests that the hearing was held in "Texarkana, Arkansas-Texas." Although the Federal courthouse in Texarkana straddles the boundary between Texas and Arkansas, there is a courtroom on each side of the boundary. This hearing was conducted on the Texas side of the courthouse.

[2] Pursuant to my request, the General Counsel and Respondent supplied the case number and filing date to me by post-trial stipulation wires.

[4] The parties stipulated that the tally of ballots revealed a total of 52 eligible voters in the bargaining unit.

In its post-hearing brief, Respondent represents that on August 13, 1980, following 16 negotiating sessions, the first of which occurred on March 4, 1980, Celotex and the Union mutually agreed to a complete collective-bargaining agreement. The terms of the agreement reportedly were ratified on August 14, 1980.

B. Alleged 8(a)(1) Violations

1. No-distribution rule

It is undisputed that at all times material herein Respondent has maintained in effect rule 10 of the General Rules of Conduct set forth in the employees handbook (G.C. Exh. 2) which prohibits, under pain of possible discipline, the following conduct:

> 10. Distributing, posting, or removing any literature on Company property without management authorization.[5]

Violation of the rule subjects the offending employee to possible penalties ranging from a written warning to discharge.

As the rule is unlawfully broad upon its face, I find it to be violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in that it unlawfully restricts the exercise of employees' Section 7 rights to distribute union literature in nonworking areas during nonworking time. Westinghouse Electric Corporation, 240 NLRB 905 (1979). Moreover, the rule illegally requires management authorization to engage in protected distribution. AMC Air Conditioning Co., 232 NLRB 283, 284 (1977). Since "removing" could be construed as prohibiting an employee from taking union literature home with him, the rule again is illegally defective.

2. Steven G. Halterbaum's remarks

a. December 1, 1979, trim saw conversation

Formerly a production foreman, Steven G. Halterbaum replaced Howard Pittman as production superintendent when Pittman was discharged about August 1979. Halterbaum testified that Pittman was more lenient in the area of employee discipline than Halterbaum considered desirable. Complaint paragraph 8(a) alleges that about December 1, 1979, Halterbaum "threatened its employees with more onerous working conditions by telling them Respondent was going strictly by the book if the Union was voted in."

In support of this allegation, former employee Walter "Bud" Corley testified that about the first of December he and Halterbaum had a conversation alone at the trim saw. At the time, and through election date, Corley campaigned against the Union and wore a "vote no" sticker on his cap. Corley asked Halterbaum how things were going to be run after the election if the Union were voted in. Halterbaum replied that they would go "strictly by the book."

Conceding this conversation, Halterbaum testified he told Corley they would go by the book regardless of the election's outcome because of the way the plant was being handled at the time. He testimonially confirmed that Corley was against the Union at the time of the conversation and, indeed, that Corley was soliciting matters "to discuss with the people—the pros and cons of the union."

Under cross-examination, Halterbaum admitted that he had stated in his pretrial affidavit that he could not recall telling an employee that "if the union was voted in, we would go strictly by the book." Moreover, he further admitted that he was present during the testimony of Corley, that prior to hearing Corley's testimony he had no recollection of the matter, but that Corley's testimony so refreshed his recollection he could now recall the conversation and the duality of his response.[6]

I find Corley to be a credible witness, and I discredit Halterbaum. Accordingly, I find that on or about December 1, 1979, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged in complaint paragraph 8(a). Jamaica Towing, Inc., 236 NLRB 1700 (1978), enfd. in pertinent part 602 F.2d 1100 (2d Cir. 1979).

That there is no evidence Corley disseminated Halterbaum's threat and that Corley was opposed to the Union are immaterial considerations. As to the former, dissemination of a threat affecting all unit employees is presumed, and the burden was on Respondent to prove that the threat was not repeated to other employees. Coca-Cola Bottling Company of Bloomington, Indiana, Inc., 250 NLRB 1341 (1980). Respondent did not discharge its burden. Actually, dissemination is inherently probable in view of Halterbaum's admission that Corley was seeking information "to discuss with the people . . . ."

With respect to whether the threat could coerce a single individual opposed to the Union, the answer must be in the affirmative. Such a threat tends to inhibit an employee's freedom of choice to change his position. In any event, as an employee, Corley is statutorily entitled to be free from the erroneous information implicitly contained in the threat, to wit: that Respondent legally could penalize employees for electing the Union to be their collective-bargaining representative.

b. December 1, 1979, stretch wrap conversation

Complaint paragraph 8(b) alleges that, around December 1979, Halterbaum, by telling employees negotiations would start from nothing, unlawfully informed employees that it would be futile for them to select the Union as their bargaining representative.

Former employee Corley also credibly testified that about the same date of the trim saw conversation he, Production Superintendent Halterbaum, and employees Pam Jones, Mike Bell, and Wayne Ryan were present at the stretch wrap machine when a conversation occurred. On that occasion the Union was being discussed, and Corley said that the employees would lose all their benefits. Ryan responded that was incorrect. Corley then said Halterbaum had so informed him and thereupon asked him if that were true. Halterbaum stated that the employees "would start out with nothing."

[5] Rule 10 is the subject of complaint par. 7.

[6] Witness sequestration under Fed. R. Evid. 615 was not requested by either party.

Halterbaum testified that, when he walked up to the stretch wrap machine, opposing groups of employees were discussing the Union. He was asked what the employees would have if the Union came in, and he responded, "Everything is negotiable." He could not recall who made the inquiry, and he testified that Production Foreman Byron Brewer also was present. Briefly testifying on the point, Brewer corroborated Halterbaum.

Corley and Ryan testified in a credible manner. In contrast, I discredit Halterbaum and Brewer. Moreover, as will be noted below regarding a warning to alleged discriminatee William Norris, Brewer's testimony was contradicted by two employee witnesses currently employed by Respondent.

Accordingly, I find that on or about December 1, 1979, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged in complaint paragraph 8(b). Hospital Service Corporation d/b/a Blue Cross, 219 NLRB 1, 6–7 (1975).

C. Alleged 8(a)(3) Violations

1. The doctor's statement rule

Complaint paragraph 9 alleges that on or about January 15, 1980, Respondent "imposed stricter enforcement of its work rules on its employees by requiring them to present doctors' statements for absences" in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

General Counsel's Exhibit 3(a),[7] a memo dated December 17, 1979, from Halterbaum[8] to all employees on the subject of "Excused or Unexcused Absences," reads:

> All absences and tardies are unexcused except for those [which have] compelling, justifiable reasons.
> Absences due to illness will be excused only if the employee furnishes a Doctor's statement upon returning to work.

The General Counsel offered no positive evidence demonstrating that publication of the December 17 doctor's excuse rule was inspired by unlawful considerations. Instead, he argues, in essence, that I should disbelieve Plant Manager Hawkins' testimony on the subject. Hawkins testified that he instituted the rule in Texarkana based upon his prior managerial experience in industry plus the discovery in December 1979 that absenteeism had jumped to 7-1/2 percent from October's 4-1/2 percent rate.[9] Although not so articulated, the argument of the General Counsel impliedly includes the further request that, after disbelieving Hawkins' testimony, I infer from such disbelief an improper motive and affirmatively find that such motive was that which is proscribed by Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Under appropriate circumstances, an administrative law judge, as trier of fact, may indeed disbelieve the testimony of a witness and find the opposite to be true. N.L.R.B. v. Walton Manufacturing Company & Loganville Pants Co., 369 U.S. 404, 408 (1962). Conditions are not present here which would justify the affirmative finding the General Counsel seeks.[10] Accordingly, having found no unlawful motivation in the institution of the rule, I shall dismiss complaint paragraph 9.

2. January 15, 1980, suspension of Larry McCommas

Larry McCommas was employed by Respondent from August 1979 until he quit in January 1980 because he could not obtain a transfer from the second shift to the day shift. On January 15, 1980, McCommas was suspended for 3 days[11] for having been 3 hours tardy on January 11 and, according to the suspension document[12] and testimony, for prior absences. McCommas concedes that he had been spoken to and warned previously about his attendance problems. Indeed, he received an "oral" warning[13] on December 20, 1979, for absenteeism and tardiness. At that time, McCommas was advised that a future violation could result in "suspension up to layoff."

It is undisputed that, in December, McCommas informed Supervisor Rick Brackeen that he was going to vote for the Union in the upcoming election. Brackeen responded that he did not think there should be a union at the plant. The record does not reflect whether the McCommas-Brackeen conversation occurred before or after his December 20, 1980, warning. However, it appears that the plant was closed for the holidays the last week in December. This warning was the only documented one issued in December[14] or, with a single exception,[15] in January prior to the 15th of the month. Thus, it appears to be a logical and permissible inference that the McCommas-Brackeen conversation occurred prior to December 20, and that Respondent, with such knowledge, retaliated against McCommas with the warning for his announced intent to vote for the Union. Moreover, I note that McCommas' suspension, after the December 20 "oral" warning,[16] itself fails to comply with Plant Manager Hawkins' admitted December 1979 instructions to his staff to follow the progressive discipline system.

[9] The source of these percentages is not identified. Although Resp. Exhs. 2 and 3 reveal absentee-tardy rates of October, 3.48 percent; November, 6.3 percent; and December, 7.21 percent, Industrial Relations Supervisor Majorie Lou Ford testified that it was well into 1980 before she prepared these exhibits, at Hawkins' request, based on information contained on employee timecards. Ford further explained that, prior to January 1980, the timecards were only documents maintained which would disclose an employee's attendance record. In January, Ford began preparing daily attendance records for employees. As of the date of the hearing, however, no cumulative (or "morning") report was prepared which would advise management of the current day's attendance figures. On the other hand, Ford testified that, on one occasion in either November or December 1979, when absenteeism was particularly acute, Hawkins advised Ford that he was aware of the absenteeism problem.

[10] Were I to find otherwise, I would dispose of the time period variance between the alleged date of the rule and its actual December date as a matter fully litigated.

[14] When the absentee-tardy rate reached its highest 1979 percentage.

[15] The exception was the January 9, 1980, termination of an employee who had not reported to work for 2 consecutive days, G.C. Exh. 5(o).

Hawkins specified that this meant a written warning prior to suspension.

The January suspension document falsely states that McCommas gave no excuse for his tardiness. Halterbaum conceded that McCommas "probably" told his foreman that his January 11 tardiness was because of car trouble and that such excuse "probably" was reflected on the tardy slip submitted by the foreman. McCommas testified that he had been late because of car trouble. He denied that his tardiness had anything to do with watching a new color television set.[17]

Finally, it is to be noted that Halterbaum apparently had the warning already prepared before he spoke with McCommas, for he handed it to McCommas as the latter entered his office pursuant to summons. The entire matter leaves the distinct impression that Halterbaum pounced on the January 11 tardiness as a pretext in order to set McCommas up for more severe discrimination in the future.

In view of the foregoing, I find that the January 15, 1980, suspension was unlawfully motivated and I shall order the suspension document expunged from his personnel records and that he be made whole for the 3 days he was suspended. As there is no complaint allegation concerning the December 20, 1979, warning issued to former employee McCommas, I shall not order that it be expunged.

3. January 16, 1980, warning to Wayne Ryan

Employed since August 15, 1979, scrap disposal operator Wayne Ryan actively and visibly supported the Union during the preelection campaign. In addition to distributing authorization cards, Ryan prominently displayed a "vote yes" button on the front of his cap daily for several weeks.

Ryan received a "written" warning (G.C. Exh. 5(dd)) from Supervisor Byron Brewer for "misconduct" described as "Wayne did not report for work Wednesday, January 16, and did not call in to explain why he did not report."[18] In accordance with past practice at the plant, Ryan sent word by another employee, William Norris, to Supervisor Brewer that Ryan would have to be absent that day because his wife and child were sick. Brewer testimonially confirmed that Norris reported that Ryan would be absent, that such was in accordance with past practice, and that prior thereto there had been no rule requiring an employee personally to call in. Industrial Relations Supervisor Ford confirmed the absence of any such rule in the past. Indeed, she testified that she did not learn of the new rule until the Ryan warning. She testified that Respondent had devised the rule in January 1980, or possibly in December.

In its post-hearing brief, Respondent concedes that it should have publicized the new requirement,[19] but argues that the administrative requirement was motivated by a desire to curb "the rampant absenteeism problem" and not by unlawful considerations.

Actually, Respondent offered no evidence regarding its motive in instituting the new requirement. Supervisor Brewer testified that Halterbaum, on being told of Ryan's situation, simply told Brewer to "write him up." On cross-examination, Brewer admitted that as of the time of the warning there was no rule prohibiting employees sending a message of absence through a fellow employee. And in her testimony, Ford revealed that her discussion with management about the issue came after the warning. Thus, it is reasonable to infer, as I do, that the rule was instituted with the January 16, 1980, warning to Ryan and, as I find, in retaliation against him, as a prominent union supporter, for the employees voting in the Union.[20] Accordingly, I find that the warning violates Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, and I shall order that it be expunged from Ryan's personnel records.

4. January 16, 1980, warning to William Norris

William "Bill" Norris, a modi-glass operator, has been employed by Celotex since it commenced operations in July 1978. Among his other active union activities, Norris served as the Union's observer at the January 3, 1980, election. Following the election, Norris was selected by unit employees to serve as president of the Local Union.

In his modi-glass operator position, Norris operates a machine which inserts fiberglass into the insulation board manufactured by Respondent. Thermoboard, also produced by the Company, does not utilize fiberglass. On those occasions when the production line is running thermoboard, Norris had standing instructions to perform odd jobs and "look busy."

Norris credibly testified that, athough employees receive 15-minute breaks twice a shift, taking longer breaks was a common occurrence. Moreover, it appears that, when thermoboard was being run, Norris did not always "look busy," for he conceded that some employees had commented, but not complained, that he did not "do a lot." The record reflects, however, that prior to 1980 Norris had not received warnings for any of his conduct.

Norris concedes that on January 16, 1980, he took an extended break of a full 30 minutes. On that day thermoboard was being run and, prior to his break, Norris was cleaning up the glass area. Supervisor Byron Brewer came into the breakroom where Norris was talking with Walter Bud Corley. Brewer asked Norris if he were ready to return to work, that "we don't take 30-minute breaks around here." Norris denied that he had been there for 30 minutes, but Brewer said he had timed Norris. At that point, Norris returned to the work he had been doing. The next morning Brewer, after consulting with Halterbaum, issued a "written" warning[21] to [17] Halterbaum explained that the television set was part of McCommas' overall absenteeism problem as discussed by them on January 15, 1980.

[18] Complaint par. 11.

[19] Respondent denies in its brief that it is a new rule, and contends that it is merely "a matter concerned with the administration of one existing rule, G.C. Exh. 2, p. 19, item 11 [chronic absenteeism or tardiness]."

[20] Ford erroneously testified that Mike Bell received a prior warning for such an offense. In fact, Bell's warning, G.C. Exh. 5(cc), is dated 1-18-80 for an absence on 1-17-80.

Norris. In the document (G.C. Exh. 4) Brewer described the offense as:

> Bill took 30 minutes for break instead of the allowed 15 minutes. Bill has taken extended breaks repeatedly. This kind of conduct cannot be allowed.

On reading the warning, Norris told Brewer that the concluding portion advising that a future violation could result in discipline "up to and including dismissal" was ridiculous.

Brewer testified that, in the week to 2 weeks preceding January 16, Head Operator Everett Thompson, Assistant Operator John Daughtery, and Foil Operator Al Murphy had complained about Norris staying too long on breaks. They inquired whether they were going to get 30-minute breaks, too. Consequently, Brewer decided to time Norris on the occasion in issue. Brewer conceded that Thompson, Daughtery, and Murphy operate equipment different from Norris', that their machines run thermoboard, and that they must operate their machines even though Norris' machine might not be in operation.

Respondent called Daughtery and Murphy as witnesses, but Thompson was not called. Murphy, present during Brewer's testimony, flatly denied complaining about Norris. Daughtery, also present during Brewer's testimony, stated that he recalled no specific complaint, and testified that he complains "about everybody." The credible testimony of Daughtery and Murphy casts a pall of doubt over Brewer's explanation for the reason he issued the warning.

In addition to the suspicion raised by the testimony of Daughtery and Murphy, it seems clear that, had Brewer previously counseled Norris, he would have so stated in the January 16 "written" warning.[22]

On cross-examination Brewer admitted that he had never timed anyone else, and that he timed Norris only because of the many complaints he had received.[23] He also conceded that he did not issue a warning to Walter Corley[24] even though Corley was in the breakroom longer than Norris; he admitted such fact to Brewer, and requested that he likewise receive a warning. Brewer testified that he refused to issue a warning to Corley because he had not timed him and an employee could later retract such an admission.

On due consideration of the entire record, I find that Respondent, at the first opportunity following the January 3 election, discriminatorily and restrictively applied its breaktime rule against the Union's leading figure. Thus, I find that Respondent seized upon the January 16 extended break incident as a pretext to mask its true motive of discriminating against the bargaining unit in general, and Norris in particular, for their having selected the Union to represent them.

In light of the mid-January warnings to Norris and Ryan, and the 3-day suspension to McCommas, it is clear that Respondent had embarked upon a program of making good on the preelection threat Production Superintendent Halterbaum pronounced to Walter Corley—things would be run strictly by the book if the employees voted in the Union!

Accordingly, I shall order that Respondent expunge the unlawful January 16, 1980, warning which it issued to Norris.

5. June 25, 1980, suspension of William Norris

By hearing amendment granted over objection, the General Counsel added complaint paragraph 10(b) alleging that Respondent unlawfully suspended William Norris for 3 days on or about June 25, 1980.[25] In his post-hearing brief, the General Counsel pointedly states that he does not seek to litigate the propriety of the June 25 suspension, but merely by seeks a finding that "the discipline was based, at least in part,[26] on prior discriminatory discipline; i.e., the January 16 warning."[27]

The June 25 suspension notice (G.C. Exh. 5(ww)) issued to Norris was precipitated by Norris' failure to report for overtime work on Saturday, June 21, 1980.[28] The offense description reads:

> This employee, being aware of the condition of his personnel file, choose [sic] not to show up for work on 6/21/80. In looking into his file he has excessive abenteeism & tardiness.

Regarding the second sentence, Plant Manager Hawkins testified that the suspension was based on prior warnings contained in Norris' personnel file as well as insubordination.[29] The record reflects that Norris has received the following discipline:

Date	Event	Discipline
1/16/80	Extended break	Written warning[30]
4/10/80	Tardy & no call	Verbal warning

[22] Brewer apparently bypassed the counselings and "oral" warning called for in Plant Manager Hawkins' December instructions.

[23] None of the 1979 warnings, G.C. Exhs. 5(a), (f), (h), (i), (p), (q), (u), (y), (z), (ff), or (ggg), with the possible exception of 5(f) (employee left production line and went on break without permission), related to taking an extended break.

[26] This "mixed motive" concept brings into play the post-hearing decision of the Board in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

[27] As the General Counsel does not attack the June 25 suspension insofar as it pertains to the event triggering the suspension, I see no need to discuss that event, or the penalty, in detail.

[28] Norris and three, possibly four, other employees attended a rock concert in Dallas, Texas, on that date. There is some conflict in the record concerning whether in fact they had prior permission to miss work that Saturday so they could attend the concert.

[29] As noted later, the insubordination matter relates to the first sentence of the warning. Industrial Relations Supervisor Ford also testified that the suspension was based on Norris' prior warnings.

Date	Event	Discipline
5/8/80	Absent & no call	Written warning
6/14/80	Tardy & no call	Written warning
6/25/80	Absent 6/21	3-day suspension[31]

Discriminatee Wayne Ryan was one of the four employees who absented themselves from work on June 21 in order to attend the Dallas concert. He received a 1-day suspension, as did employee Gerald Rose, while the remaining two employees, according to Hawkins, received written warnings. Ryan's disciplinary record is as follows:

Date	Event	Discipline
1/16/80	Absent & no call	Written warning[32]
5/8/80	Absent & late call	Verbal warning
6/4/80	Absent	Written warning
6/14/80	Tardy & no call	Written warning
6/25/80	Frequent absenteeism and tardiness	1-day suspension[33]

Concert attendee Gerald Rose also was suspended 1 day on June 25 for "too frequent" absenteeism and tardiness (G.C. Exh. 5(nn)). His record contains two prior warnings: an apparent verbal warning for being absent March 10, 1980, (G.C. Exh. 5(pp)), and a June 4, 1980, written warning for being tardy and without calling in (G.C. Exh. 5(oo)).

Greg Harris' record[34] contains only a single prior disciplinary action, a August 27, 1979, written warning for failure to report to work when told he was needed. The identity of the possible fifth attendee does not appear in either the testimony or the exhibits.

It is clear that Respondent, in part, based its June 24 suspension of Norris upon the discriminatory warning of January 16. Prior to Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083, it would appear that the entire suspension would be unlawful and would have to be revoked. In Wright Line, the Board articulated the different burdens in dual motive (as distinguished from pretext) cases. Presumably, there was a dual motive here for the suspension.[35] the suspension.[35] Therefore, after the General Counsel established the illegal conduct as a motivating factor, Respondent had the burden of demonstrating that it would have reached the same decision absent the January 16 warning. Respondent did not directly carry that burden here. Although the presence of the "insubordination"[36] factor arguably could accomplish that requirement, I would find that it does not because it calls for too much speculation here in the absence of testimony. Nevertheless, I shall discuss the issue inasmuch as it includes an additional ground for resolving the suspension itself.

The insubordination matter is related to the first sentence of Norris' suspension notice where there is a reference to Norris being aware of the contents of his personnel file. Plant Manager Hawkins testified that employees are entitled to inspect their personnel files maintained by the Company. Norris and Ryan availed themselves of this benefit and, together, went to the personnel office to inspect their files on Friday, June 20, 1980. Hawkins testified that it was reported to him that Norris, on inspecting his file, which contained the original copies of his warnings, remarked that his record did not look too bad and he was going to go anyway (to the concert). Hawkins testified that he deemed this remark to be insubordination. At one point he seemed to testify that he considered the act of inspecting the file as part of the insubordination. However, as the insubordination tag, initially applied also to Ryan, was dropped as to Norris, and Ryan was suspended for only 1 day, as was Rose who apparently did not inspect his file, it appears that it was only Norris' comment which Hawkins in fact deemed insubordinate.

The General Counsel does not argue that Norris' remark was protected as being part of a concerted activity. Indeed, he contends that the suspension of Norris is vitiated only because the suspension relies, in part, on the illegal warning of January 16. But complaint paragraph 10(b) is a general allegation, not a limited one. Under these circumstances, an administrative law judge is not restricted to the legal theory advanced by the General Counsel where the evidence fairly supports an additional legal basis for a violation and, as here, the matter has been fully litigated. Victor Miceli and Sam Miceli d/b/a Riverside Produce Company, 242 NLRB 615 (1979).

Since Norris and Ryan were engaged in the joint activity of inspecting their personnel files, it is clear that such conduct was concerted. If the two had been discussing what the Union should seek in contract negotiations regarding discipline for absenteeism, and Norris had been overheard contending that three prior warnings for absenteeism should not be considered bad, and that an employee should be able to skip an overtime day, could Norris have been disciplined for such remark? Surely Respondent would not so argue. Conduct does not have to be wise, prudent, and judicious in order to be protected. N.L.R.B. v. Washington Aluminum Company, Inc., 370 U.S. 9 (1962). And different attitudes toward working conditions and rules are common in collective bargaining. Norris' remark may indeed have been unwise, and may have reflected a poor work attitude,[37] but it was a protected remark inasmuch as it flowed from lawful, concerted activity. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by relying on Norris' June 20, 1980, remark in assessing him a 3-day suspension.

[31] Complaint par. 10(b), but only to the extent the suspension is based on the January 16, 1980, warning.

[33] The General Counsel does not explain why he did not move to amend the complaint to attack Ryan's 1-day suspension as he did regarding Norris' 3-day suspension.

[34] The word "record" can be misleading since it is used here based on the exhibits received in evidence. Those exhibits, however, do not go into 1978. Harris has clock number 17, as G.C. Exh. 5(a) reflects; Norris, employed in July 1978, has clock number 13; and Ryan, hired in August 1979, has clock number 105. Rose had clock number 54. Presumably, therefore, Harris and, possibly, Rose were hired in 1978 and their personnel files conceivably could have contained one or more 1978 warnings.

[35] That is, the illegal January 16, 1980, warning having a significant impact on the suspension and the separate lawful motive of attempting to control absenteeism.

There is no testimony as to what discipline would have issued to Norris if the January 16 warning and his "insubordination" had been disregarded.[38] It could be argued that the record evidence indirectly demonstrates that it would have been a 1-day suspension. Thus, Gerald Rose, with two prior warnings, was suspended for 1-day. Ryan, even with his January 16 warning, plus three others, was given a 1-day suspension. Disregarding the January 16 warning, Norris, like Ryan, had three prior warnings. Consequently, it could be contended that Norris, except for the "insubordination," would have received a 1-day suspension.

This potential argument is unsound, however, for the reason that the record also reflects that, unlike Gerald Rose, employee Earnestine Price, clock number 24, received three warnings without any suspension. Thus:

9/13/79	Left plant—insubordination	Written warning
2/6/80	Extended Lunch break	Oral warning
5/31/80	Left plant without clocking out	Written warning

In light of the three warnings issued to Price, with the first involving insubordination, and no suspension, the Gerald Rose situation, in the absence of record testimony, cannot be the standard by which Norris is judged. This is so because it could well be that Rose was issued a 1-day suspension only to lend a stronger air of legitimacy to the discipline assessed union supporters Norris and Ryan.[39] In short, the situation is too entangled with discriminatory acts toward Norris and Ryan to be unraveled on the basis of the documentary exhibits.

As the record fails to reflect what penalty would have been assessed had the remark not been considered, I find that the 3-day suspension must be revoked. Respondent did not carry its Wright Line burden of establishing what the penalty would have been absent consideration of Norris' remark and the January 16 warning.

D. Alleged 8(a)(5) Violations

1. Complaint paragraph 16

As amended, this paragraph alleges "since on or about January 3, 1980, Respondent has unilaterally instituted and pursued a policy of stricter enforcement of its employees' work rules." Prior to the amendment, the allegation referred to the certification date, February 27, 1980, rather than to the January 3, 1980, election date. The stricter enforcement concept is alleged only as an 8(a)(5) violation and not also as an 8(a)(3) violation. In its amended answer and its post-hearing brief, Respondent denies that it had a duty to bargain with the Union prior to the February 27 certification date. Moreover, it further argues that there could be no violation prior to February 27 since the Union never requested bargaining prior to the certification.

Respondent's arguments are unavailing, for the duty to bargain, at least in the sense of a prohibition on unilateral changes, attaches as of the election date. Howard Plating Industries, Inc., 230 NLRB 178, 179 (1977); Mike O'Connor Chevrolet Buick-GMC Co., and Pat O'Connor Chevrolet-Buick-GMC Co., Inc., 209 NLRB 701 (1974), enforcement denied on different grounds 512 F.2d 684 (8th Cir. 1975).[40] As stated by the Board in Mike O'Connor Chevrolet at 703:

> The Board has long held that, absent compelling economic considerations for doing so, an employer acts at its peril in making changes in terms and conditions of employment during the period that objections to an election are pending and the final determination has not yet been made. And where the final determination on the objections results in the certification of a representative, the Board has held the employer to have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) for having made such unilateral changes.

There are no "compelling economic considerations" shown of record here. Indeed, although the General Counsel has not attacked Respondent's motive for so greatly accelerating the rate of post-election warnings, the evidence would appear to support an allegation of unlawful retaliation.

[37] It must be recalled, however, that there is conflict in the record concerning the matter of advance permission to be off work on Saturday, June 21, 1980. I have not deemed it necessary to resolve that matter.

[38] Respondent, at the hearing and in its brief, argues that the suspension should not be subject to litigation here since Respondent was considering discharging both Norris and Ryan and the suspensions were the result of negotiations with the Union. That theory is misapplied here, for our facts do not give rise to a litigation barring agreement sanctioned by cases such as Coca-Cola Bottling Company of Los Angeles, 243 NLRB 501 (1979). That is, there is no evidence Respondent reduced the discipline from a discharge to a suspension as the quid pro quo for an assurance from the Union and Norris that the matter would not be litigated in the future. As the hearing in the instant case already was scheduled by notice in the April 2, 1980, complaint, Respondent could well have anticipated that the suspension could become the subject of future litigation. Respondent could have guarded against that possibility by obtaining the kind of agreement approved by the Board in Coca-Cola, supra.

[40] Dobbs House, Inc., 181 NLRB 83 (1970), and Lawson-United Feldspar & Mineral Co., 189 NLRB 350, 362 (1971), relied on by Respondent in its post-hearing brief, do not call for a different result. Dobbs is not inconsistent with the above analysis, and the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion in Lawson-United, at 362, to the effect that the bargaining obligation regarding unilateral changes did not begin until the certification date, is not controlling. This is so because there the alleged unilateral changes occurred even prior to the election. Thus, the reference in that case was not set in the proper context.

2. The alleged unilateral changes

a. Postelection—precertification memos

The evidence regarding this subject is chiefly documentary and consists of various postelection memos (G.C. Exhs. 3(b)–3(i)) to employees covering, for example, the use of vending machines, clocking out, safety shoes, and shipping errors. One memo is dated June 10, 1980, and one exhibit is a duplicate. There is no record evidence that any of these memos is of a different nature from any of Respondent's other preelection rules. The General Counsel does not even bother to brief the matter of these documents. Accordingly, I find no violation in the issuance of these memos.

b. Postelection warnings accelerated

At the hearing, and in his post-hearing brief, the General Counsel has announced that he seeks rescission of most[41] postelection warnings because Respondent issued them on a highly increased frequency as the result of a new (as demonstrated by such increased frequency) postelection policy adopted and implemented without notice to and consultation with the Union. In his brief, the General Counsel argues that Electri-Flex Company, 228 NLRB 847 (1977), enfd. in pertinent part 570 F.2d 1327 (7th Cir. 1978), supports a finding here that Respondent's new policy violated [Section 8 (a)(5)] of the statute. For the reasons stated below, I agree.

As set forth above, Plant Manager Hawkins testified that it was not until December 1979 that he turned his attention to "people" problems. Hawkins testified unconvincingly on this score, and I do not credit him. Moreover, it is extremely unlikely that he would not be paying close attention to "people" matters with an election petition having been filed on November 16, 1979. Indeed, only 4 days later he issued a letter, described earlier herein, to employees in which he expressed very much concern about "people" matters. Hawkins also conceded that attendance has a direct impact on the production figures he was concerned with—machine downtime and production rejects. It therefore would be unlikely that he would not be considering the attendance factor along with the equipment and mechanical factors. Finally, I note that in the November-December 1979 period Celotex employed only about 50 production and maintenance employees. This is hardly so large a number as to indicate that consideration of their attendance problems required a time study independent of other problems.

In all of 1979, Respondent issued a total of 11 warnings[42] with approximately 50 percent being based upon absenteeism-tardiness. During the first 6 months of 1980, Respondent issued a total of 49 warnings with about the same ratio being for absenteeism-attendance. At that rate of acceleration, Respondent, as the General Counsel aptly observes in his brief, has increased its warning frequency by the astonishing figure of 1,000 percent. While an individual warning in isolation may appear lawful on its face, such a limited consideration does not overcome the strong prima facie case established by the General Counsel showing almost no warning activity by Respondent in December[43] followed by a flurry of postelection warnings, some found discriminatory herein, in January and thereafter. Finally, Production Superintendent Halterbaum's ringing threat to employee Corley is a prophesy fulfilled: If the Union is voted in, "we will go strictly by the book."

In light of the foregoing, and upon the entire record, I find that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, as alleged, by unilaterally instituting and pursuing a policy of stricter enforcement of its employees' work rules.[44]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining an overly broad no-distribution rule; by threatening employees with stricter enforcement of work rules if they voted in the Union; and by threatening employees with revocation of all their benefits prior to contract negotiations if they voted in the Union.

4. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by suspending employees Larry McCommas on January 15, 1980, and William Norris on June 25, 1980; and by issuing written warnings to employees William Norris and Wayne Byan on January 16, 1980.

5. All production, maintenance and warehouse employees, including scrap disposal driver and leadmen employed at the Employer's Texarkana, Arkansas, plant; but excluding all other employees, including office clerical employees, quality control technicians, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

6. At all times since February 27, 1980, the Union, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been, and is, the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described above.[45]

7. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to give prior notice to the Union, and [41] At the hearing, the General Counsel stated that rescission was not sought regarding the discharges, but only the warnings and suspensions. G.C. Exh. 6 tabulates the warnings into four groups: oral, written, suspension, and termination. Of the seven terminations, one is a duplicate (G.C. Exhs. 5(rr) and 5(fff)) and two occurred in 1979. Of the seven suspensions, two have been litigated (McCommas and Norris), and Ryan's of June 25, 1980, is one of the other five. One, G.C. Exh. 5(ss), was issued to Walter Corley, who later was terminated (G.C. Exhs. 5(rr) and 5(fff)).

[42] G.C. Exhs. 5(a), (f), (h), (i), (p), (q), (u), (y), (z), (ff), and (ggg). G.C. Exhs. 5(a)–5(ggg) are the warning, suspension, and termination documents issued by Respondent during 1979 through the first half of 1980.

[43] And that being the (unalleged as a discriminatory) warning issued to Larry McCommas on December 20, 1979 (G.C. Exh. 5 (ff)), discussed earlier herein.

[44] Athough there is no direct evidence that Respondent failed to notify and consult with the Union before it instituted and implemented its policy, the record evidence gives rise to an inference, which I draw, that it did not.

[45] For this paragraph, which refers to Respondent's plenary duty to bargain, the certification date, rather than the election date, is used. Howard Plating Industries, Inc., 230 NLRB 178.

the opportunity to bargain, over Respondent's decision to institute, and the implementation thereof, a new policy of stricter enforcement of its employees' work rules.

8. The above unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

9. The General Counsel has not established that Respondent has violated the Act except to the extent found above.

10. The General Counsel has not established that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by issuing its rule of December 17, 1979, requiring employees to present a doctor's statement in order to obtain an excused absence because of illness.

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in the unfair labor practices set forth above, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act, and to post signed and dated copies of an appropriate notice to employees.

I shall recommend an order requiring Respondent to rescind its General Conduct Rule 10 because of its unlawfully broad nature. Since I have found the warnings issued to William Norris and Wayne Ryan on January 16, 1980, were in retaliation for their union activities, I shall recommend that Respondent revoke such warnings and physically expunge them from the personnel records of these employees.

As I have found that Respondent unlawfully suspended Larry McCommas on January 15, 1980, for 3 days, and William Norris on June 25, 1980, for 3 days, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to make each whole for any loss of earnings or benefits he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him. Backpay shall be computed in the manner established by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[46] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Having found that Respondent failed to give notice to the Union of its decision to institute a new policy of stricter enforcement of its employees' work rules, and the opportunity to bargain concerning that decision and its implementation before such decision was implemented, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to restore the status quo ante and to revoke its policy; rescind all warnings and suspensions issued from January 3, 1980, to June 30, 1980; and physically expunge all such warning and suspension notices from the personnel files of the affected employees; and make whole all employees suspended in accordance with the formula set forth above regarding employees William Norris and Wayne Ryan.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[47]

The Respondent, The Celotex Corporation, Texarkana, Arkansas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Maintaining any rule prohibiting its employees from distributing or removing union literature in nonworking areas during nonworking time or requiring management authorization to so distribute or remove.

(b) Threatening its employees that it would go strictly by the book if they support the Union or any other labor organization.

(c) Threatening its employees with cancellation of benefits if they support the Union or any other labor organization.

(d) Warning, suspending, or otherwise discriminating against employees in any manner with respect to their tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment because they engage in activity on behalf of United Cement, Lime and Gypsum Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization.

(e) Unilaterally instituting and implementing any new policy regarding stricter enforcement of employees' work rules without first giving the Union notice and the opportunity to bargain over such decision and its proposed implementation.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, coercing, or discriminating against its employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, to form, join, or assist United Cement, Lime and Gypsum Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any or all such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action which will effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Rescind General Rule of Conduct 10 prohibiting its employees from distributing or removing union literature in nonworking areas during nonworking time and requiring management authorization to so distribute or remove.

(b) Revoke and rescind the written warnings issued to William Norris and Wayne Ryan on January 16, 1980, and the suspension notices to Larry McCommas and William Norris on January 15, 1980, and June 25, 1980, respectively, and physically expunge from their respective personnel files any record of such warnings and suspensions.

(c) Make whole Larry McCommas and William Norris in the manner set forth above in the remedy section for any loss of pay or other benefits they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them.

(d) Revoke and rescind all other warnings and suspensions issued to employees from January 3, 1980, to June

[47] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

30, 1980, physically expunge such records from the personnel files of affected employees and, in the manner set forth above in the remedy section of this recommended Order, make whole all employees who have been suspended.

(e) Revoke the policy adopted in early January 1980 of strictly enforcing employees' work rules.

(f) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(g) Post at its Texarkana, Arkansas, plant signed copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[48] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 26, after being duly signed by a representative of Respondent, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) Notify the Regional Director for Region 26, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps it has taken to comply therewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that paragraph 9 of the complaint be dismissed.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint, as amended, be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On July 28, 1981, Administrative Law Judge George Christensen issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record[1] and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions [3] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order as modified herein.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Channel Island Development Corp., d/b/a The Lobster Trap & Casa Sirena Marina Hotel, Oxnard, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order as so modified:

1. Insert the following as paragraph 2(d) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(d) Expunge from its files any reference to the discharges of Arnalfo Cortez, Ignatio Cortez, Jr., and Manuel Merino on May 17, 1979, and notify them, in writing, that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future discipline against them."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election in Case 31-RC-4493 be, and it hereby is, set aside, and that a new election shall be conducted in accordance with the Direction of Second Election set forth below.

[Direction of Second Election and Excelsior footnote omitted from publication.]

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT interrogate our employees concerning their and other employees' activities on behalf of, sympathy for, or their desires with respect to representation by Warehouse, Processing & Distribution Workers Union, Local 26, International Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union, or Culinary Alliance & Bartenders Union, Local 498, Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT maintain a surveillance of our employees' activities on behalf of either of the above or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT threaten to demote our employees because of their activities on behalf of

[1] Respondent's request for oral argument is hereby denied as the record and briefs adequately present the issues and positions of the parties.

[2] We find without merit Respondent's allegations of bias on the part of the Administrative Law Judge. There is no basis for finding that bias or partiality existed only because the Administrative Law Judge resolved important factual conflicts in favor of the General Counsel's witnesses. As the Supreme Court has stated "total rejection of an opposed view cannot of itself impugn the integrity or competence of a trier of fact." N.L.R.B. v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 337 U.S. 656, 659 (1949). Moreover, as it is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions as to credibility except where, as is not the case here, the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions were incorrect, we find, contrary to Respondent's contention, no basis for disturbing the Administrative Law Judge's credibility findings. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3rd Cir. 1951).

[3] In affirming the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) when executive housekeeper Palacio interrogated employees on or about April 23, 1979, we note that Palacio only admitted asking employees if they had heard anything about a union representative being at the hotel over the weekend. Employee witnesses credibly testified, however, that Palacio also inquired whether cards had been circulated and whether the employees had been asked to join a union. Although we find Palacio's admitted interrogation sufficient to establish a violation, we find the further interrogations established by credited testimony were likewise unlawful.

In adopting the Administrative Law Judge's recommendation to set aside the election, we do not rely on Palacio's unlawful interrogation of employee Cortez inasmuch as it occurred after the election, according to Cortez' credited testimony.

the above-named or any other labor organization.

We will not threaten our employees with discharge to discourage employees from seeking and securing representation by the above-named or any other labor organization.

We will not discharge our employees to discourage our employees from seeking and securing representation by the above-named or any other labor organization.

We will not condition the reinstatement of any employees discharged to discourage their and other employees' support of the above-named or any other labor organization or their abstention from that support.

We will not grant wage increases to discourage our employees from seeking and securing representation by the above-named or any other labor organization.

We will not promise improvements in wages and benefits if our employees will refrain from seeking and securing representation by the above-named or any other labor organization.

We will not threaten reductions in wages and benefits if our employees seek and secure representation by the above-named or any other labor organization.

We will not threaten our employees with the futility of seeking and securing representation by Local 498 by threatening not to sign any contract with that Union containing wage and benefit provisions unless that contract contains wage and benefit provisions lower than those we currently provide.

We will not solicit grievances from our employees and promise to resolve them to discourage their seeking and securing representation by the above-named or any other labor organization.

We will not otherwise interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act to form, join, or assist the above-named or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through the above-named or any other labor organization, to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any or all of those activities.

We will reinstate Arnulfo Cortez, Ignatio Cortez, Jr., and Manuel Merino to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, if necessary terminating any employees hired to replace them.

We will expunge from our files any reference to the discharges of Arnulfo Cortez, Ignatio Cortez, Jr., and Manuel Merino on May 17, 1979, and we will notify them that has been done and that evidence of the unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future discipline against them.

We will make those three employees whole for any wage and benefit losses they have suffered because we discharged them to discourage their and other employees' union support, with interest.

Channel Island Development Corp., d/b/a The Lobster Trap & Casa Sirena Marina Hotel

DECISION

Statement of the Case

George Christensen, Administrative Law Judge: These cases were heard before me on April 1, 2, 3, 4, 22, 23, and 24, and July 15 and 16, 1980, in Ventura, California, to resolve issues raised by a consolidated complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board based on a charge filed by Warehouse, Processing & Distribution Workers Union, Local 26, International Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union (Local 26), on June 4, 1979, in Case 31-CA-9050 and a charge filed by Culinary Alliance & Bartenders Union, Local 498, Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders' International, AFL-CIO (Local 498), in Case 31-CA-9272 on August 9, 1979, and amended on November 7, 1979,[1] against Channel Island Development Corp., d/b/a The Lobster Trap & Casa Sirena Marina Hotel (the Respondent). Local 498's objections that certain conduct of the Respondent alleged in its charges prevented a fair election in Case 31-RC-4493 are also before me for resolution.

The Respondent operates a hotel and a restaurant in Oxnard, California. Local 498 launched a campaign to organize the Respondent's hotel employees and Local 26 launched a campaign to organize the Respondent's restaurant employees in early and mid-1979. Local 498's campaign culminated in an election on July 12 which resulted in a tie vote and union objections to the Respondent's conduct allegedly affecting that outcome. The consolidated complaint and the election objections allege that the Respondent interfered with the hotel employees' exercise of a free choice in the election and attempted to discourage its hotel employees from supporting Local 498 in the election, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act), by:

1. Interrogating hotel employees about their and other employees' activities on behalf of Local 498.
2. Telling a hotel employee in the past that, when another union tried to organize the hotel's employees, the employees who supported that union were discharged.

---

[1] Read 1979 after all further date references omitting the year.

3. Telling a hotel employee eligible to vote in the election that she was not eligible to vote.

4. Threatening a hotel employee with the discharge of those hotel employees who initiated Local 498's campaign.

5. Informing a hotel employee that it was futile for the hotel employees to select Local 498 as their bargaining representative, since the Respondent would not sign a contract with it.

6. Threatening hotel employees with reductions in benefits and wages and loss of the Respondent's personal loan program if the hotel employees sought and secured union representation.

7. Promising hotel employees free uniforms, paid sick leave, premium pay for holidays, leaves of absence, wage increases, and a dental plan, if they desisted from seeking and securing union representatives.

8. Soliciting grievances from hotel employees and promising to remedy them.

9. Granting employees wage increases.

The consolidated complaint also alleges that the Respondent interfered with Local 26's organizational effort and violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging several employees to discourage those and other employees' support of Local 26 and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by conditioning recall of the discharged employees on their abandoning further support of Local 26 and by maintaining a surveillance of its restaurant employees' union activities.

The Respondent denies it committed the acts alleged, denies it violated the Act and interfered with the employees' exercise of a free choice in the election, and moves the complaint and petition be dismissed or (re the petition) the election objections be overruled and the election result certified.

The major issues for resolution are whether the Respondent committed the acts alleged and, if so, whether by such commission it violated the Act and interfered with the employees' free choice in the election.

The parties appeared by counsel at the hearing and were afforded full opportunity to adduce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue, and file briefs. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and by the Respondent.

Based upon my review of the entire record, observation of the witnesses, and perusal of the briefs, I enter the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that at all pertinent times the Respondent was an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce and Locals 498 and 26 were labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(2), (5), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES AND ELECTION MISCONDUCT

A. Background

At the time Locals 498 and 26 launched their organizational campaigns among the Respondent's hotel and restaurant employees, there were approximately 45 employees in the hotel unit Local 498 sought to represent[2] and 34 employees in the restaurant unit[3] Local 26 sought to represent. The two campaigns were conducted independently.

Between April 14 and 22 Carolyn Herrera, a hotel employee, solicited and secured the signatures of a majority of the employees in the hotel unit to cards authorizing Local 498 to represent them for collective-bargaining purposes. On April 23 Local 498 filed with the Regional Director a petition for certification (based on those cards) as the restaurant unit's exclusive collective-bargaining representative (Case 31-RC-4493).

On April 25 and May 2, Local 26's representative, Fritz Conle, conducted meetings at the home of Ignacio Cortez, Sr. (Cortez Sr.). Cortez Sr., was a restaurant employee, as were his sons Ignacio Cortez Jr. (Cortez Jr.), and Arnulfo Cortez (A. Cortez). The wife of Cortez Sr., and mother of Cortez Jr., and A. Cortez, Emilia Cortez (E. Cortez), who was employed as a maid in the hotel unit, also attended. Conle solicited and secured the signatures of Cortez Sr., Cortez Jr., A. Cortez, and other employees to cards authorizing Local 26 to represent them for collective-bargaining purposes. Conle also supplied the Cortezes (other than E. Cortez) with blank cards which they utilized in soliciting and securing the signatures of other restaurant employees for return to Conle.

Cortez Jr., A. Cortez, and a third cook were discharged in mid-May.

An election was conducted among the hotel unit employees on July 12; the result was a tie vote. Local 498 filed timely objections to the election.

The complaint and election objections allege that, between April 23 and July 12, the Respondent prevented a fair election and violated the Act by various acts and conduct specified above. The complaint further alleges that the Respondent discharged the three cooks in mid-May to discourage employee support of Local 26, conditioned their rehire on their abandonment of further support of Local 26, and maintained a surveillance of the restaurant employees' activities on behalf of Local 26, thereby violating the Act.

The alleged election interferences and violations shall be treated in chronological sequence below.

B. The Alleged April Hotel Employee Interrogations—Palacio

The complaint and objections allege that in April the Respondent's executive housekeeper, Frances Palacio,[4] interrogated hotel employees concerning their union activities, sympathies, and desires, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfering with the employees' free choice in the election.

[2] Maids, housemen, floor supervisors, hotel maintenance men, bellmen, and gardeners.

[3] Cooks, food preparers, kitchen helpers, and dishwashers.

[4] I find at all pertinent times Palacio was a supervisor and agent of the Respondent acting on its behalf.

Palacio, following her normal practice of not working weekends, did not work on Saturday and Sunday, April 21–22. Shortly after she came to work on Monday, April 23, several maids informed her that over the previous weekend a union tried to get into the hotel, a union representative was on the hotel premises, and Carol Cordin, one of the housekeeping supervisors, was behind the effort to bring the Union in.[5] Palacio immediately informed Stephen Erdos, the Respondent's general manager,[6] that several maids told her a union had been on the premises attempting to organize; Erdos asked her who initiated the union campaign; and she replied it was one of the floor supervisors, Carol Cordin.[7] When she later received information Herrera was involved in the organizational effort, Palacio relayed that information to Erdos.[8]

In any event, it is undisputed after receiving the initial reports of union activity at the hotel premises over the April 21–22 weekend Palacio made a tour of the hotel and engaged a number of the housekeeping department employees in conversation.

At one point in her testimony Palacio denied she discussed a union with any of the employees during her tour and denied any of the employees discussed a union with her; after confrontation with her pretrial affidavit, however, she changed her testimony and conceded, as stated in the affidavit, that during her tour she asked the employees she contacted what they had heard about a union and whether they were asked to join a union.[9]

Several hotel employees testified Palacio questioned them on April 23 concerning union activities. Maid E. Cortez testified, that, during the morning of April 23, Palacio approached her in the hotel room where she was working, and informed Cortez she knew someone was trying to bring a union in; that she heard a union representative was in the hotel during the weekend; that Erdos instructed her to find out if any of the employees were passing out cards at the hotel, and asked her if she knew who was passing out cards; that she replied she knew nothing about it; and that Palacio commented each maid she asked was giving her the same answer. Maid Barbara Mixon testified that Palacio approached her where she was working, stated she heard a union representative was coming around, and asked Mixon if she had seen or heard one; that she replied no; that Palacio then asked if cards were going around and whether she had signed one; and that she again replied no. A third employee, Herrera, testified that during the same week Palacio approached her, stated she had been told to ask all the housekeeping employees if they had seen or talked to a union representative, and asked Herrera if she had seen a union representative at the hotel talking to employees or passing out cards to them; and that she replied in the negative. A fourth employee, dispatcher Judy Dykes,[10] testified that Palacio asked her if she had seen a union representative at the hotel the weekend of April 21–22.

As noted above, while initially Palacio denied engaging in any discussions with any employees concerning a union on April 23, she changed that testimony when confronted with her pretrial affidavit and admitted she had. After that admission, Palacio conceded she discussed a union with E. Cortez, Cordin, Ruth Newton, Maria Gonzales, Priscilla Hanson, and Lupe Valle, but denied she engaged in any discussion of a union with Mixon, Herrera, and Dykes. Following her admission to conversations about a union with E. Cortez, Cordin, Newton, Gonzales, Hanson, and Valle, she verified the accuracy of the statement in her pretrial affidavit that she asked each of those six what they knew about the rumors that a union representative was on the premises over the weekend and whether they were asked to join a union.[11]

The contradictory and self-serving nature of Palacio's testimony is glaring and leaves little basis for crediting, other than those portions supported by her pretrial affidavit. By way of contrast, the testimony of E. Cortez, Mixon, Herrera, and Dykes was mutually corroborative, consistent, and given in a straightforward and convincing manner.

On the basis of the foregoing, I credit the testimony of E. Cortez, Mixon, Herrera, and Dykes and those portions of Palacio's testimony wherein she conceded the accuracy of her pretrial affidavit; i.e., where she admitted she asked employees Cordin, Newton, Gonzales, Hanson, and Valle what they knew about the rumors that a union representative had been on the hotel premises during the weekend and whether they were asked to join a union.

I therefore find that on April 23 the Respondent, by Palacio, interrogated hotel employees concerning their and other employees' union activities, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) and interfering with the employees' free choice in the election.

C. The Alleged April 23 Threat to a Hotel Employee—Palacio

The complaint and objections allege that, in or about late April or early May, Palacio told an employee that, when a union tried to get in before, employees associated with the union were fired, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfering with the employees' free choice in the election.

[5] Cordin is identified as "Corridon" in the transcript.

[6] I find at all pertinent times Erdos was a supervisor and agent of the Respondent acting on its behalf.

[7] While initially Palacio denied that she told Erdos one of the floor supervisors initiated the union campaign, she changed her testimony and admitted she advised Erdos it was Cordin when confronted with her pretrial affidavit so stating.

[8] At one point Palacio testified it was maid Connie Dziedic who informed her of Herrera's involvement a few days after she received the April 23 reports; at another point, she testified it was maid Priscilla Hanson who told told her of Herrera's involvement a few hours after she received the April 23 reports.

[9] The foregoing concession was made during cross-examination; on redirect, Palacio again changed her testimony, stating she only asked what they had heard about a union, denying she asked the employees if they were asked to join a union.

[10] The dispatcher assists the executive housekeeper in advising the housekeeping employees what assignments Palacio had given them, issuing linen, taking and making telephone calls as directed, preparing work schedules, preparing timesheets, etc.

[11] An admission she recanted on redirect, as noted earlier.

Dykes testified that, while she was in the linen room with Palacio on April 23, the telephone rang and she answered; that Erdos was on the line and asked for Palacio; that she gave the telephone to Palacio; that she heard Palacio state she did not believe it was her department and would find out who it was; and that, after completing the conversation with Erdos, Palacio stated to her that a union tried to get into the hotel before and employees who supported it were fired.

Palacio denied the remarks attributed to her by Dykes. Dykes was a straightforward witness and gave direct and convincing testimony; Palacio, on the contrary, as noted heretofore, repeatedly contradicted herself in a transparent effort to give testimony favorable to the Respondent.

I credit Dykes' testimony and find on April 23 the Respondent by Palacio violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfered with the employees' free choice in the election by telling an employee a union tried to get into the hotel before and employees who supported it were discharged.

D. The Alleged May Surveillance—Marzorati and DeHoyas

The complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by conducting a surveillance of its restaurant employees' union activities in May.

A. Cortez testified that, over the weekend of May 11, one of the Respondent's security guards known to him as Mario (Mario DeHoyas) visited the kitchen on several occasions and engaged him in conversation, that DeHoyas expressed interest in securing union representation and asked if the restaurant employees were interested, that he replied they already had a union, that DeHoyas stated the Teamsters were the best union, that he replied he and many other restaurant employees already signed cards with a different union, that DeHoyas asked its name, that he replied he was unable to supply its name, that DeHoyas asked him for one of the cards the restaurant employees signed, that he agreed to supply DeHoyas with a card, and that DeHoyas subsequently asked him for the card and he said he did not have one for him.[12] Cortez Sr. and Cortez Jr. testified that they also had conversations in the kitchen area with DeHoyas over the same weekend, and that during the course of those conversations during the course of those conversations DeHoyas professed interest in securing union representation, stated he favored the Teamsters or the Farm Workers unions, and drew from Cortez Sr. statements he already supported a different union (Local 26) and from Cortez Jr. an ambiguous response.

DeHoyas corroborated the testimony recited above to the extent he conceded he visited the kitchen, and spoke with members of the Cortez family there and one of them offered to secure a union authorization card for him on a date he could not recall. DeHoyas denied he solicited the views of any restaurant employees concerning union representation, and stated that one of the Cortez family solicited him to sign a card authorizing a union to represent him and offered to supply him with a card for his signature. DeHoyas "could not recall" whether Victor Marzorati, the Respondent's president,[13] assigned him to investigate union activity among the restaurant employees,[14] conceded there was a "possibility" he gave a report to Marzorati concerning information he secured concerning union activity among the restaurant employees, but that he "could not recall" whether or not he gave such a report.[15] DeHoyas did recall, however, that he reported to his immediate superior, Guard Captain Wayne Redfern, that a member of the Cortez family offered him a union authorization card.

Erdos, the Respondent's general manager, testified he received a telephone call from a waitress employed at the restaurant on a date he could not recall with certainty and the waitress informed him that Cortez Sr. announced he was going to conduct a union meeting at 10 a.m. the following day at the restaurant and immediately passed that information on to Marzorati.

Marzorati testified he contacted DeHoyas, and assigned him to check out the report, and DeHoyas reported a few days later that the alleged union meeting was not held. At one point in his testimony, Marzorati stated he made the assignment in early May; at another point, that it was in late May or early June. His pretrial affidavit places the date in early May.

Both Marzorati and Erdos learned of union activity among the hotel employees on April 23, when Local 498 filed its petition for certification as their exclusive collective-bargaining representative.[16] It reasonably may be presumed Marzorati and Erdos were vitally interested in learning whether and to what degree interest in union representation had spread to the Respondent's restaurant employees. While Marzorati testified on receiving Erdos' report of union activity among the restaurant employees, he assigned DeHoyas only to ascertain if a union meeting was scheduled to be conducted, and was indeed conducted on company premises on company time, I find that testimony suspect, particularly in view of DeHoyas' evasive testimony when questioned about the extent of his assignment and in view of his persistent questioning of the three members of the Cortez family.[17]

Whatever the limitations of DeHoyas' assignment, it is undisputable that Marzorati's agent, DeHoyas, asked questions and developed information concerning the restaurant employees' union activities at Marzorati's direction, and transmitted that information at least to his immediate superior, Redfern.[18]

[12] In the interim between promising DeHoyas a card and DeHoyas' request for it, A. Cortez had second thoughts about supplying a security guard with a card and decided not to furnish it.

[13] I find at all pertinent times Marzorati was a supervisor and agent of the Respondent acting on its behalf within the meaning of Sec. 2 of the Act.

[14] Marzorati testified he assigned DeHoyas to check out a report that Cortez Sr. had scheduled a union meeting at the restaurant.

[15] Marzorati testified DeHoyas reported no union meeting was held at the restaurant.

[16] As noted above, Palacio also informed Erdos that on April 23 she received reports from several maids that a union representative contacted them in an effort to secure their support over the preceding weekend.

[17] I credit the testimony of the three members of the Cortez family; DeHoyas' testimony was evasive and in stark contrast to the convincing nature of the testimony of the Cortez family, particularly A. Cortez.

There remains the date DeHoyas carried out his assignment. It is clear the three cooks, including A. Cortez and Cortez Jr. were discharged on May 17. It is clear, then, the DeHoyas-Cortez exchanges occurred prior to May 13, as they took place while A. Cortez and Cortez Jr. were at the restaurant, working. I find and conclude that they occurred on the dates the Cortezes testified to; i.e., the weekend of May 11-13, and that the assignment was given between May 7-11.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find and conclude that in early May the Respondent, by Marzorati and DeHoyas, conducted an inquiry into the extent and nature of union activity among the restaurant employees, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

E. The Alleged May Discriminatory Discharges and Reinstatement Offer—Marzorati, Erdos, and Sanchez

The complaint alleges that the Respondent discharged cooks A. Cortez, Cortez Jr. and Manuel Merino to discourage their and other employees' union support, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, and that the Respondent additionally violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by conditioning a reinstatement offer addressed to Cortez Jr. on refraining from engaging in any campaign to organize the restaurant employees.

The Respondent contends that it was unaware of any union activity among the restaurant employees prior to the discharges, that the three cooks were discharged for cause, and that the alleged reinstatement offer never was made.

I reject the first contention. The three members of the Cortez family employed at the restaurant (Cortez Sr., Cortez Jr., and A. Cortez) were prime actors in Local 26's effort to organize the Respondent's restaurant employees;[19] Erdos was informed of Cortez Sr.'s union activities in early May, immediately passed on that information to Marzorati, and Marzorati immediately passed that information on to the head chef at the restaurant, Jose Sanchez;[20] Marzorati assigned guard DeHoyas to investigate the reported union activity; and, between May 11-13, DeHoyas learned that members of the Cortez family and additional restaurant employees supported a union and made a report whose details he "could not recall" concerning his investigation to Marzorati and Redfern.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find sometime between May 3 and 10 the Respondent learned of a union organizational campaign among its restaurant employees and Cortez Sr.'s involvement therein; that it became aware by May 13 other restaurant employees supported union representation, including A. Cortez.

At the time the three cooks were discharged (on May 17), Cortez Sr. had been employed at the restaurant for approximately 11 years, specializing in the cutting and preparation of fish. His sons were hired in 1975; by May they progressed to positions as cooks. Merino began work as a cook in approximately November 1979.[21] Both sons received increases of 50 cents per hour in their May 5 paychecks (covering the payroll period April 16-30), pursuant to Sanchez' recommendation (based on their work) and with Marzorati's approval. Merino received a 25-cent increase about the same time.

Cortez' two sons and Merino worked on Sunday, May 13, were not scheduled for work between May 14-16, and were scheduled to return to work on May 17. During the day shift, prior to the time Cortez Jr., A. Cortez, and Merino were scheduled to report for work (they were scheduled for the shift covering the dinner and evening hours, 4 p.m. to midnight), Cortez Sr. was at work (he was scheduled to go off work at 4 p.m.). Sometime that morning Sanchez informed Cortez Sr. that he was going to reassign A. Cortez from his position as cook back to his previous position as food preparer. Cortez Sr. did not remonstrate with Sanchez over the demotion at that time but later, recalling Sanchez told him a short time previous that A. Cortez' work was good and that Sanchez had gotten a raise for him on that premise, he reminded Sanchez he secured a raise for A. Cortez just a short time previously and stated his work was fine and asked why, despite that, he was demoting A. Cortez. Sanchez replied plans had changed; he was not going to demote A. Cortez, he was going to fire all three of the Cortezes. Cortez Sr. asked why. Sanchez replied he did not know. Cortez Sr. shortly thereafter telephoned his home and informed his sons they and he had been fired.

On receiving the call, Cortez Jr. came to the restaurant and sought out Sanchez. He asked Sanchez why he, his brother, and his father had been fired. Sanchez replied that the Company was being reorganized and Marzorati told him everyone was to be fired, including Sanchez.

When Cortez Sr. completed his shift that day, Sanchez gave him final paychecks for his two sons and Merino. Noting there was no check made out to him, Cortez Sr. asked where his check was. Sanchez responded plans had changed, he was not going to be fired.

Later in the day the three discharged cooks (Cortez Jr., A. Cortez, and Merino) came to the restaurant and asked the restaurant manager, Craig Adford,[22] why they were fired. Adford replied he did not know and suggested they contact Marzorati. The three went to Marzorati's office and were informed by Marzorati's secretary he was out of town. They went back to the restaurant, contacted Sanchez, and repeated the question. This time Sanchez stated he did not know why they were fired and promised to try to get them reinstated.

[18] DeHoyas was vague concerning what report he made to Marzorati, failing to corroborate Marzorati's testimony he reported the allegedly scheduled union meeting was not held.

[19] Meetings for the purpose of persuading employees at the Respondent's restaurant to support Local 26 were held at the Cortezes home; all three Cortezes solicited other restaurant employees to support Local 26; two of the three solicited other restaurant employees to sign cards authorizing Local 26 to represent them, etc.

[20] I find that at all pertinent times Sanchez was a supervisor and agent of the Respondent acting on its behalf.

[21] Merino did not testify; counsel for the General Counsel stated he was in the military service stationed in the Philippine Islands at the time of the hearing.

[22] I find that at all pertinent times Adford was a supervisor and agent of the Respondent acting on its behalf.

A few hours later Sanchez telephoned Cortez Jr. at his home and told Cortez Jr.[23] he thought he could get the boys their jobs back, but they would have to promise not to bring in a union. Cortez Jr. gave the requested promise and was assured of reemployment.

The following day (May 18) Sanchez, in a conversation with Cortez Sr. referred to his conversation with Cortez Jr. the preceding evening, stating in essence the three caused their discharge by engaging in union activities, and for Cortez Sr. not to be ungrateful, since he was trying to get them reinstated. Later in the day, Sanchez assured Cortez Sr. that his sons would be rehired.

Cortez Jr. and A. Cortez went to the restaurant on May 18 and again saw Sanchez. Sanchez directed them to see Erdos, sending along a cook he recruited the previous evening as one of the replacements for the three discharged cooks, Reuben Ronquillo,[24] to act as a translator.[25] When the three arrived at Erdos' office, Ronquillo went into Erdos' office and the two Cortezes remained outside; when Ronquillo emerged, he told them (in Spanish) Erdos only wanted to hire one cook and it would look bad only to rehire one of them, so he would not rehire either of them.

On May 19 Sanchez told Ardissoni that Marzorati threatened to close down the restaurant if he did not fire the three cooks.[26]

I also find without merit the Respondent's contention that the three cooks were discharged for cause, i.e., for insubordinate conduct during their May 11 work shift following a period in which their work was of poor quality and quantity.

The Respondent contends the incident which triggered the May 17 discharge was an insubordinate remark uttered by Cortez Jr. during the May 11 evening work shift. Yet no valid evidence was produced that Cortez Jr. made the remark attributed to him;[27] four employees were threatened with discharge on May 17, including one noncook (Cortez Sr.), and three cooks were discharged for a remark attributed to only one of their number; Sanchez gave conflicting explanations for his threat and for the discharges and never told the three discharged cooks or Cortez Sr. the three were discharged for alleged insubordination and preceding poor work; and the discharges followed closely after the Respondent learned there was union activity among the restaurant employees and that Cortez Sr. and A. Cortez were active therein; and Sanchez in essence advised Cortez Jr. he could not secure reinstatement unless he, his brother, and Merino agreed to refrain from any support of a union.[28]

Contrary to the Respondent's contention, I find that on the basis of the evidence recited above the Respondent on May 17 threatened to demote A. Cortez and subsequently to discharge Cortez Sr., Cortez Jr., A. Cortez, and Merino to discourage union support among the restaurant employees; that the Respondent discharged Cortez Jr., A. Cortez, and Merino to discourage those activities; that the Respondent conditioned an offer to reinstate Cortez Jr. and A. Cortez, on their refraining from any effort to secure union representation; that by the threat and the conditional offer the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act; and that by the discharges the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

F. The Alleged May Interrogations—Palacio

The complaint and election objections allege that in May Palacio interrogated a hotel employee about her union activities, sympathies, and desires and later interrogated another hotel employee about her vote in the forthcoming election, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and inhibiting the employee's free choice in the election.

The Respondent denies that the alleged acts occurred.

Dykes testified that not long after her original (April 23) interrogation by Palacio,[29] while she, Palacio, and several maids were in the linen room, Palacio asked her what she thought about Local 498 and she replied the only union she knew anything about was the one her father belonged to, the Carpenters. Dykes also testified that not long thereafter (in May), again while she, Palacio, and several maids were in the linen room, including maid Ruth Newton, Palacio asked Newton how she was going to vote in the election and Newton replied that, if the Union were going to help the employees, she was for it and, if it were not going to help them, she was not.

Palacio testified that at some time Dykes mentioned to her that her father was in the Carpenters union, but denied the comment was made in response to her inquiry concerning Dykes' views about Local 498 and denied she asked Newton at any time how she was going to vote in the election.

For the reasons set out in section B, above, I credit Dykes' testimony and find that, in May, Palacio questioned Dykes about her union views, sympathies, and desires and during the same month asked Newton how she was going to vote, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and inhibiting employee free choice in the election.

[23] Cortez Jr. was senior and lead cook of the three and received a higher rate of pay.

[24] Ronquillo and another cook, Bruce Ardissoni, at that time were working part time for the restaurant; both were offered and accepted full-time employment as replacements for the discharged cooks on the day of the discharge, May 17. They were not approached at any time previous and offered the jobs in question.

[25] None of the Cortezes understand or speak much English.

[26] Ardissoni's testimony to that effect is undisputed and is credited. The other findings above are based on the testimony of Cortez Sr., Cortez Jr., and A. Cortez, which I credit, discrediting contrary testimony. The three Cortezes impressed me as honest, forthright, and sincere witnesses doing their best to give truthful answers to the questions propounded to them with some difficulty arising from their failure to understand what was asked of them.

[27] Adford testified that, after a waitress came to him complaining about the way food was coming out of the kitchen, he went to the kitchen and asked what was going on; that Cortez, Jr. made a comment in Spanish; that he asked Merino what Cortez Jr. said; and that Merino replied Cortez Jr. stated that, if he did not like what was going on, to replace the cooks; and that he replied, "OK" and left. Headwaitress Roberta Sayers testified that one of the waitresses complained to her about the way food was coming out of the kitchen and she referred the waitress to Adford; that Adford went into the kitchen and asked what was going on; that Cortez Jr. replied that, if Adford did not like what was going on, to replace the cooks, and that Adford replied, "OK" and left. Cortez Jr. testified Adford came to the kitchen with regard to a waitress' complaint and he showed Adford a ticket which showed the waitress, not the cooks, made a mistake in an order and denied he made the statement attributed to him; A. Cortez had no recollection of the incident. I do not credit Sayers' testimony (she exhibited a strong tendency to tailor her testimony) and, therefore, find no valid evidence established that Cortez Jr. made the statement attributed to him.

[29] See sec. B, above.

G. The Alleged May, June, and July Interrogations—Erdos

The complaint and election objections allege that, in May, June, and July, Erdos interrogated a hotel employee about her union activities, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and inhibiting employee free choice in the election.

Herrera testified that, about a month after she secured the signatures of a majority of the hotel employees within the unit Local 498 sought to represent (in late April), she was summoned to Erdos' office; Erdos informed her that he received reports she was involved in Local 498's campaign, asked her if the rumors were correct, and she denied any knowledge of the matter; and Erdos persisted, asking why the rumors were being circulated if they were not true and she repeated her denial. Herrera testified she again was summoned to Erdos' office a few weeks later; Erdos informed her he was continuing to receive reports she was involved in Local 498's campaign and she again denied their accuracy; Erdos again raised a question concerning why he was continuing to receive such reports if they were inaccurate, and she replied a maid she had directed not to come to work (at Palacio's instructions) threatened to make trouble for her; and Erdos replied he knew about that. Herrera testified to a third conversation with Erdos a few days before the July 12 election, while the two were in the parking lot, wherein Erdos asked her what the employees thought about the election and how they were going to vote, and she replied she did not know.

Erdos confirmed he summoned Herrera to his office on one occasion, but testified he told her he received reports she was distributing union literature to the hotel employees, asked her if the report were accurate and she denied its accuracy. Erdos denied he summoned and questioned her a second time about any union activity on her part and denied he at any time asked her what the employees thought about the election and how they were going to vote.

Taking either Herrera's or Erdos' version of the May conversation, it is clear Erdos summoned Herrera to his office and asked her if she were engaging in activities in support of Local 498, and I so find. I further find, that by such conduct the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and inhibited an employee's exercise of free choice in the election.

I also credit Herrera's testimony concerning the other two exchanges; she impressed me as an honest, sincere witness. I therefore find in June Erdos again interrogated Herrera concerning her union activities; in July interrogated Herrera concerning other employees' union views, sympathies, and desires; and the Respondent by those actions additionally violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfered with an employee's exercise of a free choice in the election.[30]

H. The Alleged Unlawful April–June Wage Increases

The complaint and election objections allege that between April and June the Respondent granted wage increases to its employees to discourage their union support, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfering with the hotel employees' making a free choice in the election.

The Respondent's payroll records reflect most of the housekeeping employees under Palacio actively employed in the Respondent's housekeeping department on April 30 received a wage increase in the paychecks they received in early May for the payroll period April 16–30, effective April 16, and the balance received increases in the third week in June for the payroll period June 1–15, effective June 1. Those records also reflect that a substantial number of restaurant employees under Sanchez in the kitchen crew received increases in the latter part of May for the payroll Period May 1–15, effective May 1, and in June.

[30] The Respondent contends that findings of unfair labor practice or election interference may not be predicated on the conduct of Palacio (see sec. B, above) and Erdos towards Herrera on the grounds that she was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act at the time the alleged acts occurred. The Respondent also contends that the representation case should be dismissed on the grounds the authorization cards which formed the basis for Local 498's petition for certification in the representation case were tainted by Herrera's solicitation thereof. I reject both contentions, finding at times pertinent that Herrera was not a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act. Between April and August, Herrera was classified as a floor supervisor, along with four other hotel employees. Their duties were to inspect the work of the maids in the hotel sections to which they were assigned, make sure they did their work properly, handle any guest complaints which arose in their sections (absence of items, malfunctions, recleaning, etc.). If dissatisfied with the performance of any maid or houseman in their sections, they reported the source of their dissatisfaction to Palacio and she took whatever action she deemed necessary. The floor supervisors and all other classifications recommended the hire of various persons from time to time; sometimes their recommendations were adopted, sometimes they were not. They could and did reassign maids within their sections from time to time to accomplish necessary cleaning in a timely fashion (Palacio made the initial assignments by floor and room). They did not process requests for time off (other than to pass on such requests to Palacio for decision) or layoff or recall employees, and they did not discharge them. (While Erdos testified that Herrera effectively recommended the discharge of an employee, his pretrial affidavit corroborates Herrera's testimony that on one occasion she reported to Erdos that one of the maids was drunk and, in accordance with Palacio's instructions, she sent her home—and Erdos and Palacio, after a later conference, decided to discharge that employee. Erdos' affidavit also contradicts his testimony and corroborates the testimony of Herrera and Palacio to the effect that Herrera and the other floor supervisors neither had nor exercised the power to hire, fire, discipline, layoff, recall, or grant time off to employees.) The floor supervisors did not promote employees and, on the one occasion when Palacio asked Herrera for a recommendation to fill a vacant floor supervisor position, Palacio rejected Herrera's recommendation. All the floor supervisors, including Herrera, were included in the eligible voter list prepared and submitted by the Respondent to the Regional Office for use at the election and they voted in the election without challenge. Herrera's workweek was Wednesday through Sunday; on Saturday and Sunday, she substituted for Palacio in the sense she checked to see if the maids reported as assigned on those 2 days and called in replacements for any no shows from a list Palacio prepared, plus extending her work checks beyond her section. I find these extra weekend duties insufficient to remove Herrera from the same employee status as the other floor supervisors. I therefore find at times pertinent Herrera and the other floor supervisors were not supervisors and agents of the Respondent acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

Marzorati testified that the Respondent adjusts wages with each increase in the Federal minimum wage,[31] bringing any employee below the minimum up to it; that the supervisors in charge of each department conduct biannual reviews of the job performance of each of the employees under their direction and, following such reviews, submit recommendations for his approval for wage increases for each employee whose work they found sufficiently satisfactory to warrant a wage increase; that each supervisor has discretionary power to decide which employees deserve increases and which do not, and he normally accepts their recommendations; that the supervisors also have discretionary power to recommend employees under their supervision for merit increases outside the regular review periods; and that the job performances of all new hires are reviewed by their supervisors on their completion of their 3-month probationary period and, if their work is satisfactory, normally the new hires are recommended for and receive increases.

A review of the wage histories of the Respondent's restaurant and hotel employees contained in the summaries of the Respondent's payroll records and testimony of the Respondent's own witnesses contradicts Marzorati's testimony; an examination of the summary of the Respondent's payroll records prepared by the Respondent's payroll clerk, Donna Downey, covering a period extending far before the time the Union's organizational campaign began, fails to show any pattern of biannual wage adjustments; both Sanchez and Downey testified that there was no such review policy in effect prior to the Union's organizational efforts; and Downey testified that Palacio's predecessor as executive housekeeper never conducted such reviews.[32] An examination of the payroll summaries further reveals that almost all of the increases received by employees in late June, effective June 1 for the payroll period June 1–15, were granted to maids and housemen hired between April 28 and May 25; i.e., prior to their having completed their alleged probationary periods and subsequent to the approval and grant of the increases received in early May. It is further evident that many of the employees who received the May and June increases also received increases effective January 1, 1979, to comply with the minimum wage law increase on that date.[33]

Findings have been entered that on April 23 Marzorati, Erdos, and Palacic became aware of Local 498's campaign to organize the Respondent's hotel employees and its possible extension to the restaurant employees, confirmed during the week of May 7–11 by a report to Erdos and transmitted to Marzorati and Sanchez; on the basis of those findings and the above findings concerning the timing and generality of the increases, plus the false explanation given therefor, I find, that as alleged, the Respondent granted wage increases to its employees between May 1 and June 30 to discourage their union support, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, and thereby also interfered with employee free choice in the July 12 election.

I. The Alleged July Threats, Promises, and Grievance Solicitations—Marzorati

The complaint and election objections allege that, at meetings conducted by Marzorati in July, Marzorati offered and promised to hotel employees paid sick leave, paid holidays, increased wages, a new dental plan, and free uniforms; threatened hotel employees with reduced health benefits, loss of a personal loan program, and the futility of supporting Local 498, since the Respondent would not sign a contract wich Local 498; and solicited and promised to resolve employee grievances, all for the purpose of discouraging the hotel employees from supporting Local 498, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and inhibiting an employee's exercise of a free choice in the election.

It is undisputed that Marzorati summoned Respondent's employees in the housekeeping department to two meetings, one in either late June or early July, and the other day before the July 12 election, and that Marzorati summoned the Respondent's floor supervisors to several meetings during the same period.

During the course of the general meetings, Marzorati produced and identified a document as the current contract between Local 498 and the Oxnard Hilton,[34] and maintained that:

1. The health benefits currently provided to the hotel employees by the Respondent were superior to those provided under the Hilton-Local 498 contract, detailing the alleged differences.

2. The Hilton-Local 498 contract provided for the payment of the Federal minimum wage, while the Respondent paid rates above that minimum and was establishing a committee to make a quarterly review and adjustment of wages.

3. The Hilton-Local 498 contract did not provide paid sick leave, and the Respondent was considering granting that benefit.

4. The Hilton-Local 498 contract did not provide premium pay for the holiday work, and the Respondent was considering granting that benefit.

5. The Hilton-Local 498 contract did not provide dental benefits and the Respondent was considering such a plan.

6. In the event the employees voted for representation by Local 498, they would receive the wages and benefits set out in the Hilton-Local 498 contract; they would have to pay union dues and would receive nothing in return; they would lose the benefit of the Respondent's personal loan policy, since it could not be continued without Local 498's agreement, Local 498 would not agree to its continuance, and Local 498 would not provide any loans; and, if Local 498 sought "unreasonable" wages and benefits in excess of those provided in the Hilton-Local 498 contract, the Respondent would not agree and the employees would have to go on strike,

[31] Most new employees were hired at the prevailing minimum wage; on January 1, 1979, the minimum wage was increased to $2.90 per hour.

[32] Palacio succeeded to that position in early 1979.

[33] With some compliance exceptions.

which they could not afford, while Local 498's officials would continue to ride around in big Cadillacs and draw big salaries.

7. In response to an inquiry concerning the accuracy of alleged statements by Palacio to the effect the maids were going to have to provide part of their work clothes, Marzorati stated that the Respondent would continue its policy of providing full uniforms, and would reimburse any maids for the cost of any portion of her work clothes she had to purchase; Marzorati closed by urging the employees to vote against union representation.[35]

At several July meetings limited to Marzorati and the floor supervisors, Marzorati informed the floor supervisors that he excluded Palacio from the meetings so they could speak freely; stated he suspected employee interest in union representation stemmed from problems he was unaware of; asked what problems were troubling the employees; listened to their recitation of problems over inadequate supplies, understaffing, overwork, nepotism and favoritism (Palacio's son and daughter worked in housekeeping), and Palacio's ignoring and failing to rectify employee complaints; and promised to take care of some of the problems expressed.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find that in July, by Marzorati, the Respondent by implication promised hotel employees new and improved wage adjustment practices (quarterly wage reviews); promised its employees potential improvements in benefits (paid sick leave, premium pay for holiday work, dental plan, and wage increases from the reviews) if they voted against union representation; threatened them with the loss or reduction of current wage rates and benefits (wages, health benefits, personal loans) and potential benefits (paid sick leave, premium pay for holiday work), if they voted for union representation; threatened them with the futility of voting for such representation (refusing to sign any contract containing wage rates and benefit provisions in excess of those allegedly contained in the Hilton-Local 498 contract); and solicited and promised to resolve their grievances, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfering with an employees' exercise of free choice in the election.

J. The Alleged July 11 Interrogation—Marzorati

The complaint and election objections allege that on July 11 Marzorati interrogated an employee concerning her union activities, sympathies, and desires, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfering with an employee's exercise of free choice in the election.

Mixon testified that after the July 11 meeting closed and as Marzorati and the maids were leaving the meeting room, she approached Marzorati, stated that she applied several times for the promotion to the position of floor supervisor, that she was promised a promotion, that others with less service time were promoted instead, that she thought that was unfair, that Marzorati replied that he would look into the matter, that Marzorati asked if she were for the Union, and that she replied no.

Marzorati corroborated Mixon's testimony concerning her approach and complaint, but stated that he replied that such promotions depended on Palacio's recommendations, that he would check with Palacio to see if she were willing to recommend Mixon for promotion, that he did not inquire into Mixon's views on union representation, and, as Mixon and he parted, he simply commented that he hoped his message came across and Mixon would support the Company at the election.

I credit Mixon's testimony; her testimony was candid and straightforward. Marzorati's testimony, as noted heretofore, was not credible in a number of instances.

I therefore find and conclude by Marzorati's July 11 interrogation of Mixon concerning whether or not she supported the Union, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and inhibited an employee's exercise of the voting franchise in the July 12 election.

K. The Alleged July 12 Interrogation—Palacio

The complaint and election objections allege that on July 12 Palacio interrogated an employee concerning her union activities, sympathies, and desires, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfering with the employee's exercise of free choice in the election.

E. Cortez testified that on the day of the election (July 12), prior to the election (it was held in the afternoon), Palacio asked her what she thought about the Union, she replied she did not know, and Palacio stated that the employees never would get union representation because Marzorati would not sign a union contract.

Palacio denied making the statements attributed to her by E. Cortez.

Findings have been entered above finding E. Cortez' testimony reliable and Palacio's unreliable; I find, in this instance as well, E. Cortez' testimony was forthright and convincing and is credited.

I therefore find that, by Palacio's July 12 interrogation of E. Cortez concerning her union sympathies and conveying the impression it was futile to support Local 498 in the election because Marzorati would not sign a contract with it, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfered with an employee's exercise of free choice in the election.[36]

L. The Alleged July 12 Instructions to Eligible Employees Not To Vote in the Election—Palacio

The complaint and election objections allege that on July 12 Palacio told an employee eligible to vote in the July 12 election she was not eligible to vote, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfering with an employee's exercise of the voting franchise in the election.

It is undisputed that on July 12 Palacio told maid Velia Vildosolo she was not eligible to vote in response to the latter's inquiry and that she instructed Dykes not to telephone maid Sharon Henderson and tell her to come in to vote, on the ground Henderson was ineligible to vote.[37] It is also undisputed that the payroll eligibility date for participation in the election was June 8 and both Vildosolo and Henderson were hired subsequent to June 8.

[35] These findings are based upon the mutually corroboratory testimony of Dykes, Herrera, and Mixon, which I credit, plus partial corroboration by Marzorati.

[36] Since the Respondent had ample opportunity to litigate the latter matter, I find it constitutes an additional violation.

I therefore find that Palacio advised Vildosolo she was ineligible to vote and instructed Dykes not to telephone Henderson to come in and vote under the correct impression that Vildosolo and Henderson were not eligible to vote and therefore the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and interfere with those two employees' election franchise.

M. The Alleged July 12 Threat—Palacio

The complaint and election objections allege that on July 12 Palacio threatened an employee with the discharge of those employees who supported Local 498 in the election campaign, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfering with an employee's free choice in the election.

I credit Dykes' testimony that on July 12 Palacio told Dykes the Company knew which employees started the Union and they would be fired when the Union lost the election; the threat is consistent with Palacio's earlier statement the Respondent fired supporters of a union after a previously unsuccessful organizing attempt at the hotel and Dykes was a convincing witness, while Palacio was not.

I therefore find that by Palacio's July 12 statement to Dykes the Respondent knew which employees started the Union and they would be fired when the election was over, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and interfered with employee exercise of a free choice in the election.

N. The Alleged March 28, 1980, Threat To Reduce Benefits and Wages If the Hotel Employees Sought and Secured Representation by Local 498—Daly

The complaint alleges that on March 28 Erdos and Labor Relations Consultant Terence Daly[38] threatened to reduce benefits and wages if the hotel employees sought and secured representation by Local 498, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Sometime in March Marzorati advised Daly the hotel employees were concerned over the forthcoming hearing on Local 498's unfair labor practice charges and election objections and assigned Daly to address the hotel employees to explain the purposes of the hearing and any subsequent events flowing from it which would affect them, and to answer any questions the employees wished to ask.

The meeting was scheduled for and held on March 30 with the hotel employees Local 498 sought to represent, Erdos and Daly, in attendance. After introducing Daly, Erdos left the meeting. Daly designated a bilingual employee to repeat his comments to the assembled employees in Spanish.

Daly informed the employees that a hearing had been scheduled to determine the merits of Local 498's charges and election objections and the end result might be a second election. He then asked for any questions. Instead of asking him questions concerning the hearing, the possible results thereof, etc., the employees asked questions about what levels of wages, benefits, etc., they might expect if Local 498 became their bargaining representative. Daly responded by displaying a document he identified as the current agreement between Local 498 and the Oxnard Hilton, and repeated many of the statements Marzorati uttered in his two meetings with the employees prior to the July 12 election; i.e., that the health and life insurance benefits set out in the contract were inferior to those currently provided for by the Respondent, that the contract provided payment of the minimum wage ($3.10) and the Respondent currently paid wage rates higher than the minimum wage, and that the employees would receive the level of wages and benefits set out in the contract in the event they secured representation by Local 498.[39]

I find that by the foregoing on March 28, 1980, Daly conveyed to the Respondent's hotel employees assembled at the meeting the impression their wages and health and life insurance benefits would be lowered to those allegedly set out in the Oxnard Hilton-Local 498 contract in the event they voted for representation by Local 498 in a second election, thereby discouraging their continued support of Local 498 and violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. At all material times the Respondent was an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce and Locals 26 and 498 were labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(2), (5), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. At times material Marzorati, Erdos, Palacio, Sanchez, Redfern, and Adford were supervisors and agents of the Respondent acting on its behalf and DeHoyas and Daly were agents of the Respondent acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

3. At times material the Respondent's floor supervisors, including Herrera, were not supervisors and/or agents of the Respondent acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

4. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by:

(a) Interrogating its employees concerning their and other employees' union activities, sympathies, and desires.

(b) Maintaining a surveillance of its employees' union activities.

[37] Henderson was off duty on the day of the election; Palacio instructed Dykes to telephone all the maids who were not scheduled to work that day (July 12) and remind them to come in and vote, making an exception in the case of Henderson.

[38] Daly was retained by the Respondent in early 1979 to assist the Respondent in conducting its campaign to counter Local 498's attempt to organize its hotel employees. I find at times pertinent Daly was an agent of the Respondent acting on its behalf within the meaning of Sec. 2 of the Act.

[39] These findings are based primarily on the testimony of E. Cortez and Herrera and partially by the testimony of Daly, which is credited to the extent it corroborates or amplifies the testimony of E. Cortez and Herrera.

(c) Threatening to demote an employee because of his union activities.

(d) Threatening employees with discharge to inhibit employees from seeking and securing union representation.

(e) Discharging employees to discourage them and other employees from seeking and securing union representation.

(f) Conditioning an offer to reinstate employees discharged to discourage employee union activity on their abstention from union support.

(g) Granting wage increases to discourage employees from seeking and securing union representation.

(h) Promising wage and benefit improvements if employees refrain from seeking union representation.

(i) Threatening wage and benefit reductions if employees secure union representation.

(j) Threatening employees with the futility of securing union representation, by threatening not to sign any contract unless it provided for wage rates and benefits lower than those currently enjoyed by those employees.

(k) Soliciting and promising to resolve employee grievances to discourage their seeking and securing union representation.

5. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging A. Cortez, Cortez Jr., and Merino to discourage them and other employees from seeking and securing union representation.

6. By 4(a), (b), (g), (h), (i), (j), and (k), above, the Respondent interfered with employee exercise of free choice in the July 12 election.

7. The Respondent did not otherwise violate the Act.

8. The above unfair labor practices and election interferences affected and affect interstate commerce within the meaning of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend it be directed to cease and desist therefrom and take affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act. Having found the Respondent discharged A. Cortez, Cortez Jr., and Merino to discourage employee efforts to secure union representation, I shall recommend the Respondent be directed to offer A. Cortez and Cortez, Jr. reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, if necessary terminating any employees hired to replace them, and to offer to Merino on his leaving military service reinstatement to his former position on timely application therefor under the terms of governing statutes, if necessary terminating any employee hired to replace him. I shall further recommend A. Cortez, Cortez Jr., and Merino be made whole for any losses in wages and benefits they have suffered by virtue of the discrimination against them, with the amount due to each of them calculated in the manner set out in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and interest thereon computed in accordance with the formula set out in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Having found by a substantial number of the unfair labor practices the Respondent interfered with the employees' exercise of a free vote in the July 12 election, I shall recommend that that election be set aside and a new election conducted when the Regional Director finds the effect of those unfair labor practices and election interferences have been dissipated.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I recommend the issuance of the following:

ORDER[40]

The Respondent, Channel Island Development Corp., d/b/a The Lobster Trap & Casa Sirena Marina Hotel, Oxnard, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist:

(a) Interrogating its employees concerning their and other employees' union activities, sympathies, and desires.

(b) Maintaining a surveillance of its employees' union activities.

(c) Threatening to demote employees because of their union activities.

(d) Threatening to discharge employees to inhibit employees from seeking and securing union representation.

(e) Discharging employees to discourage them and other employees from seeking and securing union representation.

(f) Conditioning an offer to reinstate employees discharged because of their union activities on their abstention from those activities.

(g) Granting wage increases to discourage employees from seeking and securing union representation.

(h) Promising wage and benefit improvements if employees refrain from securing union representation.

(i) Threatening wage and benefit reductions if employees secure union representation.

(j) Threatening employees with the futility of seeking union representation by threatening not to sign any contract with the Union unless it contains wage rates and benefits lower than those currently enjoyed by its employees.

(k) Soliciting and promising to resolve employee grievances to discourage their seeking and securing union representation.

(l) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Offer to A. Cortez and Cortez Jr. reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, if necessary terminating any employees hired to replace them.

[40] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Offer to Merino on his leaving military service reinstatement to his former position on timely application therefor under the terms of governing statutes, if necessary terminating any employee hired to replace him.

(c) Make whole A. Cortez, Cortez Jr., and Merino in the manner set out in "The Remedy" section of this Decision.

(d) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and any other records necessary to analyze and determine the amounts and benefits due under this Order.

(e) Post at its restaurant and hotel premises known as the Lobster Trap Restaurant & Casa Sirena Marina Hotel in Oxnard, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[41] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being duly signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director for Region 31, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

The election in Case 31–RC–4493 shall be, and is, set aside, and a new election shall be conducted under the auspices of the Regional Director for Region 31 when in his judgment the effect of the unfair labor practices and election interferences set out in this Decision have dissipated.

E. I. Du Pont de Nemours and Company and International Chemical Workers Union, Local 527, AFL–CIO. Cases 22–CA–9926 and 22–CA–10479

January 25, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On June 11, 1981, Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified herein, and hereby orders that the Respondent E. I. Du Pont de Nemours and Company, Parlin, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as modified herein.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a):

"(a) Rescind and expunge from the personnel file the written reprimand issued to Isaac Samuels on October 24, 1980."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

We will not change the holiday provisions of our contract with Local 527 International Chemical Workers Union, AFL–CIO, during the term of that contract by granting and scheduling an extra holiday, unless and until Local 527 has first given its approval.

We will not conduct investigatory interviews with any employee without the presence of a union steward where that employee reasonably believes that the interview would lead to discipline and has requested that a union steward be present.

We will not in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce any of our employees respecting their rights under Section 7 of the Act.

We will rescind and expunge the written reprimand issued to Isaac Samuels on October 24, 1980, because it was the result of an unlawful investigatory interview with him.

E. I. Du Pont de Nemours and Company

DECISION

Statement of the Case

James F. Morton, Administrative Law Judge: On April 24, 1980, International Chemical Workers Union, Local 527, AFL–CIO (herein called the Union), filed the charge in Case 22–CA–9926 alleging that E. I. Du Pont de Nemours and Company (herein called Respondent) has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (herein called the Act). On December 4, 1980, the Union filed the charge in Case 22–CA–10479 alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by having engaged in certain conduct, specified below, towards employee Isaac Samuels. On January 30, 1981, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued an order consolidating those cases, a complaint and notice of hearing. On February 10, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to that complaint. The hearing was held before me in Newark, New Jersey, on March 9, 1981.

The issues raised by the pleadings and as articulated at the hearing by respective counsel are:

1. Whether Respondent, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, established another holiday for employees represented by the Union during the term of the contract covering them without having obtained the Union's consent.

2. Whether Respondent, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, changed established grievance procedures by having refused the Union's request to use a telephone during a grievance meeting and by having refused the Union the opportunity for a recess at that meeting.

3. Whether Respondent, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, conducted an investigatory interview with employee Isaac Samuels on October 24, 1980, and thereafter disciplined him as a result of that interview, notwithstanding that that employee had requested to be represented by the Union at that interview and that he reasonably believed that the interview would result in disciplinary action.

Upon the entire record, including my observations of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and by Respondent, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The pleadings establish and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that the Union is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent makes photographic materials at its Parlin, New Jersey, plant. The Union represents a unit of "wage roll employees including all hourly paid production, maintenance, laboratory and clerical employees employed by (Respondent there) but excluding all salary employees, watchmen, guards, professional employees, and all supervisory employees." A contract covering that unit of employees had been in effect from September 26, 1978, to September 23, 1980; the current contract is effective from September 24, 1980, to September 24, 1982. The negotiations between the Respondent and the Union which led up to agreement on the terms of both the 1978–80 contract and the current 1980–82 contract bear on the question as to whether Respondent unlawfully put into effect a new paid holiday.

B. The Holiday Issue

1. The negotiations

In the course of the negotiations leading up to the 1978–80 contract, the Union had sought to increase the number of paid holidays from a total of 10 a year to a total of 12. Its efforts thereon were not successful. Art. VI, section 1 of the 1978–80 contract listed ten paid holidays. That agreement was signed on January 15, 1979.

On November 13, 1979, Respondent proposed increasing the number of paid holidays from 10 to 11. The Union asked why Respondent had not countered with an offer of one extra paid holiday to the Union's demand in 1978 for two such holidays. Respondent replied that an extra holiday was not "timely" in 1978 but that it was in late 1979, and that Respondent was offering an extra holiday in order to remain competitive in being able to attract a competent work force and to retain it. Instead of accepting Respondent's offer, the Union submitted a counterproposal, i.e.—that Respondent fund a drug prescription plan with the moneys it would have spent to pay the unit employees for the extra holiday. The Union's counterproposal was discussed at negotiating sessions on December 17, 1979, and January 21, 1980. On the latter day, Respondent advised that it rejected the counterproposal and stated that it was interested only in providing an extra holiday. It appears that, sometime before the next meeting was held on the holiday issue, as discussed below, Respondent notified its salaried employees (who are excluded from the unit represented by the Union) that they would receive an extra holiday, in addition to the 10 they then received.

On January 24, 1980, the Union's representatives, at another negotiating session, advised Respondent that the Union considered it unfair for Respondent to have notified its salaried employees that they would receive an extra holiday when no agreement thereon was reached by Respondent and the Union. The Union also advised Respondent that, while the unit employees preferred a drug prescription plan, the Union was prepared to go along with the extra holiday. The Union offered Respondent four alternate days on which it was prepared to reach agreement. These days, listed in the order of the Union's stated preference, were: (1) the date on which an employee celebrates his or her birthday, (2) the day after Christmas, (3) the day before New Year's Day, or (4) Veteran's Day.

On February 4, 1980, Respondent advised the Union that it rejected the four alternatives offered by the Union. Its representative explained that granting an extra holiday on an employee's birthday could be too difficult to administer, that there would be too many holidays in the yearend period if the extra holiday were scheduled for the day after Christmas or the day before New Year's Day and that not many of the salaried employees favored Veteran's Day as the day for the extra holiday. Respondent advised that most of the salaried employees favored scheduling the extra holiday on the Friday before Labor Day. At another negotiating session on February 18, 1980, the Union advised that it was not interested in having the extra holiday on the Friday before Labor Day. On February 27, 1980, the Union offered to accept that day provided that Respondent would agree that in 1981 and each year thereafter, the extra holiday would be a "floating" holiday, i.e.—one that would be mutually determined by the Union and Respondent in each of those years. Respondent stated then that it was not interested in a floating holiday.

On March 17, 1980, the Union offered another counterproposal respecting the day on which the extra holiday would be held. It offered to hold the holiday on the last Friday in July or the first Friday in August and stated that either of those days would "break up the summer." Respondent rejected that proposal and advised them that there was no point in discussing alternate days as Respondent, based on "administrative necessity," was going to hold the extra holiday on the Friday before Labor Day. The union representatives caucused and then told Respondent's representatives that the Union refused to accept that day as the date for the 11th holiday.

On March 18, 1980, Respondent distributed a four-page circular to its employees at its Parlin plant, which reported on safety awards, organization changes, new employees, and other matters. One of those other matters concerned the extra holiday issue and was reported as follows:

> At the March 17th—Union/Management Meeting the following items were discussed.
> 11th Holiday
> The Friday before Labor Day has been established as the date to celebrate the eleventh Holiday.
> The Holiday was originally offered in mid-November 1979. Since that time we have met with the Union frequently and considered a variety of dates suggested. It was a topic again at the Union/Management Meeting on 3/17/80, and the Union is still in disagreement, however, we pointed out we are already three months into 1980 and need to get plans for the Holiday started. Efficient business scheduling and general employee appeal were considered in selecting the day.
> Two additional requests were made by the Union at the meeting (3/17/80), which were the first Friday in August or the last Friday in July. These choices were rejected as not having appeal different than those already discussed.
> The Holiday will be celebrated each year on the Friday before Labor Day.

In July 1980, negotiations began with respect to the terms and conditions of a contract to succeed the 1978-80 contract, then scheduled to expire on September 23, 1980. At the outset of those contract renewal negotiations, Respondent listed the extra holiday among the "housekeeping" items to be cleared up before discussions on the terms of a renewal contract got underway. Housekeeping items are those matters on which agreement had been reached between the parties in the period between the execution of the 1978-80 contract and the start of the negotiations for a renewal contract. The Union objected to the inclusion of the extra holiday as a "housekeeping" item and it was removed from that category. Thereafter, Respondent's representative endeavored, on about four occasions, to discuss the matter of the extra holiday with the Union but was advised that the matter was out of the Union's hands—a reference apparently to the notice Respondent issued to employees on March 18, 1980, that the extra holiday will be celebrated each year on the Friday before Labor Day. The current contract, 1980-82, lists 11 paid holidays—one of them is the Friday before Labor Day. That contract was signed on February 2, 1981.

On August 29, 1980, the Parlin plant was closed down. All employees—wage roll and salaried employees—received it as a paid holiday.

2. Analysis

The undisputed evidence is that the 1978-80 contract contained ten specific holiday dates; that the Union had been unsuccessful during the negotiations leading up to that contract to persuade Respondent to increase that number to 12; that during the term of the 1978-80 contract the Union implicitly agreed to add a holiday to the total of ten contained in that contract; that the Union never agreed during the term of that contract as to the day when the holiday would be held and had vainly offered alternate proposals; that Respondent advised all its employees at Parlin on March 18, 1980, that the extra holiday would be held on August 29, 1980, and on the Friday before Labor in each year thereafter; that the Union notified Respondent that it refused to accept that day as the date for the 11th holiday; that the Union objected to Respondent's attempt to include the Friday after Labor Day date as an agreed on holiday under "housekeeping items" in the renewal contract negotiations; that Respondent then withdrew that holiday date as an item on which agreement had been reached; that August 29, 1980, was a paid holiday for all employees; and that the Friday after Labor Day is among the holidays in the current contract.

It is the General Counsel's contention that the foregoing facts establish that Respondent, on March 18, 1980, unilaterally added the day after Labor Day as a holiday to those listed in the contract in effect as of that date. Respondent asserts that it did not make a unilateral change in the holiday provisions of that contract as (a) the Union had agreed to add an 11th holiday to that contract, (b) the Union is estopped from asserting that it had not agreed also that that holiday would be celebrated on the day after Labor Day, and (c) the holiday became effective after the Union had reopened the contract and such a modification was permissible under the provisions of Section 8(d) of the Act.

Section 8(d) of the Act and clear case law prohibit unilateral midterm contract modifications.[1] The undisputed facts establish that, while the parties had agreed that there would be an extra holiday, there was no agreement during the contract term as to when the holiday would be held. In view of this and as the then existing contract specified not only the agreed on holidays but the dates on which they would be celebrated,[2] it is axiomatic that Respondent's implementation of the August 29 date for the extra holiday violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.[3] Respondent's estoppel argument is premised on its view that the Union did not "formally object"[4] to the implementation of the 11th holiday but instead allowed its members to celebrate it. The General Counsel has observed in his brief that Respondent's tactics were designed to undermine the support given the Union by the employees in the unit it represents. It seems to me that Respondent did place the Union in a quandary. On the one hand, the Union could not have insisted that Respondent withdraw its plan to give gratuitously all employees an extra day off with pay, unless the Union was ready to risk being ousted by the employees as their representative. On the other hand, the Union could not assent to Respondent's plan after Respondent had rejected all of the Union's prior proposals, unless the Union was ready to concede that there is no way an employer can be stopped from unilaterally putting a benefit into effect during a contract term. The way out of this quandary, it seems to me, is the one followed by the Union—to voice dissent and seek relief under the Act to bar a repetition of such conduct.

[4] I infer that Respondent would require the Union to have served it with a written request not to implement the 11th holiday to be a method whereby the Union could be said to have "formally" objected to the change; in its brief Respondent indicates that a formal grievance would have been another suitable method of the Union's voicing its objection. Also in its brief Respondent alludes to a colloquy between myself and the Union's vice president respecting whether the Union notified Respondent that it did not want the holiday to be put into effect. Of greater significance is the uncontroverted evidence that Respondent withdrew the scheduling of the 11th holiday from the list of "housekeeping" items when the parties were clearing the bargaining table at the outset of the renewal contract discussions. In effect Respondent thereby conceded that agreement had not been reached.

Respondent separately urges that it was lawful for it to close its Parlin plant on August 29, 1980, as a holiday as such a "modification" is permissible under Section 8(d) once the Union, as it did, reopened the 1978–80 contract for renewal negotiations. Respondent acknowledges in its brief that it offers this view as its construction of Section 8(d) and that it can find no case law to support that view. The cases cited at footnotes 1 and 3, supra, seem to be dispositive of the merits of that view as the principle enunciated in those cases encompasses the argument submitted by Respondent. Further, were merit to be found in Respondent's contention as to its interpretation of Section 8(d), the language of that section would encourage unilateral modification during the insulated period of an expiring contract. Such a construction would promote industrial strife, hardly the aim of Section 8(d). Finally, I find merit in the argument expressed by the General Counsel in its brief. There, he notes that, in any event, the modification occurred on March 18, 1980, a date well before the Union served the notices to negotiate a renewal contract.

C. Alleged Refusal To Permit Union To Use Telephone or To Caucus as Unilateral Changes in Procedures Governing Grievance Meetings

The General Counsel asserts that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by having unilaterally changed grievance meeting procedures on April 23, 1980, when it refused to permit union representatives to use a telephone in order to make an inquiry to obtain information related to a grievance under discussion then. Respondent contends that the Union's request was in connection with an issue not relevant to that grievance. Respondent's view is that enough time had been spent discussing the merits of the grievance itself and that it did not desire to waste time by engaging in collateral discussion. The essential facts do not appear to be in dispute.

On April 23, 1980, the parties were involved in a third-step grievance meeting pertaining to whether: (1) Respondent had a contractual right to combine two crews into one, (2) the employees affected by the change were accorded their contractual rights, and (3) certain employees whose duties had changed should continue to receive the higher of a two-tier wage rate. In discussing the third aspect of that grievance, the following matters surfaced. Prior to the integration of the crews, certain operators had performed higher rated work and received a corresponding wage rate; lesser skilled operators earned less. When the crews were combined, the skilled operators were required at times to perform less skilled work. Respondent took the position at the April 23, 1980, session that the skilled operators would receive the higher rate only when performing the more skilled functions; the Union contended that those skilled operators should get the higher rate at all times, even when they were assigned to less skilled work. After the parties discussed the matter for some time, the Union's president asked in essence whether an employee who substituted for an operator receiving the higher rate would receive that higher rate even when performing work normally paid at the lower rate and he observed that, several years previously, in a similar case, Respondent had agreed that the substitute employee should get the higher rate. Respondent's representative at this April 23, 1980, meeting acknowledged that that same principle should apply when the substitute is doing the more skilled work but he continued to assert that a two-tier wage rate would be followed with operators to be paid the higher rate when doing skilled work and the lower rate for the less skilled work. At that point, the Union's president sought to use the telephone. When asked by Respondent why he wanted to use the telephone, the Union's president advised that it was necessary to do so but refused to specify a reason other than state that it sought information to confirm the resolution of the earlier grievance similar to the one under discussion. Respondent's representative refused to permit him to do so. It appears that the parties had been discussing the grievance for about an hour as of that point. The Union's witnesses testified that they intended to call Respondent's superintendent of labor relations to review the grievance he settled several years previously as, in the Union's view, that settlement was a binding precedent. Respondent contends that no useful purpose would have been served by the Union's confirming what Respondent had already been conceded particularly as that point had no bearing on the issue than in dispute. The Union's president also had asked at the April 23, 1980, meeting to use the pay telephone outside. Respondent denied this request and stated that, if the Union developed any pertinent information later, Respondent would be willing to reconvene the third step grievance meeting to consider any new data. The meeting ended with Respondent's denial of the grievance in its entirety. That grievance has not been taken to arbitration as of the date of the hearing in the instant case.

The General Counsel adduced testimony that that was the first time in the numerous grievance meetings held between Respondent and the Union that the Union's representatives were denied access to a telephone to obtain data it deemed necessary to aid it in processing a grievance. Respondent's area supervisor testified that he has represented Respondent at the third-step grievance level on or about 12 occasions and never had received a request from the Union to use a telephone at any one of those meetings, other than the one held on April 23, 1980.

The General Counsel's contention is that Respondent was obligated to honor the Union's request to use the telephone in connection with the grievance under consideration then as it had always done so in the past. The General Counsel views as irrelevant that (a) the grievance had been under discussion for an hour, (b) Respondent had clearly informed the Union that it would reconvene the meeting at the Union's request if it so desired, and (c) the matter about which the Union had sought to use the telephone appeared to Respondent to be irrelevant to the issue under discussion. Such a construction of the good-faith bargaining requirements of Section 8(d) of the Act respecting unilateral changes unduly emphasizes rigid procedural formalities. Good-faith bargaining does not require a party to stand by while the other side pursues an inquiry with someone outside of those present on an apparently irrelevant point, notwithstanding that a considerable time had already been spent discussing the merits of the grievance itself. Good-faith bargaining would seem to require a party to be willing to meet again to discuss the matters developed by that inquiry if they proved significant. It is evident to me that Respondent's actions in the April 23, 1980, grievance discussions were in accord with those considerations of good-faith bargaining. All of the relevant circumstances must be considered in determining whether an employer's denial of a request respecting the utilization of the grievance machinery violates Section 8(a)(1) and (5).[5] The evidence in the instant case fails to establish that Respondent's unwillingness to allow the Union access to its telephone or to agree to a short recess on April 23, 1980, constituted a violation of the Act, especially as the testimony discloses that Respondent had indicated its willingness to reconvene the grievance meeting to consider any new points the Union might wish to present.

D. The Weingarten Issue[6]

1. The different factual accounts

In the latter part of 1980, Respondent scheduled weekend overtime work at Parlin Plant due to increased orders. On various occasions at that time, one of the unit employees there, Isaac Samuels, declined to work on weekends. In late October 1980, Samuels advised his supervisor that he would not work scheduled overtime on the coming weekend. On October 23, 1980, he was informed that, if he failed to report to work on the Saturday of that week, he would be considered AWOL and that that could lead to his discharge. The Weingarten violation allegedly occurred on October 24, 1980.

Samuels testified as follows as to the events on October 24. His supervisor, Raymond Zera, told him that he wanted to talk to him about overtime and that he, Samuels, then requested Zera to call a shop steward to be with him. Zera told him that he did not need a steward but, when Samuels insisted, Zera tried by telephone without success to locate one. Zera then informed Samuels that the steward was out to lunch, and Zera again stated to Samuels that he did not need a steward. Samuels insisted on a steward being present and again Zera told him one was not needed. At this point, he told Zera that Zera is after all trying to "stick it up [Samuels'] ass" while saying at the same time that he does not need a shop steward. Zera told him then to get into the office where he waited while Zera left and returned with Respondent's area supervisor, Kerry Quackenbush. Quackenbush told Samuels that he was not going to put up with Samuels' abusing his foreman by calling him an "asshole." Samuels told Quackenbush that he did not call Zera an asshole. Quackenbush told Samuels to go back to work and that he would get back to Samuels later about the matter. Shortly thereafter, Samuels was ordered to report to Zera's office where Zera handed Samuels a typewritten sheet with the heading, "Written Reprimand" on it. Therein, Zera wrote that (a) he had informed Samuels earlier that day that if he intended to be excused from weekend overtime because of illness, he should make sure to bring in a doctor's note to verify his illness, (b) Samuels had responded then that he would not work weekend overtime and would not claim illness, and (c) Samuels had then called Zera "an asshole" and, when asked to repeat it, Samuels again called Zera an "asshole." The Union's steward, who was also present in Zera's office then, asked Samuels if it were true that he called Zera an "asshole" and Samuels said it was not. The steward asked Zera if there were any witnesses. Zera responded that there were none and Zera then said that Samuels had just admitted that he had called him, Zera, an "asshole". Samuels then told his steward to make a note of the fact that Zera has bad hearing as he was sitting only 3 feet away and did not hear Samuels deny that he called Zera an "asshole".

Zera's account of the October 24 incident is as follows. He approached Samuels and said he would like to have a word with him. Samuels said he wanted a steward present. Zera replied that none was needed as the discussion was purely informative. Zera had no intention of talking about discipline but merely intended to tell Samuels that if he planned to report off sick instead of working the assigned weekend overtime, he must bring in a doctor's note. Zera then so informed Samuels who then said that Zera intended to fire him. At that point, Samuels started to walk away. Zera heard him say "asshole" and then questioned Samuels as to what he had said. Samuels turned and said directly to Zera that he "is an asshole." Zera then ordered Samuels to wait. The rest of Zera's account parallels Samuels' version. Zera conceded that he erroneously thought that Samuels, in the subsequent meeting in his office with the Union's steward present, admitted calling Zera an asshole and that in fact Samuels had denied doing so.

I credit Samuels' account as to the events on October 24. Zera did not deny trying without success to locate the steward on the telephone; he testified in a conclusionary manner that he had told Samuels what he intended to tell him; he testified that Samuels was walking away from him when he uttered the word "asshole" and that it was only when Zera questioned him did he hear Samuels tell him that he, Zera, was an "asshole" the account Zera set out in the October 24 "Written Reprimand" as to what Samuels had said differs somewhat from Zera's testimony at the hearing; and, most significantly, Zera admits that he misunderstood Samuels when Samuels, in the presence of a union steward, denied calling him an "asshole" despite the fact that Samuels was then facing him and was only a few feet from him and whereas, when the incident occurred, Zera said Samuels was walking away from him.

[5] Cf. American Ship Building Company, 240 NLRB 1, 17-18 (1979). The cases relied on by the General Counsel in his brief to me are readily distinguishable from the instant cases, on the facts.

[6] This refers to the matters considered in N.L.R.B. v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251 (1975).

Samuels had filed a grievance respecting the written reprimand issued him on October 24. It was pursued through the preliminary steps but was withdrawn by the Union prior to arbitration. Samuels was later discharged apparently on the basis of events that occurred after October 24 and has filed a grievance thereon. That grievance is being pursued.

2. Analysis

It is settled law that an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by conducting an investigatory interview with an employee after having denied that employee's request for representation by his union steward and where that employee reasonably believed that the interview may lead to disciplinary action. The General Counsel contends that the written reprimand issued Samuels on October 24 was the result of Zera's having conducted an investigatory interview with him on that date without the presence of a requested steward and notwithstanding that Samuels then had reasonably believed that the discussion with Zera would lead to discipline against him. Respondent asserts that Zera did not conduct an investigatory interview with Samuels on October 24; that Zera did not deny Samuels' request for representation; that Samuels had no reasonable basis to believe that Zera's discussion with him could result in discipline and that Samuels was not in fact disciplined as a result of information obtained in that discussion. There is no contention that Samuels was disciplined; because he sought union representation or because he was otherwise engaged in protected activity. The issue framed by the pleadings is purely a Weingarten one and, as expressed by the parties before me, is one which essentially requires factual resolutions—whether Samuels reasonably feared the prospect of discipline, whether Zera did in fact conduct an investigatory interview, and so on.

Respondent states that Samuels could have no reasonable basis to fear being disciplined in view of the assurances Zera gave him. The credited evidence establishes that Zera told Samuels that he did not need a steward. Zera's actions, however, belied his very words as he made efforts to locate Samuels' steward. That, in context with the prior warnings given Samuels, makes it obvious to me that Samuels reasonably feared discipline may result from discussing, with Zera on October 24, the matter of weekend overtime assignments. In any event, Zera's statement that Samuels did not need a steward is not a sufficient basis to disregard Samuels' request.[7]

The next question is raised by the contention of Respondent that no investigatory interview took place on October 24, 1980. Respondent notes that, although Zera intended to talk to Samuels respecting his oft-stated refusal to work weekend overtime, Zera in fact did not question him thereon. That argument seems to me to emphasize style over substance. Respondent urges that Zera sought only to warn Samuels that he better have a doctor's note if he claimed illness as the reason for not working the scheduled weekend overtime. Implicit in such a warning, and for that matter in Zera's persistence in talking to Samuels on October 24 after the representation request was made, is an inquiry by Zera of Samuels as to whether or not he still intended to go through with his intention of refusing to work weekend overtime, despite the fact that he had been given a written warning thereon the previous day. Samuels recognized that point instinctively when he complained that Zera was trying to stick it to him while telling him at the same time that he did not need a steward. I thus conclude that Respondent did conduct an investigatory interview that day with Samuels despite repeated requests for a shop steward. Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[8]

Lastly, Respondent contends that the discipline meted out to Samuels on October 24 was unrelated to any information elicited from Samuels that day. That contention goes to the scope of the remedy to be provided as all the essential elements of a Weingarten violation have been established. The short answer to Respondent's contention is that Weingarten expressly recognizes that an employee may be too fearful or inarticulate, when alone, to participate intelligently in an investigatory interview and that the presence of a union representative may prevent needless hard feelings from arising. It seems obvious to me, and I thus conclude that the discipline meted out to Samuels was an outgrowth of the unlawful interview. In the Weingarten case itself, the information that gave rise to the ultimate filing of the unfair labor practice charge was volunteered by the employee and was collateral to the investigation itself. To provide an appropriate remedy, I shall recommend that Respondent rescind the October 24 "Written Reprimand."

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act and is engaged in commerce and in an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and

[8] Cf. AAA Equipment Service Company, 238 NLRB 390 (1978). Respondent cites the Board's holding in Chrysler Corporation, Hamtranck Assembly Plant, 241 NLRB 1059 (1979), and cases discussed therein as support for its contention that it did not conduct an investigatory interview on October 24. That case does not stand for any conclusive presumption which would obviate a need for me to make a factual determination. At best, the facts in Chrysler are somewhat analogous to those in the instant case. On the critical point, however, those facts are readily distinguishable. In Chrysler, the meeting had ended and then the employee began an altercation. In the instant case, Zera was endeavoring to persuade Samuels to forgo union representation with respect to whether Samuels would use illness as an excuse to evade weekend overtime and then disciplined Samuels because he misunderstood Samuels response. Thus, Zera had continued the investigatory interview and disciplined Samuels for refusing to cooperate. I view the facts in Chrysler and those of the cases cited therein (e.g., Amoco Oil Company, 238 NLRB 551 (1978)), as not controlling and, on the basic issue, inapposite.

(5) of the Act by having, since on or about March 18, 1980, designated August 29, 1980, and the Friday before Labor Day in each succeeding year as an extra holiday for all wage roll employees employed at its Parlin, New Jersey, plant notwithstanding that such designation changed the holiday provisions of the then existing contract between Respondent and the Union and notwithstanding that the Union had not assented thereto.

4. Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by having conducted an investigatory interview with its employee, Isaac Samuels, on October 24, 1980, and disciplined him for statements it concluded he made then, without having afforded him union representation as had been requested by him and notwithstanding that he reasonably believed that the investigation would lead to discipline against him.

5. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by having refused to permit the Union to use a telephone during a grievance meeting on April 23, 1980, or by having refused to honor the Union's request for a brief recess at that meeting.

6. The activities of Respondent as found above in paragraphs 3 and 4, occurring in connection with its operations as described in paragraph 1, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[9]

The Respondent, E. I. Du Pont de Nemours and Company, Parlin, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with the International Chemical Workers Union, Local 527, AFL-CIO (herein the Union), by changing, during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement it has with the Union for its wage roll employees at Parlin, New Jersey, the holiday provisions of that contract without having first obtained from the Union its assent to such change.

(b) Conducting an investigatory interview of any wage roll employee at its Parlin, New Jersey, plant without the presence of a union steward where the employee has requested the presence of such steward and where that employee reasonably believes that the interview would lead to disciplinary action against him, or to the imposition of discipline as a result of matters arising out of such an investigatory interview.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Rescind the written reprimand issued to Isaac Samuels on October 24, 1980.

(b) Post at its Parlin, New Jersey, plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[10] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by it to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 22, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by having refused to permit the Union to use a telephone during a grievance meeting on April 23, 1980, and by having refused to agree to the Union's request for a short recess during that meeting shall be, and hereby is, dismissed.

[9] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[10] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JENKINS, ZIMMERMAN, AND HUNTER

On September 2, 1981, Administrative Law Judge James T. Barker issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order[2] as modified herein.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Texaco, Inc., El Paso, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b):

"(b) Make Leon Dove whole by paying sick and accident benefits due him during the period January 8, 1980, to such date as he was released from medical care."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Act gives all employees the following rights:

To organize themselves

To form, join, or support unions

To bargain as a group through a representative they choose

To act together for collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from any or all such activity except to the extent that the employees' bargaining representative and employer have a collective-bargaining agreement which imposes a lawful requirement that employees become union members.

WE WILL NOT withhold payment of sick and accident benefits payable to the following named employees for the designated period, or otherwise discriminate against employees, because of any union activity by them, or by any of our employees, including strikes.

Antonio Dominguez—January 10, 1980, through February 18, 1980.

Leon Dove—January 8, 1980, through such date as he was released from medical care.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole Antonio Dominguez and Leon Dove for sick and accident benefit payments due them for the above-described time it was withheld, together with interest.

TEXACO, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES T. BARKER, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me at El Paso, Texas, on December 11, 1980, and February 17, 1981, pursuant to an order consolidating cases and consolidated complaint and notice of hearing issued on July 16, 1980, by the Region-

[1] Respondent excepts, inter alia, to the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Leon J. Dove was not released from medical care until January 14, 1980. We find, in agreement with Respondent, that the record is not clear as to whether Dove was released on that date or 1 week earlier, as contended by Respondent. Therefore, we shall defer the determination of the exact date Dove was released from medical care to the compliance portion of this proceeding, and will modify the Administrative Law Judge's recommended Order accordingly.

Member Jenkins adheres to his partial dissent in E. L. Wiegand Division, Emerson Electric Co., 246 NLRB 1143 (1979), but notes that the principles contained therein are not involved in this proceeding. Members Zimmerman and Hunter note that they did not participate in Emerson Electric and, inasmuch as the remedial issue raised in Member Jenkins' partial dissent is not presented here, express no opinion on that remedial issue.

[2] The Administrative Law Judge correctly ordered that backpay with interest be paid the discriminatees, but inadvertently failed to specify the applicable interest rate. In accordance with our established policy, we hereby direct that interest on the backpay be computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth in his partial dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

al Director of the National Labor Relations Board for Region 28.[1] The complaint in Case 28-CA-5937-1 is based upon a charge filed by Leon J. Dove, an individual, on June 12, and the complaint in Case 28-CA-5937-2 is based on a charge filed on June 16 by Antonio O. Dominguez, an individual.[2] The consolidated complaint alleges violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) arising from the action of Respondent in discontinuing the payment of sick leave benefits to Dove and Dominguez because the Union had engaged in an economic strike against Respondent. The parties were provided full opportunity to make opening and closing statements, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, introduce relevant evidence, and to file briefs with me. Counsel timely filed briefs with me.

Upon the basis of the entire record, my observation of the witnesses, and the briefs filed with me, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

At all times material herein, Respondent has been a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Delaware, and has engaged in the business of refining and distributing gasoline and other petroleum products throughout the United States, including El Paso, Texas. During the 12-month period immediately preceding the issuance of the consolidated complaint herein, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased goods, materials, and services valued in excess of $50,000 in connection with its operations at its El Paso facility, and caused the same to be transported in interstate commerce and delivered to its El Paso facility directly from suppliers located outside the State of Texas.

Upon the foregoing facts which are not in dispute, I find that at all times material herein Texaco, Inc., has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

I find that at all times material herein, Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union, Local No. 4-612, AFL-CIO, hereinafter called the Union, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The General Counsel contends that under the principles enunciated by the Board in E. L. Wiegand Division, Emerson Electric Co., 246 NLRB 1143 (1979), Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discontinuing the accident and sick leave benefits of unit employees Dove and Dominguez at the commencement of the strike at the El Paso facility which began on January 8 and continued until on or about March 29. It is the contention of the General Counsel that both Dove and Dominquez were on authorized sick leave at relevant periods prior to January 8, and that, pursuant to a blanket, previously announced policy, Respondent discontinued the sick leave benefits to Dove and Dominguez without first acquiring information that the employees had affirmitively acted to show public support for the strike.

Respondent denies the commission of any unfair labor practices and asserts, initially, that the Emerson Electric principle is not applicable in the factual circumstances of this case. In any event, Respondent contends, the rule in Emerson Electric is unreasonable and conflicts with well-established principles of labor law.

B. Pertinent Facts

1. Background facts

At all material times Respondent has recognized the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all its approximately 125 operating and maintenance employees employed at the El Paso facility. Article VIII of the collective-bargaining agreement which all relevant prior times had been in effect between Respondent and the Union includes as an employee benefit an accident and sick leave benefit plan, hereinafter referred to as A & S benefits, and the constituent elements of the plan are defined in an officially promulgated benefits plans handbook. In substance, the A & S plan is a noncontributory benefit plan which provides for payment of benefits to regular employees with 1 year or more of service who are absent from work due to illness or inury and are unable to work because of that illness or injury. Benefits are determined by length of service. Employees with 10 years of service who otherwise qualify under the plan to receive benefits are entitled to 13 weeks of full pay and 39 weeks of half pay thereafter.

As a consequence of negotiations between Respondent and the Union, the parties entered into a memorandum of agreement renewing the previously existing collective-bargaining agreement between them to be effective from January 8, 1979, through January 7, 1981. The January 19, 1979, memorandum of agreement had the effect of substantively modifying certain provisions of the previous agreement and of specificaly renewing all other terms and provisions thereof. The memorandum of agreement provided, inter alia, that upon written notice to the Company given no earlier than November 1, 1979, the parties agreed to negotiate with respect to the general hourly wage scale, full-paid uniform health care benefits package, and improvement in vacation schedules. The memorandum of agreement further provided that if the parties failed to reach agreement on these specified subjects within 60 days after the giving of timely notice, the Union would have the right to strike, but not prior to January 8, 1980. On November 1, 1979, Respondent received the Union's notice of an intention to strike on January 8, 1980. Prior to the strike, Respondent prepared a 3-page document entitled, "Procedures in Case of Strike" and dispatched it to the Union and handed it out to all of the employees. In essence, the document explicated Respondent's policy with respect to funding, accrediting employee service, and implementation of the fringe benefit and leave provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement during the period of any strike, which might transpire. Included in the document was the following:

[2] I reject Respondent's contention that this matter is improperly before the Board because it derives from charges filed by individual unit members whose rights to proceed individually assertedly were extinguished by reason of the strike settlement agreement achieved between the Union and Respondent requiring the Union to withdraw pending unfair labor practice charges and not to initiate new ones relating to strike conduct or occurrences. See, e.g., Lodge 743 International Association of Machinists Corp., 337 F.2d 5, 8-9 (2d Cir. 1964).

> Accident and Sick (A & S) Benefit Plant
> Upon commencement of a strike, all A & S benefits will be discontinued, except in those cases involving accident or injury. A & S benefits will be continued to those employes who are disabled due to industrial injury until medically released by their doctors or until expiration of such benefits in accordance with the Plan's benefit schedule, whichever occurs first.
> Decision will be reserved regarding the payment of A & S benefits upon termination of the strike for employees who become disabled during the strike and whose disability continues beyond the termination of the strike.
> Decision will also be reserved regarding the resumption of A & S benefits which were discontinued at the beginning of the strike for those employees who are still disabled after the termination of the strike.
> Under no circumstances will A & S benefits be payable if they would not have been payable in the absence of a strike.

In a related sense the benefits plan handbook provides in pertinent part that:

> Should you [employee] become ill or have an accident while not at work, you are eligible for Accident and Sick Benefits unless you are on a personal business or military leave of absence or on layoff status at the time of such illness or accident. Should you receive full pay for vacation periods, you will not receive benefits under this Plan if you become sick while on vacation. If you cannot return to work on the date you anticipated, however, the Plan will apply against further absence.

Under the plan there is no vesting or accrual of A & S benefits, and benefits are paid to employees qualified to receive them out of current operating expenses. In the face of a strike, it is the policy of Respondent to pay A & S benefits to employees who were absent due to an industrial illness or injury at the time the strike commences for as long as their absence and their incapacity to work due to industrial illness or injury continue. A & S benefits to employees absent due to illness or injury arising from nonindustrial causes cease with the commencement of the strike.[3]

Frank Smith, Respondent's supervisor of employees relations in the El Paso area, testified credibly that a desire on the part of the Company not to finance the strike efforts of its employees was one of the principal considerations underlying this policy. He further credibly testified, in effect, that other nondiscriminatory administrative considerations dealing essentially with the integrity of employee claims of entitlement and verification of illness were the other motivating factors.

Smith further credibly testified that after the strike commenced on January 8, no employee whose A & S benefits had been terminated came forward to disavow the strike or to affirmatively establish their entitlement to A & S benefits. Moreover, after the strike commenced, the Union did not undertake to inform Smith that any employee whose A & S benefits had been terminated was not actually supporting the strike. As a general policy, Respondent does not require medical verification of illness for absences of less than 1 week. Medical substantiation is "frequently" required in connection with absences of longer duration.

2. The alleged proscribed conduct

Leon Dove had been an employee of Respondent for approximately 25 years when the strike commenced on January 8. He was employed in the bargaining unit represented by the Union at the El Paso facility. On December 10, 1979, Dove had gone on sick leave for gall bladder surgery. The surgery was performed by Dr. Joseph Motes, Jr., and Dove subsequently consulted with Dr. Motes concerning his condition. This consultation took place during the first week of January, and Dr. Motes issued Dove a written release to return to work effective January 7. Dr. Motes issued the release pursuant to Dove's request but advised Dove that due to the nature of Dove's work he should use his discretion in determining actually when to return to duty. Dove visited his personal physican, Dr. William M. Tubbs, on January 4 and 11. On January 4, Dr. Tubbs told Dove, in substance, that, in light of the nature of the operation which he had undergone, he advised against an early return to duty. He suggested that Dove wait "at least another week" until returning to work. Dove considered the matter and, in the course of Dove's office visit on January 11, Dr. Tubbs gave Dove an oral release to return to work on January 14. Pursuant to Dove's subsequent request, Dr. Tubbs provided a written release, dated January 29, stating, "The above patient can return back to regular duty work January 14, 1980."[4] On February 4, Dr. Motes responded to a written inquiry dispatched to him by Respondent. In his response, Dr. Motes certified that his records disclosed that Dove was released to resume work on or about Monday, January 7.

[3] The foregoing is based on documentary evidence of record, stipulation of the parties, and the credited testimony of Frank Smith.

[4] The above findings with reppect to the office visits paid by Dove to the respective physicans, as well as the releases provided Dove, are based on the credited testimony of Leon Dove and documentary evidence of record. Dove's testimony in these respects was confused and imprecise as to chronology and thus, to an extent, the findings are based on inference and probability distilled from the totality of the record.

Dove was a member of the Union and was on dues checkoff when the strike commenced. As a union member, he considered himself obliged to support an authorized strike whether or not he agreed with its goals. Prior to strike he had voted in favor of its authorization. Dove understood that as a union member he was subject to fine and expulsion if he had undertaken any effort to hinder the progress of the strike. Dove did not participate in the picketing activity that accompanied the strike but after January 14 he periodically performed telephone duties at the Union's headquarters during the course of the strike. The union hall was located approximately 1-1/2 miles from Respondent's El Paso facility. When Dove was on duty at the union headquarters, his ingress and egress was through the main entrance. During the course of an earlier strike by the bargaining unit members called by the Union against Respondent, Dove and all other bargaining unit members honored the picket line throughout the entire course of the strike.

Dove's A & S benefits were terminated on January 8, the initial day of the strike. After being notified of the termination of his A & S benefits, Dove made no effort to lodge a protest with Respondent. He did not undertake to contact Frank Smith, or any representative of Respondent, during the strike to indicate his availability for work.

Antonio Dominguez was at all relevant times a member of the Union employed in the bargaining unit at the El Paso plant of Respondent. Dominguez entered Respondent's employ in 1946 and has been continuously employed at all times thereafter. On December 3, 1979, Dominguez commenced a vacation which was scheduled to continue through January 4. Pursuant to further arrangements he had scheduled another period of vacation to begin January 7, allocable to his 1980 vacation entitlement. During the course of his initial vacation, and prior to the commencement of the strike on January 8, Dominguez became ill and was hospitalized for diabetes. He made this known to Frank Smith who considered his request that his vacation status be terminated and that he be put on sick leave. Smith told Dominguez that he was unable to grant his request because his current year's (1979) vacation had already commenced. However, Smith informed Dominguez that the rules governing this question would permit Dominguez to postpone his vacation planned to commence on January 7, 1980, and enter sick leave status on that date. This arrangement was formulated. Because of the 1-day waiting period requirement attaching to A & S benefits, Dominguez was in sick leave status without pay on January 7 but was granted A & S benefits for January 8, the last working day prior to the commencement of the strike. Dominguez' A & S benefits terminated on January 9 and were not thereinafter reinstated. On June 14, Dr. Harold J. H. Marshall, at the request of Dominguez, provided Dominguez with a written statement setting forth that:

> Antonio O. Dominguez was ill and unable to work from January 7, 1980. His diagnosis was diabetes mellitus (out of control). He recovered sufficiently to permit him to return to work February 18, 1980.

Dominguez credibly testified that, if he had been healthy on January 8, he would not have crossed the picket line to resume work. On February 18, Dominguez began picketing activities in support of the strike and honored the picket line for the entire term of the strike. In this period of time, Respondent received no information to the effect that Dominguez was actively supporting the strike, and no information to the contrary was conveyed.[5]

Conclusions

The threshold issue in the instant case is whether on the basis of the Board's Decision in E. L. Wiegand Division, Emerson Electric Co., 246 NLRB 1143 (1979), enfd. as modified, 650 F.2d 463 (3d Cir. 1981), an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating at the outset and for the duration of a protected economic strike sick and accident benefits to all unit employees except those whose disability derives from industrial injury, in circumstances wherein the reason advanced by the employer for terminating the benefits relate solely to (1) the unwillingness of the employer to assist in financing a strike against itself and (2) nondiscriminatory administrative considerations.[6] I find that under Emerson Electric Respondent must be held here to have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, and that the discriminatory effect flows from the inherently destructive nature of Respondent's prestrike policy announcement which was implemented and triggered by the commencement of the strike. N.L.R.B. v. Erie Resistor Corp., et al., 376 U.S. 221 (1963); N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26 (1967). Absent here is any overtone or undercurrent of a generic antiunion hostility or purpose otherwise to defeat the Union.

In the Emerson case, the Board held that the respondent therein violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating sick and accident benefits to employees who were physically unable to work on and after the initial day of the strike, because other employees actively employed at the respondent's facility had gone out on strike. In reaching this conclusion, the Board, inter alia, overruled Southwestern Electric Power Company, 216 NLRB 522 (1975), and adopted the rationale that the employees in question had a Section 7 right to refrain from declaring their position on the strike while they were medically excused. As a consequence, the Board declared:

[5] The foregoing findings are based on a composite of the credited testimony of Frank Smith and Antonio Dominguez, as well as documentary evidence of record. While there are inferences in the record that the medical statement of Dr. Marshall was requested by Dominguez in anticipation of the filing of charges alleging unfair labor practices deriving from Respondent's termination of Dominguez' A & S benefits, the authenticity of the statement was not challenged, and the accuracy of the representations contained therein was not convincingly placed in doubt.

[6] In enforcing the Board's Order in Emerson, and endorsing the principal component of the substantive pronouncements therein, the Third Circuit Court of Appeals modified the remedial provisions of the order which had directed benefits of disabled employees be terminated at the time the employee acquired information to the effect that the relevant individuals had affirmatively acted to show public support of the strike. This remedial issue is not present here for I do not interpret the General Counsel's claims interposed on behalf of Dove and Dominguez to encompass periods after they received their medical releases from their attending physicians.

> . . . an employer may no longer require its disabled employees to disavow strike action during their sick leave in order to receive disability benefits. To allow the termination of such benefits to certain employees as a result solely of the strike activity of others is to penalize the employees who have not acted in support of the strike.
> However, while disabled employees need not affirmatively disavow the strike action, neither can they participate in the strike without running the risk of forfeiting benefits prospectively . . . . For all practical purposes, an employee, disabled or sound, who affirmatively demonstrates his support of the strike by picketing or otherwise showing public support for the strike, has enmeshed himself in the ongoing strike activity to such an extent as to terminate his right to continue disability benefits [footnote citations deleted].
> Accordingly, we now hold that for an employer to be justified in terminating any disability benefits to employees who are unable to work at the start of a strike it must show that it has acquired information which indicates that the employee whose benefits are to be terminated has affirmatively acted to show public support for the strike.

The General Counsel contends that the instant matter falls squarely within the dictates of the Board's Emerson Electric decision and is in no significant respect distinguishable.[7] On the other hand, Respondent contends that the accident and sick benefits plan was one freely negotiated into the collective-bargaining agreement and that, by assenting to the inclusion of the plan in the negotiated agreement, the Union waived what the Board in Emerson Electric deemed a Section 7 right. Respondent contends his waiver resulted from the Union agreeing to limit A & S benefits to employees whose absence is caused solely by illness or injury, and by further agreeing to permit the Company to shift the burdening of proving entitlement to the employee claiming A & S benefits. Respondent asserts that this contractual reservation of rights requiring employees covered by the plan to come forward and present satisfactory evidence of entitlement to benefits is nowhere precluded by the Emerson Electric decision, for the Board in Emerson did not undertake to deny to employers the right to freely negotiate contractual provisions regarding the payment of A & S benefits, but rather fashioned decisional vehicle by which the Board "simply tightened the degree of proof required before an employer terminated A & S benefits during a strike to employees who would otherwise be eligible under the employer's accident and sick benefit plan," (Emphasis supplied.)

In sum, Respondent contends that A & S benefits were terminated at the outset of the strike on the theory that an employer has no legal obligation or reason to finance a strike against itself by paying benefits to strikers, and for other nondiscriminatory administrative reasons. Moreover, Respondent avers that, after their A & S benefits were terminated, neither Dove nor Dominguez complied with the requirements of promulgated benefits plan either by establishing their eligibility by providing medical certification routinely required by the Company, or by disavowing the strike. Further, Respondent submits that it had sufficient basis on the initial day of the strike to infer strike support on the part of employees whose benefits were terminated, evolving not only from historical background provided by the 100-percent effectiveness of the 1969 strike at the El Paso facility, and from mangagement awareness of the existence of the Union's disciplinary power over its members; but also from evidence developed during the course of the hearing serving to verify the accuracy of its prestrike judgment concerning the degree of support which unit employees would accord the strike.

Respondent further distinguished the applicability of Emerson Electric to the case at bar by contending that the evidence adduced herein establishes that Dove had received medical clearance to return to work 2 days prior to the beginning of the strike.[8]

In addition to contending Emerson Electric is distinguishable from the instant proceeding, Respondent advances argument which, in essential aspects, reduces to a contention that the Emerson decision is improvident in imposing a virtually per se rule proscribing any denial of accident and sick benefits during a strike; and is a decision which, (1) invites sophistry and gamesmanship on the part of employees and union officials; (2) improperly equates the Section 7 right of an employee to refrain from declaring his or her position on a strike while medically excused, with the bestowal of the right of an employee to keep his or her position with respect to the strike a secret in order to preserve their entitlement to A & S benefits; (3) significantly derrogates an employer's right not to finance a strike against itself; (4) forces employers to violate the Act by discriminating against classes of employees based on their visible support of a strike; and (5) leaves employers no effective means of enforcing their rights without violating the Act.

A decision in this matter must proceed from the premise that an administrative law judge of the Board is a bound by case precedent of the Board until and unless that precedent is supplanted by a decision of the United States Supreme Court. Lenz Company, 153 NLRB 1399, 1401 (1965). Further, no party to this proceeding challenges the legal efficacy of the proposition that an employer is not required to finance a strike against itself by paying wages or other similar expenses. General Electric Company, 80 NLRB 510 (1948). Finally, it is an established principle of law that an employer may not withhold payment of already earned or accrued benefits contingent upon the cessation by employees of a legitimate ecomonic strike. E.g., N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26 (1967).

[7] The parties concede the equivalency for legal purposes of the present accident and sick benefits, on the one hand, and the disability benefits which were pertinent in the Emerson case.

[8] As found below, this is not a viable contention based on the totality of the evidence of record.

The threshold finding is here made that, by reason of their past service, both Dove and Dominguez had qualified to receive A & S benefits under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement and the promulgated benefits plan, for a period which extended beyond the commencement day of the strike. Moreover, I find that the A & S benefits pertinent herein were accrued benefits constituting deferred compensation for work already done. See, E. L. Wiegand Division, Emerson Electric Co. v. N.L.R.B., 650 F.2d 463, 468 (3d Cir. 1981), enfg. as modified 146 NLRB 1143 (1979). A finding is further made that, contrary to Respondent, neither the language in the collective-bargaining agreement nor the provisions of the employee benefits plan contains a waiver cognizable by the Board as a defeasance of the rights of the employees herein "to refrain from declaring their position on this strike while they are medically excused" as a condition of qualifying for payment of accured accident and sickness benefits. While pointing to the negotiated collective-bargaining agreement and the corollary benefits plan as the source of its reserved right in the face of an impending strike to terminate A & S benefits, and to require employees affected by the termination to come forward and present satisfactory evidence of entitlement to benefits, Respondent is, in ultimate effect, interposing a waiver argument. Perkins Machine Company, 141 NLRB 98, 102 (1963), is instructive:

> . . . an effective waiver will be found to have been given when it appears in "clear and unmistakeable" language, either contained in the contract itself or expressed at the bargaining table before the contract was signed. On the other hand, a purported waiver will not be lightly inferred in the absence of "clear and unequivocal" language. Even when the parties consciously explore the matter during the negotiations and the contract fails to touch upon it, something more is required before the union will be held to have bargained away its rights, namely, a conscious relinquishment by the union, clearly intended and expressed.

Neither the collective-bargaining agreement nor the benefits plan itself contains "clear and unmistakeable" language from which a waiver may be inferred. Respondent came forward with no bargaining history supportive of its waiver claim. The H. K. Porter Co. principle is not here involved.[9] I find no waiver. See Tide Water Associated Oil Company, 85 NLRB 1096, 1098 (1949), cf. United Aircraft Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 440 F.2d 85, 96 (2d Cir. 1971).

Against this background and upon the record developed in this proceeding, I find that Respondent, in close factual analogy to operative circumstances present in Emerson Electric, disseminated a declaration that A & S benefits would not be paid to employees who would otherwise receive them, and did so at a time when a strike at its facility was imminent. This declaration came before there was any showing of how widespread the strike would be and before Respondent was aware that any of the employees who were unable to work ratified or actively supported the strike. The General Counsel points to this conduct as evidence of an improper, antiunion motive warranting a finding of a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. No other direct evidence of unlawful motivation is present in the instant record.

I interpret the Emerson Electric decision as declaring that the termination of accrued sick leave benefits to employees prior to any showing that they affirmatively supported the strike, evinces an intent on the part of the employer to discourage employees from exercising their Section 7 rights by coercing them to refrain from supporting the economic strike called by their duly selected bargaining representative at the premises of their employer; and retaliates in a discriminatory manner against them for their presumed but unverified support of the strike. The fact that the employer may also have had a valid business reason for terminating the accrued benefits is of no consequence under this doctrine. In the face of this controlling precedents, I am constrained to here find a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Cf. General Electric Company, supra. The fact that in Emerson Electric the union therein affirmatively protested to the employer withholding the benefits that the individuals who were unable to work were not participants in any strike, is not, in my opinion, sufficient basis for distinguishing the instant case wherein the record contains no explicit evidence of a challenge by the Union. The Board majority in Emerson specifically held:

> . . . we conclude that an employer may not rely on such speculative grounds to justify the termination of existing disbability benefits to employees which, as found here by the Admidnistrative Law Judge, had accured to them as a result of past work performed.

The absence of any showing by the employees on sick leave that they affirmatively supported the strike was the touchstone of the Board's rationale, and the protest interposed by the union representatives in Emerson was merely tertiary.

Having concluded that disposition of this case is controlled by the Emerson Electric decision of the Board, it becomes decisionally irrelevant to assess the merits of the contentions raised by Respondent challenging the validity either of the legal rationale supporting the majority opinion in Emerson Electric or the derrogating effect of that ruling upon the rights of employers to be free from the legal imperative of financing a strikes against themselves.

In sum, consistent with the dictates of Emerson Electric, I conclude and find that Respondent interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of their Section 7 right to refrain from declaring their position on the strike at the El Paso facility which commenced on January 8, by terminating the sick leave benefits of employees Dove and Dominguez while they were medically excused from duty, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I further conclude and find that this identical conduct of Respondent also violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, and upon the entire record in this proceeding, I make the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Texaco, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, Local No. 4-612, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By terminating the sick leave benefits of Leon Dove on January 8 and Antonio Dominguez on January 9 at a time when they were medically execused and prior to any showing on their part they affirmatively supported the strike which commenced at Respondent's El Paso facility on January 8, 1980, Respondent interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act and unlawfully discriminated against them in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent terminated the sick and accident benefits of employees Antonio Dominguez and Leon Dove in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to make Dominguez and Dove whole by paying to each of them the sick and accident benefits due them from the date the sick and accident benefits were initially terminated to the date on which they were cleared by competent medical authority to return to duty. Consistent with this directive, Respondent is ordered to pay sick and accident benefits to Leon Dove from January 8 through January 13, 1980, and to pay sick and accident benefits to Antonio Dominguez from January 10 through February 13, 1980.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[10]

The Respondent, Texaco, Inc., El Paso, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Upon the commencement of a lawful economic strike, and while the strike is in progress, discontinuing accident and sick benefits for employees during the normal term of their entitlement, but excluding all periods subsequent to the active participation of any employee or employees in strike activity or public demonstration of support of the strike.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercixe of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Make Antonio Dominguez whole by paying sick and accident benefits due him during the period January to January 13, 1980, with interest.

(b) Make Leon Dove whole by paying sick and accident benefits due him during the period January 8, to January 13, 1980, with interest.

(c) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, all records necessary to analyze the amount of accident and sick benefits due in the effectuation of their remedial order.

(d) Post at Respondent's place of business in El Paso, Texas, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 28, after being duly signed by a representative of Respondent, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 28, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

[10] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

WTEV-TV, Inc., d/b/a WLNE-TV and Local 1228, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, CLC, Petitioner. Case 1-RC-17266

January 27, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a petition duly filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Wendy Bittner of the National Labor Relations Board. Following the close of the hearing the Regional Director for Region 1 transferred this case to the Board for decision. Thereafter, the Employer and the Petitioner each filed briefs.Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this case, the Board finds:

1. The Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein. The Employer is a Delaware corporation engaged in the operation of a commercial television station at its two facilities in New Bedford, Massachusetts, and Providence, Rhode Island. Its annual gross volume of business exceeds $100,000 and it annually receives supplies valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and State of Rhode Island.

2. The parties stipulated that the Petitioner which claims to represent certain employees of the Employer is a labor organization as defined in the Act.

3. A question affecting commerce exists concerning the representation of certain employees of the Employer within the meaning of Sections 9(c)(1) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

4. The Petitioner seeks to represent all news cameramen employed by the Employer in the news department at Providence, Rhode Island, and New Bedford, Massachusetts, but excluding all other employees, salesmen, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act. This petitioned-for unit is comprised of nine news cameramen. The Employer, however, contends that the smallest appropriate unit must include all employees of the company at WLNE-TV, New Bedford, Massachusetts, and Providence, Rhode Island, who are directly involved in or contribute to the production, presentation, or transmission of programs, including producers, editors, directors, production coordinators, anchorpersons, interviewers, sports announcers, weather persons, cameramen, artists, reporters, copywriters, and schedulers assigned to the public affairs, news, program, film, special projects, promotion, and traffic departments; but excluding all other employees, including employees in the existing collective-bargaining unit,[1] sales employees, clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act. The unit requested by the Employer would be comprised of about 50 employees. At the hearing, the Petitioner indicated that it would not proceed to an election in a unit different from the one petitioned for.

The Employer operates a news oriented television station involved in the production of on-the-spot reporting of news events, sports, and weather, "documentary mini-series programs," and "regularly scheduled special project programs" requiring solicitation or polling of public opinion. The station is divided into 12 departments: program, film, public affairs, news, technical, sales, promotion, traffic, accounting, special projects, maintenance, and service and facilities. Each department has a manager or director who reports to the general manager. The general manager, department managers and directors, news operations manager, and executive producer are salaried employees. The other employees whom the Employer would include in the bargaining unit are: cameramen, reporters, and anchorpersons; sports and weather announcers and directors in the news department; artists, art assistants, and production coordinators in the program department; certain producers in the public affairs department; copywriters in the promotion department; interviewers in the special projects department; and schedulers in the traffic department. All of these are paid by the hour,[2] use the same timecards, and, with the exception of part-time employees, receive the same fringe benefits.

The cameramen, whom the Petitioner seeks to represent, are hired, supervised, and evaluated by the news director, who also supervises other employees in the news department, including reporters, anchormen, directors, and producers. While it appears from the record that the only formal qualification for the news cameramen position is camera experience, the news director may consider special abilities or areas of experience when hiring. It is the Petitioner's position that the news cameramen employed in the news department of WLNE share a unique community of interest, distinct from all other classifications of employees at the station. The record shows, however, that the functions actually performed by the news cameramen are significantly integrated with functions of other newsgathering employees at the station. For example, a news cameraman and a reporter are sent from the studio to cover a news story as a team. Once in the field, the two jointly decide which scenes to tape and whom to interview. The news cameraman is responsible for taping as the reporter interviews witnesses or participants. At times, news cameramen are required to cover stories alone and are responsible for both taping and reporting. After returning to the station, the reporter and cameramen work with the producer, anchorperson, and director in editing the tape and writing the accompanying story. Editing and writing can be performed by any of these employees. There are other employees such as artists, schedulers, and film editors, who are involved in the production and actual presentation of the broadcast.

[1] At the time of the hearing the Petitioner represented a unit of the Employer's technical, building, and maintenance employees.

[2] Although the anchorpersons in the news department are paid at an hourly rate, they receive a minimum annual rate pursuant to their personal service contracts.

In addition, it appears that personnel have been interchanged between departments and also among classifications within the news department. The record discloses that until about a year before the hearing there was a split classification of photographer/reporter. That classification was discarded and at the time of the hearing, "reporter" and "news cameraman" were separate classifications. Although there have been no news cameramen transferred to the reporter position since the change, two photographer/reporters have become reporters and a former film processor is presently classified as a news cameraman.

The Petitioner contends that these news cameramen are entitled to separate representation because of a "unique community of interest." It notes that the news director makes the final decision on hiring cameramen and that the nine here involved are full-time employees and receive higher pay than the reporters. It appears that in 1981 the station changed from film to video tape in its broadcasting. At that time there were four news cameramen plus a film processor who was then promoted to news cameraman. The additional four cameramen then recruited had prior camera experience. It also appears that the station does not use reporters as cameramen and that camerman do not generally appear on the air. However, most cameramen have had news experience and some reporting background and, if "out" alone without a reporter, will act as a reporter. Apparently none is sent out specifically to act in that capacity. The Board has, of course, found units of film cameramen appropriate, as in Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 110 NLRB 2108 (1954), where the Board found them "to comprise a separate and functionally distinct group, not unlike groups such as the lithographic employees or truckdrivers the Board normally grants severance to despite a broader bargaining history." Also, no news cameramen have been transferred to positions as reporters at WTEV. However, the fact remains that these cameramen do work closely with reporters on assignment, are not separately supervised as a group, and from time to time may themselves act as reporters.

Based upon regular contact on assignment with other employees, similarity of benefits, common supervision within the news department, and some integration of job functions, we agree with the Employer's contention that the nine news cameramen do not share a community of interest separate and apart from other employees involved in and contributing to the production and presentation of news programs.[3] Accordingly, we find the requested unit of news cameramen inappropriate separately for the purpose of collective bargaining. As the Petitioner has indicated a desire not to proceed to an election in any other unit, we shall dismiss its petition.

ORDER

It is hereby ordered that the petition filed herein be, and it hereby is, dimissed.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On May 1, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Leonard M. Wagman issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified below.

1. The Administrative Law Judge concluded that Respondent's discharge of employee Clanton was not unlawful. We disagree.

Clanton began working for Respondent in its warehouse and as a truckdriver in June 1978. Clanton was an active union supporter. Prior to his discharge four of Respondent's supervisors at various times interrogated Clanton about the employees' union activities. The Administrative Law Judge properly found that these conversations, occurring as they did against a backdrop of union animus, were unlawfully coercive.

In mid-March,[2] a fellow employee, Glascoe, complained to Clanton about Respondent's manager, Fox. Clanton asked Glascoe if he would be interested in joining the Union when he became a full-time employee and Glascoe said he would. Subsequently, Respondent's assistant manager, King, warned Clanton that Clanton's efforts to persuade Glascoe to join the Union had displeased Manager Fox. King added that if Clanton wanted to keep working he was going to have to keep quiet.

On April 10, Clanton and another employee were cleaning up around Respondent's facility. When Clanton went to the mechanic shop to ask Assistant Manager King a question, Fox shouted to Clanton and the other employee, "You boys come in here and clean this shop up—haul this trash off for J. Clyde." Clanton started to roll a barrel out of the shop. Fox and King came near him and Clanton said to Fox in the presence of King and a customer that he, Clanton, was 41 years old, considered himself to be a man, and resented being called a boy. King said, "Aw, Jimmy," to which Clanton replied, "I mean it, I don't want to be called a boy."

Clanton took the barrel outside and was emptying it when Fox came out and admonished Clanton for embarrassing Fox in front of a customer. Clanton tried to apologize, but Fox brushed the apology aside and told Clanton that he, Fox, had been getting reports from all over that Clanton was always announcing what he would and would not do. Clanton then asked to have Union President Moneyham present.

Fox summoned Moneyham to his office. In the course of the ensuing discussion Fox refused to divulge the sources of the complaints about Clanton. Finally, Fox stated that he was not satisfied with Clanton's apology and that he, Fox, needed to "go cool off." Fox told Clanton to continue talking to King and Moneyham and left the office. King assured Clanton and Moneyham that Fox would "be all right if he had time to cool off." Clanton then went home.

Clanton attempted to return to work several times but was not permitted to do so. Finally, on April 18, Clanton obtained a written termination notice from Respondent.

An incident somewhat comparable to the confrontation between Fox and Clanton involved employee Glascoe. Two or three weeks before Clanton's termination, Fox criticized Glascoe's work. Glascoe went to the office manager and asked for his check. He told Respondent's supervisor, Smith, that he was quitting and going home. Glascoe then found Fox out in a car in the parking lot. Glascoe demanded that Fox get out of the car and then, in the Administrative Law Judge's words, "proceeded to castigate Fox for the manner in which the manager was treating him." Glascoe then announced that he was going home and left despite Fox's efforts to calm him down. Fox persuaded Glascoe to return to work soon after the incident.

The Administrative Law Judge found that "at the time Leon Fox decided to terminate Clanton, he was aware of Clanton's prounion sentiment and was ill-disposed toward him for that reason." However, he concluded that there was no showing that Clanton's discharge was linked to Fox's animus. He relied primarily on the lack of any new overt union activity by Clanton after King's warning to Clanton in mid-March and what he found to be a lack of disparate treatment of Clanton's "misconduct" by Fox.

As the Administrative Law Judge found, Fox was openly hostile to the Union. Among the numerous incidents of threatening and coerceive conduct by Fox found unlawful by the Administrative Law Judge are remarks by Fox to employee Glascoe during the latter's job interview in February warning Glascoe that he, Fox, was trying to get rid of the Union and that Glascoe should not get involved with the Union. About 1-1/2 months after Glascoe began working for Respondent, Fox asked Glascoe if he had spoken to any of the "Union people." Glascoe told Fox that Clanton had solicited him on behalf of the Union. Later, as noted above, Assistant Manager King told Clanton that Fox was not going to stand for that sort of conduct and Clanton had better keep quiet. Several weeks after that warning Clanton was discharged.

That there was no evidence of solicitation by Clanton subsequent to his conversation with Glascoe is not dispositive of the issue here. Indeed, it appears that King was merely stating his belief that if Clanton continued his union activity his job would be in jeopardy, but he did not exclude the possibility that Clanton's past activity, including his solicitation of Glascoe, was sufficient in itself to incur Fox's discriminatory action. And the timing of the discharge of Clanton, coming as it did soon after Glascoe reported his conversation about the Union with Clanton to Fox, coupled with Fox's union animus and his expressed desire to get rid of the Union, is enough to establish a prima facie case that Clanton's union activity was a motivating factor in his discharge.

Faced with the General Counsel's prima facie case, Respondent has not established that the discharge would have taken place even in the absence of Clanton's protected activity.[3] In this regard, although Fox testified that he had been receiving complaints since January concerning Clanton's work performance, Fox took no action regarding Clanton until Clanton's solicitation of Glascoe. Perhaps Glascoe's altercation with Fox may have been of a somewhat lesser magnitude than the incident between Fox and Clanton in that the latter occurred in front of a customer and the former in front of other employees. However, even taking this into account, the treatment accorded Clanton when contrasted with the treatment accorded Glascoe was plainly disparate. Glascoe was entreated to stay with Respondent but Clanton was discharged without any prior warning except the unlawful one regarding his union activity. Thus, while Fox may have been genuinely disturbed by Clanton's conduct in front of a customer, Respondent has not shown that Clanton would have been discharged absent Fox's additional desire to rid Respondent of the Union. Accordingly, we conclude that Respondent's discharge of Clanton violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

2. In his Conclusions of Law, the Administrative Law Judge found, inter alia, that by unilaterally, without notice to or consultation with the Union, hiring new employees instead of recalling certain previously laid-off employees Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. We disagree.

The evidence in the record regarding this alleged violation shows that on September 13, 1979, Respondent laid off three employees and that none of the three employees was recalled by Respondent. Additionally, it appears that the Union sought to negotiate for the reinstatement of the laid-off employees but that no agreement was reached on the subject.

Respondent argues that the three employees were laid off before the Union was certified and before Fox became Respondent's manager and therefore there was no duty to bargain concerning them. Respondent further argues that two of the employees were fully or semi-retired and had not expressed any interest in returning to work and the third employee was not interested in returning on a part-time basis although part-time work was the only type of work available.

The Administrative Law Judge found that the failure to recall the three employees was an unlawful unilateral change in past practice. However, it is axiomatic that the record must include evidence establishing the past practice in order to support a finding that Respondent's action constituted a departure from it.[4] Here no evidence concerning Respondent's past practice regarding the recall of laid-off employees is contained in the record. Accordingly, without reaching Respondent's other contentions, we conclude that the General Counsel has not shown that the failure to recall the employees constituted a change in past practice, much less an unlawful unilateral change. We shall thus dismiss that portion of the complaint regarding the failure to recall the three previously laid-off employees and we shall modify the recommended Order accordingly.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 5:

"5. By unilaterally, without notice to or consultation with, the above-named Union, changing the rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the above-described unit by reducing the working hours of unit employees and assigning their work to supervisors, dealing directly with unit employees by offering them wage increases if they abandoned the Union and by offering employees wage increases if they abandoned the Union and caused others to do so, increasing the unit employees' wages, altering its method of computing overtime for unit employees, discontinuing its practice of permitting unit employees to take their birthdays off as paid holidays, and discontinuing deliveries to customers on Saturdays; by sending to the bargaining table bargaining representatives who had no authority to conclude a collective-bargaining agreement, or to make firm contract proposals; and by negotiating with the Union in bad faith and in a manner calculated to preclude consummation of a collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent has failed and refused to bargain collectively with the Union, and has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act."

Insert the following as Conclusion of Law 7 and renumber the subsequent Conclusions of Law accordingly:

"7. By discharging James F. Clanton, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act."

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified and set out in full below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Bedford Farmers Cooperative, Shelbyville, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Interrogating employees about their union activities, membership, or sentiments, or the union activities, membership, or sentiments of fellow employees.

(b) Warning employees against associating with United Textile Workers of America, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization, or telling employees that Bedford Farmers Cooperative is attempting to rid itself of that Union, or any other labor organization.

(c) Warning employees that Bedford Farmers Cooperative is not required to sign a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, or otherwise expressing an anticipatory refusal to bargain collectively with the Union.

(d) Offering or granting employees wage increases in order to persuade them to abandon the Union, or any other labor organization, or to induce them to persuade other employees to abandon the Union, or any other labor organization.

(e) Threatening employees with discharge or other reprisals because they support or engage in activities on behalf of the Union, or any other labor organization.

(f) Refusing to bargain collectively in good faith concerning rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other terms and conditions of employment with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All truckdrivers, warehousemen and garage employees employed at the Employer's Shelbyville, Tennessee, location, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined by the Act.

(g) Unilaterally, without notice to, or consultation with, the Union, reducing the hours of unit employees and assigning bargaining unit work to supervisors or nonunit employees, increasing the wages of unit employees, changing the method of computing overtime for employees in the bargaining unit, discontinuing its policy of granting unit employees a day off with pay on their birthdays, eliminating Saturday deliveries, or otherwise changing the rates of pay, wages, hours, or other terms or conditions of employment of any bargaining unit employee without first notifying the Union, and bargaining collectively with it in good faith concerning such proposed changes; provided that nothing herein shall require Respondent to rescind any wage increases which it has previously granted.

(h) Dealing directly with employees in the unit described above with respect to their rates of pay, wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of employment.

(i) Failing to give its representatives sufficient bargaining authority in negotiations with the Union.

(j) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees because of their activity on behalf of the Union, or any other labor organization.

(k) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act:

(a) Vest in its bargaining representative authority to negotiate and to conclude a contract with the aforesaid Union, and, if it reserves the right to consult with its bargaining representative and to inform him or her of its positions on bargaining issues before committing itself to proposals or counterproposals made during the course of the negotiations, to do so promptly and in such a manner as not unduly to impede the progress and consummation of the negotiations.

(b) In all other respects, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(c) Offer to employee James F. Clanton immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against him, plus interest, in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[5]

(d) Make whole Lee Jacobs and all the other unit employees who were denied a paid holiday on their birthday, or who suffered loss of wages as a result of Respondent's unilateral decisions to terminate Saturday deliveries, to change the method of determining overtime, and to reduce the unit employees' scheduled week from 50 to 45 hours, in the manner provided in the section of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(e) Reinstate the 50-hour week schedule for unit employees, Saturday deliveries, paid birthday holidays, and the payment of overtime for all hours of work performed in excess of 8 on each workday, except for hours worked on Saturday which will all be computed as overtime.

(f) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(g) Post at its facility in Shelbyville, Tennessee, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 26, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) Notify the Regional Director for Region 26, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act other than those found above.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT interrogate you about your union activities, membership, or sentiments, or the union activities, membership, or sentiments of fellow employees.

WE WILL NOT warn you against associating with United Textile Workers of America, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT tell you that Bedford Farmers Cooperative is attempting to rid itself of the above-named Union, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT tell you that Bedford Farmers Cooperative is not required to sign a collective-bargaining agreement with the above-named Union, or otherwise express an anticipatory refusal to bargain collectively with that Union.

WE WILL NOT offer you wage increases in order to persuade you to abandon your support for the aforesaid Union, or any other labor organization, or to induce you to persuade fellow employees to do so.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with discharge or other reprisals because you support or engage in activities on behalf of the aforesaid Union, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively in good faith concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with the above-named Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All truckdrivers, warehousemen and garage employees employed at the Employer's Shelbyville, Tennessee, location, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined by the Act.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally reduce the hours of unit employees, assign bargaining unit work to supervisors or nonunit employees, increase the wages of unit employees, change the method of computing overtime for employees in the bargaining unit, discontinue our policy of granting unit employees a day off with pay on their birthdays, eliminate Saturday deliveries, or otherwise change the rates of pay, wages, hours, or other terms or conditions of employment of any bargaining unit employees without first notifying the aforesaid Union and giving it an opportunity to bargain about such matters; provided that nothing herein shall require us to rescind any wage increases which we have previously granted to the employees in the bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT fail to give our representatives sufficient bargaining authority in negotiations with the aforesaid Union.

WE WILL NOT deal directly with unit employees with respect to their rates of pay, wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of employment.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against employees because of their activity on behalf of the Union, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights to engage in self-organization, to form, join, or assist any union, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, to engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with the aforesaid Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the above-described appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

WE WILL authorize our bargaining agent to negotiate and to conclude a contract with the aforesaid Union, and, if we reserve the right to consult with our bargaining agent and inform him or her of our positions on bargaining issues before committing ourselves to proposals or counterproposals made during the course of the negotiations, we shall do so promptly and in such a manner as not unduly to impede the progress and consummation of the negotiations.

WE WILL offer employee James F. Clanton immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of pay he may have suffered as a result of our discrimination against him, with interest.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, Lee Jacobs and each unit employee who was denied a paid holiday on his or her birthday or who lost wages as a result of our unilateral decisions to terminate Saturday deliveries, to change the method of determining overtime, and to reduce our unit employees' scheduled workweek from 50 to 45 hours.

WE WILL reinstate the 50-hour week schedule, Saturday deliveries, paid birthday holidays, and the payment of overtime for all hours of work performed in excess of 8 hours on each workday, except for hours of work performed on Saturday which will all be computed as overtime.

BEDFORD FARMERS COOPERATIVE

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

LEONARD M. WAGMAN, Administrative Law Judge: These cases were heard before me in Shelbyville, Tennessee, on October 15 and 16, 1980,[1] pursuant to an order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint and notice of hearing issued by the Regional Director for the National Labor Relations Board, herein called the Board, Region 26 on May 22, 1980, and an amended order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint issued by the Acting Regional Director for Region 26 on October 3. The Charging Party, United Textile Workers of America, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union, filed the unfair labor practice charges in these cases, respectively, on April 2 and 3. The consolidated complaint, as amended first by the Acting Regional Director's order and again at the hearing, alleges that Respondent, Bedford Farmers Cooperative, herein called the Co-op, had violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151, et seq.. The Co-op by its timely answer, as amended, denied any commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the parties' briefs, I make the following:

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Co-op, a corporation with an office and place of business in Shelbyville, Tennessee, engages in the retail sale of farm supplies. In the course and conduct of its business operations, the Co-op annually derives gross revenues exceeding $500,000 from its retail sales. The Co-op also annually receives at its Shelbyville, Tennessee, facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000, which are shipped to it directly from points outside the State of Tennessee. In its answer, the Co-op admits that, at all times material, it has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and I so find.

The complaint alleges, the Co-op in its answer admits, and I find that the Union, United Textile Workers of America, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Issues

The Co-op is an organization formed and operated in accordance with an act of Congress, the Cooper-Volstead Act. Its membership includes 2,800 to 3,000 farmers. The Co-op's purpose is to supply the needs of farmers in their farming operations.

The Co-op's management policies are the responsibility of the nine persons elected to its board of directors for 3-year terms. The board employs a manager, who supervises the Co-op's day-to-day operation in accordance with its policies. Leon Fox has been the Co-op's manager since January 2.

On October 5, 1979, following a representation election held on September 27, 1979, the National Labor Relations Board certified the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the following unit of the Co-op's employees:

> All truckdrivers, warehousemen and garage employees employed at the [Co-op's] Shelbyville, Tennessee, location, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined by the Act.

By letter dated October 16 to the Co-op, the Union requested a meeting to begin collective bargaining. The Co-op's manager, Kary Collier, replied that the Co-op's board of directors had not appointed a negotiating committee but, as soon as that had been done, the Union would be told "as to an agreeable meeting time."

Collier soon resigned. Assistant Manager Billy King, who became acting manager, suggested to the Union that negotiations not start until the Co-op had selected a new manager. The Union agreed to wait. Thereafter, the Co-op hired its current manager, Leon Fox.

On January 26, the parties embarked upon contract negotiations. Thereafter, the parties held bargaining sessions on February 9, 16, and 23 and April 17 and 29.

The issues presented concern the Co-op's conduct after Fox became its manager. Specifically, with respect to Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, the issues presented are whether the evidence shows that the Co-op violated that section of the Act by: informing its employees that the Co-op would not agree to a contract; interrogating employees regarding their union activities, membership, and desires; advising employees to remain away from the Union and that the Co-op was seeking to oust the Union; informing employees that the Co-op was not required to sign a collective-bargaining agreement; and threatening its employees with discharge because of their union activity or other support for the Union.

Further issues presented are whether the Co-op violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally granting its employees a wage increase, and by terminating employee James Clanton.

Finally, the issues presented with regard to Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act are whether the Co-op violated its bargaining obligation by unilaterally discontinuing its policy of granting a paid holiday to employees on their birthday, hiring new employees rather than recalling laid-off unit employees, reducing the unit employees' working hours, changing its method of computing overtime, discontinuing Saturday deliveries, bargaining with individual unit employees, and by sending a representative to the bargaining table without authority to bind the Employer.

B. Alleged Interference, Restraint, and Coercion

On February 20, while interviewing Timothy Glascoe for employment, Manager Fox stated that the Co-op "had been having some problems with the Union, and that some complications had arisen between the Union and himself." Fox also disclosed that he was attempting "to get rid of the Union." Fox advised Glascoe "to try to not get involved with the Union, to try to stay away from the Union, but to be friends with the guys but not get real close friends with them." Fox also inquired as to whether Glascoe had any prior knowledge of the Union and the Co-op's problem with the Union.[2]

[1] All dates hereafter refer to 1980, unless otherwise stated.

Contrary to the General Counsel's contention, I find that Fox's question regarding Glascoe's knowledge of the Union and the Co-op's difficulty with the Union did not intrude upon Glascoe's Section 7 rights.[3] Fox did not seek disclosure of Glascoe's union activity or sentiments. Nor did Fox seek information regarding union activities or sentiments of other employees. Instead, Fox's inquiry was directed at whether Glascoe knew of the Co-op's bargaining relationship with the Union. I find, therefore, that Fox's question regarding Glascoe's knowledge of the Union and the Co-op's troubles with the Union did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I shall, therefore, recommend dismissal of the allegation that this interrogation violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

However, I find Fox's warning and his remark that he was acting to defeat the Union, at a time when it was engaged in bargaining, did unlawfully interfere with Glascoe's freedom to engage in union activities, for Fox was using his position as a supervisor to restrain Glascoe from lending support to the Union. The warning suggested that Glascoe's relationship with the Co-op might suffer if he defied the Co-op and supported the Union's futile attempt to obtain a contract. Accordingly, I find that Fox's warning was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In mid-March, Glascoe complained to fellow employee, James Clanton, that Manager Fox was shifting Glascoe from job to job. Clanton asked Glascoe if he would be interested in joining the Union after he became a full-time employee. Glascoe said he would.[4]

At the end of March, Assistant Manager Billy King approached Clanton at the Co-op. After expressing his friendly attitude toward Clanton, King reported that Manager Fox was displeased about some of Clanton's remarks. When Clanton sought an explanation, Billy King responded: "[W]ell, I'll just be honest with you, this business about asking the new boy about joining the Union . . . he's the boss, and he's not going to stand for it." Clanton protested, saying it was his belief that he had a right to talk about the Union. In response, King warned in substance that Fox was "not going to stand for it." He also warned: "I'll just be honest with you, you want to keep working . . . you are going to have to keep quiet."[5]

At or about the same time, Manager Fox found Glascoe cleaning the Co-op's office and asked him if he "had spoken to any of the Union people." Glascoe replied that employee Clanton had talked to him about the Union.[6]

There can be little doubt that King's warning to Clanton amounted to a threat that, if Clanton persisted in soliciting support for the Union among his fellow employees, Manager Fox would terminate him. Beyond question, such a threat seriously impairs an employee's Section 7 right to support a labor organization. I also find that Fox's coercive interrogation of Glascoe was likely to restrain Glascoe from becoming a union member. I therefore find that by King's threat and Fox's interrogation the Co-op violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In mid-February, while conversing with employees Danny Knight, Mike Mooneyham, and C. A. Adcock regarding the then-current collective-bargaining negotiations, Manager Fox stated that the Co-op's board of directors was having "a hard time agreeing on anything," and that in his opinion "it would be hard to ever get a contract agreed on because the Board of Directors couldn't agree on the contract." Contrary to the General Counsel's allegation, I do not find Fox's remark violative of the Act for, although he left no doubt that collective bargaining with the Co-op would be difficult, Fox did not suggest that it would be futile. I shall, therefore, recommend dismissal of this allegation.

During January, February, and March, and up until April 10, employee Clanton had repeated encounters at the Co-op with Supervisors J. C. Robinson, Wayne Hornaday, Phillip Pyrdum, and Dale Conn regarding the Union. Each of these supervisors, at various times during those months, questioned Clanton about what happened at union meetings and whether the employees would seek the Labor Board's assistance or otherwise take action against Fox and whether they intended to go on strike.[7] This questioning occurred against a backdrop of union animus, including a threat of discharge, and was therefore coercive. I find that by this interrogation the Co-op violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On August 8, Co-op employees Roger Gregory and Billy G. Solomon visited Manager Fox in his office. Solomon and Fox got into a discussion regarding Fox's decision to promote employee Mike Mooneyham to foreman and grant him a wage increase. When Solomon protested that Fox should not have raised Mooneyham's wages, Fox retorted that he was running the Co-op and that Solomon, who was president of the Union's local and engaged in contract negotiations with the Co-op, had nothing to say about the operations. Fox also added that the Co-op was not required to sign any contract with the Union. I find it likely that the two employees, hearing Fox's remarks, concluded that the Co-op had no intention of ever joining in a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. The Co-op's refusal to bargain in good faith prior to August 8, as found below, gave substance to Fox's suggestion that the Union's negotiations with the Co-op were an exercise in futility.[8] I find, therefore, that by this suggestion the Co-op violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. El Rancho Market, 235 NLRB 468, 470-472 (1978).

[2] I based my findings regarding Fox's remarks to Glascoe on the latter's testimony which was uncontradicted.

[3] In pertinent part, Sec. 7 provides:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

[4] I base my findings as to Glascoe's conversation with Clanton on the latter's testimony.

[5] I based my findings regarding King's remarks to Clanton on the latter's testimony. In contrast to Clanton, who provided a fully detailed description of the alleged incident, King was led through two questions about talking to Clanton about "union activity." Thus, of the two, Clanton impressed me as the more reliable witness on this matter.

[6] I based my findings regarding Fox's conversation with Glascoe on this occasion on Glascoe's testimony, which was undenied.

[7] My findings regarding these incidents of interrogation involving Clanton were based on his testimony, which was uncontradicted.

C. The Alleged Discrimination Against James F. Clanton

1. The facts

The facts relating to this alleged violation are substantially free of dispute. The Co-op hired James F. Clanton in June 1978. Thereafter, until his discharge on April 10, the Co-op employed Clanton in the warehouse and as a truckdriver under the immediate supervision of J. C. Robinson.

Clanton supported the Union; he attended union meetings. In mid-March, he asked employee Glascoe about joining the Union. However, there is no showing that Clanton thereafter solicited other employees on the Union's behalf.

Prior to his discharge, Clanton had several encounters with supervisors, including J. C. Robinson, regarding the Union. Some of those conversations were concerned with what happened at union meetings, the employees' intentions regarding Manager Fox, and whether the employees intended to engage in a strike. In one of them, in mid-March, Assistant Manager King warned Clanton that his effort to persuade Glascoe to join the Union had displeased Manager Fox. In this last confrontation, King warned that further solicitation on the Union's behalf by Clanton would result in Clanton's discharge.

The incident which immediately preceded Clanton's termination occurred on the afternoon of April 10, at the Co-op. Clanton and employee Johnny Reed were cleaning up trash and tidying up the ground adjacent to the Co-op's building. Clanton asked for and received Assistant Manager King's instructions regarding the propane tanks which were outside the shop. At this point, Manager Fox who was in the shop shouted to Clanton and Reed, "You boys come in here and clean this shop up—haul this trash off for J. Clyde." Clanton went into the shop, began rolling a barrel out to a truck. As Fox and King came near him, Clanton, in the presence of King and a customer, protested that he was 41 years old, considered himself to be a man, and resented being called a boy.

Assistant Manager King, attempting to make light of Clanton's protest, said: "Aw, Jimmy." However, Clanton brushed King's gesture aside, saying, "I mean it. I don't want to be called a boy." Clanton continued with his work. As he was dumping trash, Fox approached and summoned Clanton to his office.

Fox admonished Clanton for embarrassing him in front of a customer. Fox brushed aside Clanton's attempt to apologize for the affront, and voiced other complaints that Clanton had been reported to him for announcing what he would and would not do. Clanton insisted that Fox's remarks necessitated the presence of employee Mooneyham, the president of the Union's local. Fox quickly summoned Mooneyham to his office.

When Mooneyham arrived, Clanton reviewed the incident and Fox's complaints. Clanton had asked Fox to identify the sources of the complaints about his talking. Fox refused. Clanton asked if Fox intended to punish him on hearsay; Fox did not answer. Mooneyham asked Assistant Manager King how he would have reacted if an employee had talked to him in the manner Clanton had addressed Fox. King replied in essence that he would discharge the employee.

Upon hearing King's response, Clanton stated that he had already apologized for what he had said in front of a customer and that, as far as he was concerned, the matter had concluded. However, Manager Fox was quick to respond that he was not satisfied with the apology and that it was necessary for him to "go cool off." Fox instructed Clanton to continue talking to King and Mooneyham and to leave when he had concluded. Fox left the office.

Assistant Manager King assured Clanton and Mooneyham that Fox would "be all right if he had some time to cool off." At Mooneyham's instruction, Clanton went home.

Clanton returned to the Co-op on the following morning and found his timecard absent from the rack. Employee Mooneyham sought out Manager Fox for an explanation. After approximately 30 minutes, Mooneyham returned and told Clanton that Fox would not permit him to work that day, but might do so on April 12. Clanton's further attempts to return to work met with failure. Finally, on Friday, April 18, Clanton obtained a written termination notice from the Co-op.

The record shows only one other confrontation between Fox and a hired employee. Two or three weeks before Clanton's termination, Manager Fox confronted employee Tim Glascoe, as the latter was on his way from the sales counter to the fertilizer building. Fox rebuked Glascoe, saying, "[A]ll you've been doing all morning is running around . . . get your butt right back up to the front."

Stunned by Fox's rebuke, Glascoe went to the office manager, asked for his check, and announced he was going home. After receiving his check, Glascoe informed Supervisor Clyde Smith that he was quitting and going home.

Next, Glascoe sought out and found Manager Fox with Supervisor Dale Conn in an automobile in the Co-op parking lot. Glascoe flagged Fox down and demanded that he get out of the automobile. He then proceeded to castigate Fox for the manner in which the manager was treating him. Glascoe complained that he was receiving menial work assignments which he described as "dirt jobs" and "dirty work." Glascoe said that he "was sick of it," because all that Fox "did was fuss and complain." Finally, Glascoe announced that he was "going home." Despite Fox's effort to calm him down, Glascoe left. Soon after this incident, Glascoe again encountered Fox, who persuaded him to return to work.

[8] My findings regarding this incident are based on Gregory's testimony which was uncontradicted.

2. Analysis and conclusions

Counsel for the General Counsel argues in his brief: "The timing of the discharge, the union animus, and the disparate treatment clearly establish that Clanton was fired for his activities on behalf of the Union." The Co-op contends in its brief: "There is no credible evidence in the record that Clanton's termination had even the slightest connection with Union activity or that it reflected any Union animus whatsoever on the part of management." Although the Co-op's union animus was amply shown, I find that the General Counsel has failed to show the necessary link between that animus and Clanton's discharge.

In making my appraisal of the General Counsel's case, I have been guided by the teaching of Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). There the Board announced (251 NLRB at 1089) that henceforth it will:

> . . . require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that [the employer's opposition to] protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's [discharge] decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the [discharge] would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct.

Applying this analysis to the facts of the instant case, I find that the General Counsel has not shown that the Co-op's union animus was a "motivating factor" in the decision to discharge Clanton.

Employee Clanton actively supported the Union; he attended union meetings. In March, he pressed employee Tim Glascoe to join the Union.

It is also clear that Manager Fox was openly hostile toward the Union. In February, he told employee Glascoe that he was trying to free the Co-op of the Union. Fox also warned Glascoe to stay clear of the Union and thereafter interrogated Glascoe about conversations with union supporters.

Under Fox's questioning, Glascoe revealed that employee Clanton had talked to him about the Union. Soon after Fox learned of Clanton's solicitation on behalf of the Union, Assistant Manager King warned Clanton that Fox was displeased with his attempt to enlist Glascoe into the Union. Finally, King warned Clanton that his continued employment depended upon his desisting from such solicitations. In sum, I find that at the time Leon Fox decided to terminate Clanton he was aware of Clanton's prounion sentiment and was ill disposed toward him for that reason.

However, there is no showing that following King's warning Clanton engaged in any overt union activity which might have come to Fox's attention. Thus, at the time Fox made his decision to discharge Clanton there was no fresh manifestation of Clanton's prounion sentiment.

Further, there is no showing that Fox's response to Clanton's outburst in the presence of a customer was unusual. It does not appear that other employees guilty of similar misconduct suffered less punishment than did Clanton.

Glascoe's confrontation with Fox 2 or 3 weeks earlier did not occur in the presence of a customer. Further, comparison of the two incidents shows that Clanton was more abrupt and heated in his response to Fox's use of the word "boys" than was Glascoe in complaining about his "dirty work" assignments. Absent is any evidence that, after Clanton's misconduct on April 10, Fox, King, or any other supervisor made any reference to Clanton's union activity or prounion sentiment. Instead, the credited testimony of all of the participants in the incident of April 10 and its aftermath in Fox's office depicts Fox as genuinely disturbed by Clanton's misconduct in the presence of a customer. I also credit Fox's testimony that, in deciding to discharge Clanton, he took into account the complaints from the Tennessee Farmer's Co-op and Co-op supervisors that Clanton was impertinent. In sum, therefore, I find that the General Counsel has not shown that hostility toward Clanton's union activity or prounion sentiment played any part in Fox's decision to discharge Clanton. I shall, therefore, recommend dismissal of the allegation that Clanton's discharge violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

D. The Alleged Refusals To Bargain[9] in Good Faith

Soon after Leon Fox became the Co-op's manager, J. Clyde Smith, who was then president of the Union's local, and Gary Crockett, the Union's representative, told Fox that the Union was ready to negotiate for a contract. Fox responded that he would get in touch with the Union when the Co-op had appointed a negotiating committee.

However, before the first bargaining session, Manager Fox changed the Co-op's Saturday delivery policy. Before his arrival the Co-op's policy was to deliver orders to customers Monday through Saturday. At some point in January, Fox instructed his warehouse supervisor, J. C. Robinson, to eliminate Saturday deliveries on a gradual basis. Fox made this decision to cut cost, and without consultation with the Union. Indeed, the subject of Saturday delivery was never a topic at any of the bargaining sessions between the Co-op and the Union.

As a result of the elimination of Saturday deliveries employee Lee Jacobs, who usually performed such work, did not work on the following Saturdays: March 29, April 12, 19, and 26, May 17, and August 9.

Prior to January 2, the unit employees regularly worked 50 hours per week, 9 hours per day on Monday through Friday, and 5 hours on Saturday. During January, after Fox became manager, and without notifying or consulting with the Union, Fox reduced the unit employees' weekly schedule to 45 hours. Thereafter, unit employees worked 8 hours per day, Monday through Friday, and 5 hours on Saturday. The Co-op did not reduce its supervisors' working hours. I also find from the testimony of Mike Mooneyham and Wayne Hornaday that, after the reduction in the unit employees' hours, supervisors performed substantially more unit work than they did when the unit employees had a 50-hour schedule.

[9] No issues of credibility were raised in regard to these allegations.

On January 26, the bargaining representatives for the Co-op and the Union met for the first time. The Co-op's committee consisted of J. C. Robinson, chairman of its board of directors, Directors Bobby Don Hicks and Leon Foster, and Manager Fox. International Representative Crockett, Local President Smith, Local Vice President Mooneyham, and Local Treasurer C. A. Adcock comprised the Union's bargaining committee.

The Union presented its contract proposals, which the parties discussed. Further, the Union protested the reduction of the unit employees' working hours and the consequent reduction in their take-home pay. The Union also complained that supervisors were performing work which properly belonged to the unit employees. Fox responded that the reduction of unit working hours was a cost-cutting expedient. The Union also sought negotiations for the reinstatement of laid-off employees before the Co-op hired new employees. The union committee reminded Fox that the Co-op had laid off unit employees J. D. Bomar, James Simmons, and Fred Durham prior to his arrival,[10] and that they had not been recalled. The Co-op did not respond to the Union's expressed concern on this subject. Nor did the parties agree on any of the Union's proposed contract.

At the second bargaining session, on February 9, the Union repeated its complaint regarding the reduction of unit employees' working hours. The Co-op responded that it could not afford to continue paying overtime to the unit employees. The parties also discussed the employee classifications set forth in the Union's contract proposal. No agreement resulted and the Co-op submitted no counterproposal.

About mid-February, Manager Fox, in a conversation with employees C. A. Adcock and Mike Mooneyham, announced that he would raise the unit employees' hourly rate to $4.15 plus 20 cents for the gas truckdriver and make no changes in the current insurance and uniform benefits on the condition that "the Union was voted out." Adcock and Mooneyham responded that they were "just representatives of the Union" and would have to consult the membership before making a decision. Fox told the two employees to do so and tell him of their decision. At the time of Fox's offer, the unit employees' hourly wage was about $3.80. The gas truckdriver's wage was slightly higher. Mooneyham and Adcock reported Fox's offer to their fellow employees.

Soon after this encounter, Fox, without consulting with the Union or giving the Union prior notice, announced an increase in the unit employees' hourly rate to $4.35, except for the gas truckdriver, who would receive $4.55 per hour. Following Fox's announcement, the Co-op put the wage increases into effect.

The parties conducted negotiations on February 16 and 23. At one of these meetings, International Representative Crockett complained that the Co-op had granted the employees a wage increase without notifying the Union. Fox's response was: "The boys needed the increase." The Union did not accept Fox's explanation and protested that the Co-op was neglecting the bargaining process. Neither meeting produced any binding agreement on any contract issue. The Co-op did not present a counterproposal at either meeting.

At the February 23 meeting, the Co-op offered to raise hourly unit wages to $4.60 for all classifications except the gas truckdriver, who would receive $4.80. The Co-op also proposed the elimination of existing hospitalization and its policy of allowing employees 12 days of sick leave per year. The Union agreed to submit the Co-op's proposal to the unit employees, but predicted rejection.

At the next bargaining session in mid-March, the Union announced that the employees had rejected the proposal calling for the elimination of health insurance and sick leave. At the same meeting, a mediator appeared and suggested that as the Co-op recently had retained counsel the Union should give the attorney and the Co-op an opportunity to try to draw up a proposal. The Union agreed.

On April 17, the parties resumed negotiations. The Co-op's counsel, Jack Irion, attended and participated with its committee. At the outset, the parties discussed the Union's proposed contract item by item. Among the points of discussion was overtime. The Co-op claimed it could not afford to pay overtime. Attorney Irion announced that the Co-op would draw up a counterproposal for submission to the Union. This meeting produced some tentative agreements or understandings on nonmonetary issues.

On April 22, International Representative Crockett received the Co-op's proposal. He scheduled a meeting with the unit employees, on the following day, to review the proposal. Crockett noted that the counterproposal contained provisions which had been agreed on tentatively at the April 17 meeting. These items included overtime and vacation schedules. However, on the night of April 22, Attorney Irion notified Crockett that the Co-op's board of directors had rejected the counterproposal. The Union went through with its meeting, but did not present the repudiated counterproposals to the assembled employees.

The next bargaining session was on April 29. The Union pressed the Co-op for an explanation of its refusal to accept its own counterproposal. The troublesome items included overtime and dues checkoff. The Co-op claimed it could not afford another payroll deduction or overtime. After a brief recess, the Union submitted its second written contract proposal. However, no agreements resulted from this last negotiating meeting.

At the negotiations on April 17, the Union told Fox that, under the Co-op's policy, an employee received overtime for all work performed in excess of 8 hours per day, regardless of whether the employee worked in excess of 40 hours during the same week. The Co-op's counterproposal, prepared by Attorney Irion, after the April 17 negotiations, reflected that policy in the following excerpt from its article VIII, which was entitled "Hours of Employment":

> Section 2. Overtime shall be paid at the rate of time and one half (1-/12) [sic] as follows:

[10] The Co-op laid off the three employees on September 13, 1979.

1. For all work done in excess of eight (8) hours in any one day.

Sometime between this April 17 meeting and April 29, on Manager Leon Fox's instructions, Office Manager Ann Turner began paying unit employees for overtime only to the extent that their working hours exceeded 40 hours per week. Fox admitted changing the overtime computation without advising the Union.

Before Fox assumed management of the Co-op, each unit employee annually enjoyed six paid holidays, including the Fourth of July, Labor Day, Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year's Day, and his or her birthday. On May 27, employee Billy G. Sullivan asked Office Manager Turner if the Co-op would permit him to take his birthday off, with pay. She replied that Manager Fox had advised her to discontinue the practice of giving the employees birthdays off with pay. In July, employee Lee Jacobs experienced the same result when he asked Leon Fox about taking his birthday off with pay. The Co-op never notified the Union of the discontinuance of its paid birthday policy.

Chairman Marvin Roberts of the Co-op's board of directors conceded that the bargaining authority granted to the Co-op's negotiating team by the Co-op's board of directors was "indefinite." When Attorney Jack Irion presented his contract proposal drawn up after the negotiating session of April 17, the Co-op's board of directors considered it item by item, approving some and rejecting others. Upon completing this process, the board notified Irion that it had rejected the proposed contract. Roberts admitted that, under the Co-op's view of collective bargaining, its bargaining committee was to meet with the Union's bargaining committee upon the latter's request, make a proposal to the Union, and then present the tentative agreement reached at the bargaining table to the Co-op's board of directors for approval. Roberts conceded that whatever the Co-op's negotiating team might agree to would be subject to its board of directors' final approval. Roberts also conceded that, as of October 16, the board had not provided bargaining guidelines to its bargaining committee.

At the initial negotiating session, Gary Crockett told Manager Fox that the Union wanted laid-off unit employees Durham, Bomar, and Simmons recalled before the Co-op hired any new employees. Nevertheless, the Co-op thereafter hired five new employees without notifying the Union. The first new hire was Timothy Glascoe, on February 13. Thereafter the Co-op hired Greg Flannery on March 7, Johnny Reed on April 7, Randy Adams on April 11, and Max Mitchell on April 18. Of the six new hires, only Mitchell was employed in a nonbargaining unit position, involving the display room and the counter.

In June or July, Fox offered to employee Mooneyham a promotion to supervisor of the Co-op's two gas trucks and the painting of the Co-op's fuel tanks. Fox included in his offer a 20-cent wage increase, raising Mooneyham's wage to $4.75.

Mooneyham accepted the offer. However, upon assuming his new duties, Mooneyham found that he had no supervisory authority. He did not have authority to hire or fire, or to discipline employees, or to effectively recommend such actions. Indeed, although Fox told Mooneyham that two employees would be assigned to him, Fox never told Mooneyham what authority he would have over them. However, after 1 or 2 days Fox informed Mooneyham that the promotion to supervisor was violative of "Labor Laws" and was therefore rescinded. Mooneyham remained a unit employee, driving the Co-op's gas truck. However, Mooneyham continued to receive the hourly wage of $4.75. Also, shortly after receiving the wage increase and the short-lived promotion, Mooneyham terminated his union membership.

On the morning of August 7, employees Danny Knight, Roger Gregory, and Mike Mooneyham were discussing the Union in the Co-op's tire shop. Mooneyham told his colleagues that he thought Manager Fox would treat them better if they abandoned the Union. That same morning employees Gregory and Knight encountered Fox who, under their questioning, answered that, if they abandoned the Union and persuaded all of their colleagues to do so, he, Fox, could give Gregory and Knight more money. On the following morning, Gregory told Fox that he and Knight had rejected Fox's offer and would continue to support the Union.[11]

The General Counsel contends that the Co-op violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally reducing the unit employees' hours of employment, altering its computation of overtime for unit employees, discontinuing the granting of birthdays as paid holidays, hiring new employees rather than recalling laid-off unit employees, discontinuing Saturday deliveries, granting a wage increase to unit employees, dealing directly with unit employees, and sending a representative to the bargaining table without affording him authority to negotiate an agreement. Further, the General Counsel urges that, by this unlawful conduct, the Co-op demonstrated an intent to frustrate the collective-bargaining process by resort to surface bargaining. The Co-op denies commission of the alleged violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. For the reasons set forth below, I find merit in the General Counsel's contentions.

In pertinent part, Section 8(d) of the Act defines the duty to bargain imposed by Section 8(a)(5) as "the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment." It is well settled that an employer's change of established terms and conditions of employment, without first giving notice to and conferring with the statutory bargaining representative of its employees, constitutes an unlawful refusal to bargain. N.L.R.B. v. Benne, Katz, etc., d/b/a Williamsburg Steel Products Co., 369 U.S. 736, 743, 747 (1962); N.L.R.B. v. C & C Plywood Corporation, 385 U.S. 421, 425–430 (1967).

Applying the principles of Section 8(d) of the Act in the instant case, I find that the Co-op violated its bargaining obligation under that section when it neglected to consult the Union and provide it with an opportunity to negotiate regarding the Co-op's decisions to discontinue Saturday deliveries, the reduction of working hours of unit employees, the granting of a wage increase to the unit employees in February, the change in computation of overtime payments in late April, the discontinuance of the policy of granting employees their birthdays as paid holidays, and hiring new employees rather than laid-off unit employees James Simmons, J. D. Bomar, and Fred Durham.

[11] My findings regarding the incident of August 7 are based on the testimony of Gregory and Knight.

The facts do not support the Co-op's plea that its unilateral reduction in union working hours from 50 to 45 was excused by the existence of an impasse at the bargaining table. For, assuming that an impasse on that issue would have excused this unilateral decision, there was no impasse at the time Fox made his decision. Fox's testimony and that of Union Representative Crockett shows that Fox reduced the regularly scheduled hours of unit employees from 50 to 45 at an unspecified time in January, prior to the first bargaining meeting. Indeed, at that first meeting the Union protested the the fait accompli. Thus, when Fox made his unilateral decision to reduce unit working hours the parties had not even begun negotiations.

Nor was there an impasse in April when Fox ordered a change in the computation of overtime. Indeed, this unilateral reduction in overtime flew in the face of the Co-op's tentative agreement to adhere to its traditional policy.

The Co-op's cause is not helped by its asserted financial woes, for such a claim of economic necessity, even if sustained, does not excuse the Co-op's unilateral reductions in working hours, the termination of paid birthday holidays, the change in overtime computations, the elimination of Saturday deliveries, or any of the other unilateral actions recited above. See Fiberboard Paper Products Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 379 U.S. 203, 213–214 (1964). I therefore find that by the above-recited unilateral actions, which affected the unit employees' wages, hours, and conditions of employment, the Co-op violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

I also find that the across-the-board wage increase which the Co-op announced in mid-February was prompted by its desire to get rid of the Union. The announcement of the increase so close to Fox's disclosures of this desire, in his remark to Glascoe, Mooneyham, and Adcock, and when contract negotiations were in progress, was designed to suggest that the employees would be better off if they abandoned collective bargaining through the Union. I find that this wage increase interfered with the employees' right to support the Union and therefore violated Section 8(a)(1).[12]

The Co-op also ran afoul of the Act by dealing directly with its employees.

Section 8(a)(5) of the Act not only prohibits an employer from refusing to bargain with the designated collective-bargaining representative of its employees but also obligates the employer to deal only with that representative and to refrain from bargaining directly with individual employees. Medo Photo Supply Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 321 U.S. 678, 683–684 (1944); Erlich's 814, Inc.; Erlich's Northwest, Inc.; Capri Launderers & Dry Cleaners, Inc., 231 NLRB 1237 (1977).

The Co-op violated this obligation twice. In February 1980, Manager Fox told employees Mooneyham and Adcock about his willingness to grant the unit employees wage increases if they abandoned the Union. Again, on August 7, the Co-op dealt directly with the unit employees, when Fox offered Gregory and Knight wage increases to induce them to abandon the Union and persuade the other unit employees to do likewise. By Fox's overtures to the employees, the Co-op also unlawfully interfered with its employees' right, under Section 7 of the Act, to support the Union. Accordingly, I find that, by Fox's offers, the Co-op violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Erlich's 814, Inc., supra.

The Co-op again violated the requirements of good-faith bargaining by sending to the bargaining table representatives with insufficient authority to engage in meaningful negotiations. The Co-op's bargaining committee had no authority either to enter into a contract or to advance any binding contract proposals. Indeed, the committee had no guidance from the Co-op. When Attorney Jack Irion, a member of the Co-op's negotiating committee, drew up the substance of tentative agreements reached on April 17 between his committee and the Union's committee, the Co-op's board of directors rejected them in toto. Thus, the proposals made by Irion and his colleagues "were little more than trial balloons which [the Co-op's board of directors] could seemingly shoot down or reject at will. Such conduct does not constitute good-faith bargaining." Manor Mining and Contracting Corporation, 197 NLRB 1057, 1059 (1972). In sum, I find that the Co-op used its bargaining committee to frustrate the Union's efforts to obtain a collective-bargaining agreement, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Manor Mining and Contracting Corporation, supra.

The determination of whether the Co-op bargained in good faith in a sincere effort to reach an agreement as required by Section 8(d) of the Act, or merely engaged in surface bargaining to camouflage an intention not to reach agreement, is one requiring an assessment of motivation. "M" System, Inc., Mobile Home Division Mid-States Corporation, 129 NLRB 527, 547 (1960). In explaining that assessment, the Board declared:

> Good faith, or the want of it, is concerned essentially with a state of mind. There is no shortcut to a determination of whether an employer has bargained with the requisite good faith the statute commands. That determination must be based upon reasonable inference drawn from the totality of conduct evidencing the state of mind with which the employer entered into and participated in the bargaining process. The employer's state of mind is to be gleaned not only from his conduct at the bargaining table, but also from his conduct away from it—for example, conduct reflecting a rejection of the principle of collective bargaining or an underlying purpose to bypass or undermine the Union man> ifests the absence of a genuine desire to compose differences and to reach agreement in the manner the Act commands. All aspects of the Respondent's bargaining and related conduct must be considered in unity, not as separate fragments each to be assessed in isolation.

[12] Having found that the Co-op violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally granting a wage increase to the bargaining unit employees, I find it unnecessary to determine whether this same conduct also violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act, as alleged.

Applying the foregoing principles to the Co-op's total course of conduct, I find, as the General Counsel contends, that the Co-op engaged in surface bargaining.

The Co-op's unfair labor practices, as found above, revealed an intent to escape the onus of collective bargaining with the Union. Manager Fox expressed this objective in February when he told Glascoe of his effort to get rid of the Union. At or about the same time, Fox repeated this theme when he offered a wage increase to the unit employees if they repudiated the Union. In August, Fox's offer of wage increases to employees Knight and Gregory was conditioned on their precipitating the Union's repudiation by the unit employees. As part of its campaign to oust the Union, the Co-op, while pleading poverty at the bargaining table as an excuse for unilaterally reducing overtime, unilaterally granted a substantial wage increase to the unit employees.

The Co-op also sought to persuade the unit employees that collective bargaining was futile. Fox warned that the Co-op would probably not sign a contract with the Union. The Co-op, as if to prove Fox's point, sent a bargaining committee to the negotiations without adequate guidance or bargaining authority. Finally, to show that the Union was superfluous, the Co-op repeatedly made unilateral changes in the unit employees' wages, hours, and other conditions of employment, at times when it was obligated to consult with the Union. In short, I find that the Co-op rendered the six negotiating sessions from January 26 to April 24, both dates inclusive, an exercise in futility for the Union and the unit employees.

From all the Co-op's conduct, after January 2, as reviewed above, I find that it bargained with the Union in bad faith, and without any intention of executing a collective-bargaining agreement. I further find that the Co-op thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, Bedford Farmers Cooperative, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. United Textile Workers of America, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All truckdrivers, warehousemen and garage employees employed at the Respondent's Shelbyville, Tennessee, location, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined by the Act.

4. Since September 27, 1979, the above-named Union has been the exclusive representative of the employees in the aforesaid unit for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.

5. By unilaterally, without notice to, or consultation with, the above-named Union, changing the rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the above-described unit; hiring new employees instead of recalling previously laid-off unit employees; reducing the working hours of unit employees, and assigning their work to supervisors, dealing directly with unit employees by offering them wage increases if they abandoned the Union, and by offering employees wage increases if they abandoned the Union and caused others to do so; increasing the unit employees' wages; altering its method of computing overtime for unit employees; discontinuing its practice of permitting unit employees to take their birthdays off as paid holidays; discontinuing deliveries to customers on Saturdays; sending to the bargaining table bargaining representatives who had no authority to conclude a collective-bargaining agreement or to make firm contract proposals; and negotiating with the Union in bad faith and in a manner calculated to preclude consummation of a collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent has failed and refused to bargain collectively with the Union, and has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. By telling employees that Respondent was not required to sign a contract, by interrogating employees regarding their union activities and sentiments, by threatening an employee with discharge if he continued to solicit support for the Union among his fellow employees, by granting and offering employees wage increases to induce them to abandon the Union, by warning an employee to stay away from the Union and by announcing that Respondent was seeking to get rid of the Union at a time when the Union was the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees, in the above-described unit, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

8. Respondent has not otherwise engaged in conduct violative of the Act, as alleged in the complaint as amended.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has committed certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist from such conduct and to take such affirmative action as I find necessary to remedy the effects of the unfair labor practices and to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, by unilaterally hiring new employees instead of recalling laid-off employees James Simmons, J. D. Bomar, and Fred Durham, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to offer them immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and to make them whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered by paying each a sum of money equal to the amount he would have earned from the date he would have been recalled according to seniority, to the date of his recall less his earnings during said period, including interest, in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[13]

Having found that Respondent unilaterally reduced the unit employees' weekly working hours from 50 to 45, eliminated Saturday deliveries, revised its method of computing overtime, and discontinued its policy of granting unit employees a paid holiday on their birthdays, I shall recommend that Respondent restore each of those conditions of employment to its status quo ante. I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to make its employees whole for the monetary loss suffered by them as a result of the unlawful discontinuance of the practice of giving each unit employee a paid holiday on his or her birthday together with interest to be computed in the manner described above. I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to make whole Lee Jacobs and all other unit employees for any loss of pay they incurred as a result of Respondent's unilateral changes in working hours and backpay computation, and its unilateral termination of Saturday deliveries, by the payment to each of a sum of money equal to that which he or she normally would have earned before the reduction in working hours and overtime from the date, in each instance, when the particular hours or overtime were reduced until the restoration of the status quo ante of these conditions of employment, plus interest to be computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corporation, supra, and Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., supra.

I shall also recommend that Respondent preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze and determine the amounts of backpay due under the terms of this recommended remedy.

Having found that Respondent has failed and refused to bargain collectively in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, I will further recommend that Respondent be ordered to bargain collectively, upon request, with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and, if an understanding is reached, to embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining representative for the period provided by law, it shall be construed that the initial year of certification begin on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit.[14]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On July 22, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in answer and response to the Respondent's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Illinois Bell Telephone Company, Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

---

[1] The Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. On March 25, 1980, Administrative Law Judge C. Dale Stout died after the hearing in the instant case had closed. On May 18, 1981, before the filing of briefs, Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger was designated to prepare and issue a Decision based on the record made before Administrative Law Judge Stout. It is the Board's established policy to attach great weight to an administrative law judge's credibility findings, insofar as they are based on demeanor. However, in contested cases, the Act commits to the Board itself the power and responsibility of determining the facts as revealed by a preponderance of evidence, and the Board is not bound by the administrative law judge's findings of facts, but bases its findings upon a de novo review of the entire record. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). Administrative Law Judge Schlesinger's credibility findings are based on factors other than demeanor, and, in consonance with the Board's policy set forth in Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., supra, we have independently examined the record in this case. We find there is no basis on the record in this proceeding for reversing his credibility determinations or his findings of fact based thereon.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Administrative Law Judge: This proceeding was heard before Administrative Law Judge C. Dale Stout, now deceased, on February 4 and 5, 1980, in Chicago, Illinois, based on an unfair labor practice charge filed by Charging Party Carol Gilbert on June 14, 1979,[1] and a complaint issued on August 15, alleging violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151, et seq. On May 18, 1981, I was designated as the administrative law judge to determine whether Respondent Illinois Bell Telephone Company has violated the Act, which it denies in all respects.

It is admitted, and I conclude, that Respondent, an Illinois corporation, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. It is engaged in the business of providing telephone service, has during the calendar year preceding the complaint derived gross revenues in excess of $100,000 in the course and conduct of its business operations, and during the same period has received goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 at its Illinois locations directly from points located outside the State of Illinois. It is also admitted, and I conclude, that Communications Workers of America District 5 (herein the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act and has been, at all times material herein, the collective-bargaining representative of employees, including Gilbert, at its Lake Shore, Illinois, facility.

In April 1979, Gilbert, a directory assistance operator employed by Respondent since 1972, transferred to Respondent's Lake Shore facility and was given her first monthly evaluation by Group Manager Joyce Brumgart on May 2, who criticized Gilbert's 168 minutes of time out-of-board (TOOB), which is the amount an operator is away from the work station for any reason.[2] Brumgart stated that Gilbert's TOOB in April was "totally unacceptable," and that she must show "immediate and substantial improvement."

Gilbert grieved this warning, complaining, inter alia, that her TOOB was unfairly calculated, that she was refused access to the records of her TOOB, and that Brumgart refused to state how much TOOB was acceptable, so that Gilbert did not know what improvement was necessary to satisfy Respondent. Her grievance was presented by a union steward to June Lambertino, Respondent's manager and an admitted supervisor under Section 2(11) of the Act who was in charge of first-level grievances, and was pending disposition at the time of the hearing herein.

On June 8, Brumgart reviewed Gilbert's performance in May. Brumgart, although complementing Gilbert on her productivity, noted that her 123 minutes of TOOB was an improvement, but was still not acceptable. Gilbert's request for the presence of a union representative was rejected, as was her request for the records to substantiate her TOOB, a request which Brumgart stated she would discuss with her manager, Lambertino. Returning to her board, Gilbert called to make an appointment with Lambertino, whom she met after lunch that day.

[1] All dates hereinafter set forth refer to the year 1979, unless otherwise stated.

[2] TOOB includes time for going to a restroom, getting a drink of water, or moving to a different telephone board because of malfunction of equipment or because of drafts.

259 NLRB No. 167

There is no question that Gilbert asked Lambertino for a "furlough," which is time off which may be granted if there are sufficient employees to fill in for the employee. She also asked, although the extent of her discussion is at issue, to obtain her TOOB records and, when those were refused, said, according to Lambertino, "You're bullshit." Gilbert's testimony was different. She stated that, when Lambertino denied her the records, she then asked what was an acceptable amount of TOOB, to which Lambertino replied: "Zero minutes." Gilbert's reply was "Bullshit." In either event, there is no question that Lambertino immediately suspended Gilbert, a suspension which lasted for 2-1/2 days, without pay, and on June 11 announced to Gilbert that she had been put on "final warning," which meant that any further infraction would cost Gilbert her job. At least as of mid-November, and I infer as of the time of the hearing, the final warning remained on Gilbert's record.

No matter how the evidence is viewed, Gilbert was engaged in protected concerted activities because she was grieving her job review by Brumgart, who had once again criticized Gilbert for her "unacceptable" TOOB, and was seeking information pertinent to her grievance. Although Gilbert's request of Lambertino for a furlough was clearly personal and not protected, her discussion of TOOB was concerted because it involved implementation and enforcement of the grievance procedure of the company-union collective-bargaining agreement which is an "extension of the concerted activity giving rise to that agreement," protected by Section 7 of the Act. Merlyn Bunney and Clarence Bunney, partners, d/b/a Bunney Bros. Construction Company, 139 NLRB 1516, 1519 (1962); Interboro Contractors, Inc., 157 NLRB 1295 (1966), enfd. 388 F.2d 495 (2d Cir. 1967).[3] In addition, the grievance was a matter of mutual concern to other workers, as illustrated by newsletters which Gilbert published with at least one other employee, protesting harassment about restroom breaks, discipline caused by malfunctioning equipment, and monitoring employees' whereabouts to establish cause for discipline—all of which were concerns of a constituent local of the Union.

Respondent argues that Gilbert was not enforcing a provision of the labor agreement, but surely she was protecting herself from the potential loss of her job. If, indeed, her TOOB was unacceptable, and if it were not improved, loss of employment was a likely consequence.[4] Her attempt through the grievance procedure would have an impact on the terms and conditions of employment of all her fellow employees. Respondent also argues, citing some authority, that Gilbert acted outside the agreement's grievance procedure and thus engaged in unprotected activities. That is not so, and I specifically discredit Lambertino's testimony that grievances are only presented by union stewards. The agreement provides that individual employees may pursue their own grievances, as follows:

> 3.06 Nothing in this Agreement shall be construed as restricting the rights of employees, individually or collectively, to present grievances to the Company, through the regular channels of the Company's administrative organization.
> 3.07 The Company agrees, however, that after a grievance has been referred to a Union representative and such representative has dealt with a Company representative with respect thereto, no Company representative will discuss the matter with the employee or employees involved unless a Union representative is given an opportunity to be present at any such discussions or conferences.[5]

My review of the record persuades me that Gilbert's recollection of her meeting with Lambertino on June 8 was much more precise than that of Lambertino. Gilbert's uncontradicted, clear, and detailed narration of her conferences with Brumgart, in which she specifically set forth all her complaints, grievances, and arguments; her zeal in being the "watchdog" of every alleged breach by Respondent of the bargaining agreement, including her filing of five or six grievances over a 3-month period and her intense involvement in the affairs of the Union;[6] and her preparation of newsletters criticizing Respondent's treatment of its employees, all convince me that Gilbert's detailed testimony of what she and Lambertino talked about on June 8 is more probable. I, therefore, find that, at that meeting, Gilbert told Lambertino that she had some issues regarding working conditions that she wished to discuss; that she made a further request for records of her TOOB which had earlier been denied to her by Brumgart; that she asked and received an answer to the name of the form on which information was recorded; that there was a thorough discussion of Lambertino's reasons for refusing to release the records to Gilbert; that Gilbert replied that records of the names of other employees' TOOB could be covered or only Gilbert's records could be copied, in order to allay Lambertino's fears that the privacy of other employees would be invaded; that Lambertino switched the conversation to the matter of Gilbert's knowledge of what was expected of her, calling Gilbert "dear heart"; that Gilbert professed that she did not know, to which Lambertino said "Zero minutes out-of-board," and Gilbert replied, "Bullshit."

[5] Gilbert attempted to use this provision as a double-edged sword. When she was counseled by Brumgart on June 8, she complained that she could not be disciplined without a union steward being present, because she had previously filed a grievance involving TOOB. Even though she took this position, she still had the right to present her grievance to Lambertino later in the day.

[6] Gilbert was a past executive board member of Local 5016, which is a constituent part of the Union.

Fairly read, it is clear that Gilbert was concerned that she was being treated disparately from the other employees. If she were being targeted for adverse criticism because of her TOOB, it was her right to ascertain whether other employees, who she testified without contradiction also had TOOB, were being similarly counseled and what conduct she would have to engage in to satisfy Respondent. Rebuffed by Brumgart earlier that day, Gilbert asked for an appointment with Lambertino to pursue this matter, as she had a right to do under Respondent's collective-bargaining agreement.

Because Gilbert was complaining of her evaluation that morning, Board law involving a grievance meeting is applicable. The Board has long held that parties in grievance discussions should not be inhibited in pursuing their claims and that merely because a union representative employee uses obscenities, the protection afforded the activity by Section 7 of the Act is not lost and the use of an obscenity may not constitute justification for an employer to discipline its employee. Thor Power Tool Company, 148 NLRB 1379 (1964), enfd. 351 F.2d 584 (7th Cir. 1965); Crown Central Petroleum Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 430 F.2d 724 (5th Cir. 1970); United States Postal Service, 250 NLRB 4 (1980); Hawthorne Mazda, Inc., 251 NLRB 313 (1980). The use of vulgarities can never be judicially applauded, but it cannot be said that Gilbert's rejoinder was entirely unprovoked. Emergencies do occur, and for Respondent to insist that an employee's performance must be unacceptable unless the employee is chained to the working place, without a moment of leave, seems at least somewhat exaggerated.[7] On the other hand, Respondent undoubtedly has some justification in not drawing an absolute line between acceptability and lack of it to ensure that employees do not take advantage of even a minimal amount of time; so there was reason for Respondent to adhere to its position. But, merely because Gilbert supported her own argument with an epithet does not downgrade the discussion of the disagreement to a point where she ought to be denied the protected right to pursue the grievance. Dreis & Krump Manufacturing Company, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 544 F.2d 320 (7th Cir. 1976).[8]

Accordingly, I conclude that Respondent, by warning and suspending Gilbert, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and that its activities, occurring in connection with its business operations described above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Having found that Respondent suspended Gilbert for 2-1/2 days without pay, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to make her whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered thereby, with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[9] I shall also recommend that Respondent be required to expunge and remove from all of its records any references to the warning and suspension it gave to Gilbert.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact and conclusions of law, the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, and the entire record,[10] and purusant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[11]

The Respondent, Illinois Bell Telephone Company, Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees by suspending them or issuing to them final warnings for engaging in protected concerted activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Make Carol Gilbert whole for any loss of pay she suffered by reason of her unlawful 2-1/2 days' suspension, computed in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Revoke, expunge, and physically remove from its records any warnings and suspension notices and any references thereto relating to the suspension of Carol Gilbert for 2-1/2 calendar days beginning on June 8, 1979.

(c) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll and all other records required to ascertain the amounts of any backpay due under the terms of this Order.

[7] Gilbert denied that she cursed at Lambertino. The word "bullshit" is defined by "The American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language, 1969," as: "Foolish, uninformed, or exaggerated talk." Although "vulgar slang," it was appropriate to define what Gilbert intended to convey.

[8] Respondent cites Atlantic Steel Company, 245 NLRB 814 (1979) to support its actions. There, however, the Board refused to protect the use of an obscenity as it would "a spontaneous outburst during the heat of a formal grievance proceeding." Id. at 816. As to the factors of the protection —"(1) the place of the discussion; (2) the subject matter of the discussion; (3) the nature of the employee's outburst; and (4) whether the outburst was, in any way, provoked by an employer's unfair labor practice"—the Board stated: "To reach a decision, the Board . . . must carefully balance these various factors." Ibid. The Board did not find that opprobrious conduct causes the loss of Sec. 7 rights only when provoked by illegal activity. Rather, that is only to be considered. Parenthetically, I find that the first three factors have clearly been met.

[10] The General Counsel moved to correct the official transcript in various respects. There having been no opposition, the motion is granted and the transcript is amended accordingly.

[11] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(d) Post at its Lake Shore, Illinois, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices employees are customarilay posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 13, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

We will not suspend, issue final warnings to, or otherwise punish our employees for exercising such rights.

We will not in any like or related manner do anything that interferes with, restrains, or coerces our employees with respect to these rights.

We will make Carol Gilbert whole for any loss of pay she suffered by reason of her unlawful suspension for 2-1/2 calendar days beginning on June 8, 1979.

We will revoke, expunge, and physically remove from our records and files any warnings and suspension notices relating to the suspension of Carol Gilbert beginning on June 8, 1979.

DECISION, ORDER, AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On November 2, 1981, Administrative Law Judge William J. Pannier III issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Charging Party-Employer filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent-Petitioner filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

It is hereby certified that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Local Union No. 226, International Brotherhood of Pottery and Allied Workers, Seafarers' International Union of North America, AFL-CIO, and that, pursuant to Section 9(a) of the Act, the said labor organization is the exclusive representative of all the employees in the following appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by the Employer at its facility located at 330 W. Citrus Street, Colton, California, 92324; excluding all other employees, including office, clerical, accounting, technical and professional employees, employees represented by labor organizations other than the Petitioner, watchmen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM J. PANNIER III, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard by me in San Bernardino, California, on August 4, 1981. On December 19, 1980,[1] the Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing, based on an unfair labor practice charge filed on October 31, alleging a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151, et seq., herein called the Act. On that same date, the said Regional Director issued a report on objections, an order consolidating cases, and an order directing hearing and notice of hearing, finding that one objection to conduct affecting the results of the election conducted in Case 31-RC-4863 could best be resolved through a hearing and, as that objection concerned the subject matter already included as an allegation in the complaint issued in Case 31-CB-3966, consolidating the two cases for hearing and decision. All parties have been afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Based on the entire record, on the briefs filed on behalf of the parties, and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material, Colton-Wartsila, Inc., herein called the Employer, has been a corporation duly organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the State of California, with an office and place of business located in Colton, California, where it has been engaged in the manufacture and sale of sanitary ware. In the course and conduct of these business operations, the Employer annually sells and ships goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California. Therefore, I find, as admitted in the answer, that at all times material the Employer has been an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

---

[1] The Charging Party-Employer has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[1] Unless otherwise stated, all dates occurred in 1980.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

At all times material, Local Union No. 226, International Brotherhood of Pottery and Allied Workers, Seafarers' International Union of North America, AFL-CIO, herein called Respondent, has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. CHRONOLOGY OF EVENTS

The sole issue presented in these consolidated cases is whether, during a conversation on October 15, kiln operator Richard Ele had been told, by International Representative Jesse Garcia and by Tenth Vice President Thomas B. Perazzo,[2] that Respondent would, in essence, pay $600 to Ele if he would support Respondent in the representation election scheduled for October 16 in Case 31-RC-4863 and, additionally, if he would persuade other employees to do likewise. Before addressing the evidence directly pertaining to that issue, certain background events must be explained.

Ele had commenced working at the Colton facility, now operated by the Employer, in 1954 when operations there were conducted by Colton Manufacturing, Inc., the Employer's predecessor. At some point in time, Respondent had become the bargaining representative of the employees in a production and maintenance unit at the Colton facility. Ele became a member of Respondent, and monthly dues were deducted from his paycheck. However, in January 1978, Ele had become a foreman, a nonunit position, and had obtained a withdrawal card from Respondent. Ele continued to serve as a foreman until October 1978 when, at his own request, he again became a kiln operator. He testified that, following his return to this bargaining unit position, he had made efforts to rescind the withdrawal card that he had executed and to resume again his full membership status in Respondent. Due to apparent inadvertence, however, dues were not deducted from Ele's paychecks after his return to the unit.

Ele testified that he had not become aware that his dues were not being deducted until Respondent went on strike against Colton Manufacturing, Inc., from February 1 to June 4, 1979. Ele participated in that strike and while it was in progress, he learned that Respondent did not consider him eligible to receive strike benefits because it had received no dues from him during the period after he had ceased being a foreman. Nevertheless, Ele continued participating in the strike for its duration and, in the ordinary course of affairs, would have received $600 in total strike benefits had he been considered eligible to receive them.

As a result of a decertification petition, filed by employee Fedor Benic, on September 10, 1979, a majority of the employees in the production and maintenance unit at the Colton facility voted against continued representation by Respondent in an election conducted on October 12, 1979. However, the matter did not end there. In June, Respondent commenced a new campaign to organize the production and maintenance employees working at the Colton facility, which at this time was being operated by the Employer. As a result of this campaign, Respondent filed the petition in Case 31-RC-4863 on August 14, and an election was scheduled for October 16. During the preceding week, Perazzo was distributing handbills to employees at the Colton facility. When one was offered to Ele, the latter complained about his failure to have received strike benefits from Respondent during the 1979 strike. Perazzo, who was unfamiliar with Ele and with the events of that strike, promised to investigate Ele's assertion and to ensure that Ele received the amount which he claimed as strike benefits if it turned out that he was indeed entitled to it.

Later Perazzo described the incident to Garcia who, unfamiliar with the events surrounding the 1979 strike, checked Respondent's records, ascertaining that Ele had not received strike benefits during the strike because his dues had not been paid. Garcia, accompanied by Perazzo, then journeyed to Ele's home, but on that occasion Ele was not there. Respondent's two representatives returned to Ele's home on October 15, the day before the election. On that date, they did have an opportunity to speak with Ele and it is that conversation that is the subject of the complaint and is the only one of the Employer's objections that has been consolidated for hearing in this proceeding.

With regard to this conversation, Ele testified that while he had been working in the yard of his home, cutting glass to replace missing panes in his garage window, Garcia and Perazzo had driven up and had walked over to where he was working. Initially, according to Ele, Garcia had explained that Respondent's records disclosed that Ele had not been eligible to receive strike benefits because he had not been paying dues, but then had added that Ele deserved the money because he had worked in a union shop and had promised, "We'll get you the pay—we can get your pay." Ele testified that when he had pointed out that Sam Fullerton[3] had said that Ele could not obtain the money, Garcia had replied that Fullerton "isn't here now. He's out of it," that International President Lester Null "is out here now in this area and we'll go see him and see whether we can get some money for you," and that "[w]e can get some money for you now but, after the election, we can get it all after the Union gets in." Garcia added, "We know we've got the election won, but a little insurance don't hurt. . . . Do you have any friends that would vote for the Union?"[4] Ele replied that he had a lot of friends who would do so if Respondent treated them "right." Then, he mentioned that he was owed $750 for strike benefits, but Garcia responded that the correct amount was $600. When Ele again expressed skepticism about being paid, Garcia replied, according to Ele, "Well, we'll get you some now. We'll go see Mr. Null and we'll get you some and we'll give you the rest after the Union gets in."

Both Garcia and Perazzo denied expressly that the former had promised cash or strike benefits to Ele if he would vote for Respondent in the election. Moreover, both of them denied that Ele had been promised cash or strike benefits in return for persuading other employees to vote for Respondent. As had Ele, both Perazzo and Garcia testified that the latter had initiated the October 15 conversation by explaining that Ele had not been entitled to strike benefits because he had not been paying dues prior to the strike. Moreover, both of them agreed that Fullerton's name had arisen during the conversation. However, both testified that this had occurred when Ele had asserted that Fullerton had promised to secure the strike benefits and then had persuaded Respondent not to pay them to Ele. Both union officials testified that Garcia had replied to Ele's remark by saying that Lester Null had assured everybody in Respondent that Fullerton was no longer involved with Respondent and that Garcia and Perazzo were in charge of it. Both agreed that Perazzo had told Ele that Respondent expected to win the upcoming election. Both of them testified that one or the other had concluded the conversation by saying that Ele's support would be appreciated. Garcia testified that this was a normal concluding remark made to employees during an election campaign.

[2] It is admitted that at all times material Garcia and Perazzo had each been an agent of Respondent, acting on its behalf, within the meaning of Sec. 2(13) of the Act.

[3] Sam Fulleerton was an official of Respondent at the time the strike had been in progress.

[4] Ele testified that Garcia and Perazzo "mentioned about my friends several times" during this conversation.

The General Counsel and the Charging Party-Employer presented four additional witnesses. One, Victo Heavilin, is Ele's nephew and had been working in and around Ele's garage on October 15 during the conversation discussed above. Heavilin testified that, through the missing window panes, he had overheard one of Respondent's officials say to Ele, "If you could help us get in, we could get you $600, but we can't promise all of it to you." Other than the concluding remark, "We'll keep in touch," which he also attributed to one of the two officials, Heavilin testified that he had not heard any other comments made during that conversation.

Ele testified that, after Garcia and Perazzo had left, he had contacted other employees to tell them what had occurred. Ele identified three other employees with whom he had spoken: Alfred Villarreal, Robert Hudson, and Benic. According to Ele, he telephoned Villarreal and said that "Mr. Garcia and the Union are going to give me my strike pay." Ele further testified that "I mentioned the $600 I believe that they said they was [sic] going to get me, but I don't remember any other words with him except just telling him that I was going to get some money." Villarreal, however, testified only that Ele "told me that two men from the Union came by his house and offered him some money if he would vote for the Union." Villarreal denied that Ele had identified the two men by name and denied that Ele had said what amounts he had been offered.

Ele testified that, after speaking to Villarreal, he had gone to Hudson's home where, according to Ele, he had related to Hudson that "the Union was going to pay my strike pay, that I was going to get some now and I would get more after the Union got in." When asked initially what had been said to him by Ele, Hudson testified only that Ele had said that "two people from the Union had come to visit him" and "that he [Ele] would would get some money if he was to vote for the Union, that he would get part of this money then and probably after the election get the rest of his money that was due him. I think we talked about $500 or $600." After examining his pretrial examination, Hudson added that Ele had said that "they had offered him some money, that, if he would vote for the Union and if he would get some of the guys to help him bring the Union back in, they could get him the rest of the money." Yet, before Hudson had testified, Ele, when called as a witness for the General Counsel, had denied specifically that, during his October 15 conversation with Garcia and Perazzo, anything had been said about him (Ele) actually voting for Respondent in return for the strike benefits payment. Rather, according to Ele, Garcia had said only that Ele would get all of the strike benefits if Respondent won the election.

Finally, Ele testified that he had spoken with Benic by telephone and that he had told Benic, "I was going to get some money. They was [sic] going to bring me some money, and then, when the Union got in, I'd get the rest of my money." According to Ele, Benic had retorted simply that such an arrangement was illegal. Benic testified that Ele had explained that Garcia and Perazzo had promised to attempt to secure the strike benefits for Ele and that they had promised "to give him some money now and, after the election, they're going to give him the rest." Benic testified that he told Ele, "if they did that, that's illegal because, by the rules of the NLRB for the election, any bribery or any soliciting . . . was illegal."

The election was conducted on October 16 from 6:30 to 7:30 a.m. and from 2:30 to 3:30 p.m.[5] Ele testified that he had reported to the polling place that morning before 7 a.m. "to stop Bob Hudson from voting for the Union,"[6] in essence, because Garcia and Perazzo had not returned to his house the preceding evening with partial payment of the strike benefits and, accordingly, Ele "was mad because I didn't get the money that night."

IV. ANALYSIS

When they testified, it did not appear that the witnesses called by the General Counsel and by the Charging Party were candidly relating the events that had transpired on October 15 and 16. Rather, it appeared that they were attempting to tailor their accounts of those events, pertaining to and surrounding Garcia's and Perazzo's conversation with Ele, in a manner that would establish and fortify a case against Respondent. Certainly, Ele had a motive for doing so. As his initial conversation with Perazzo, during the week preceding the election, demonstrates, he had been upset at not having received strike benefits for the period that he had been on strike in 1979. Further, Ele admitted that, on the morning of the election, he had continued to be "mad" about not having received those benefits. Although he asserted that his anger that morning had been occasioned by Respondent's failure to deliver the partial payment to him during the preceding evening, it is equally inferable that he had been "mad" because Garcia and Perazzo had told him on October 15 that Respondent was adhering to the position that he was not entitled to those benefits. Heavilin, of course, is Ele's nephew. Benic had been the employee who had filed the decertification petition in 1979. There has been no showing that his lack of sympathy for representation by Respondent had changed since that time. Accordingly, while it is no doubt accurate, as the General Counsel argues, that Garcia and Perazzo had a "substantial stake . . . in the outcome of the election and of this proceeding," it is equally accurate that at least some the General Counsel's and Charging Party's witnesses, particularly Ele, could hardly be characterized fairly as being without interest in the outcome of these matters.

[5] This election was conducted in a bargaining unit of:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by the Employer at its facility located at 330 W. Citrus Street, Colton, California, 92324; excluding all other employees, including office, clerical, accounting, technical and professional employees, employees represented by labor organizations other than the Petitioner, watchmen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[6] Hudson testified that he had not voted in the election at all that day.

In point of fact, while the General Counsel and Charging Party assert that Heavilin's testimony, in effect, tends to corroborate that of Ele, concerning the promise assertedly made to the latter by Garcia and Perazzo, comparison of their testimony tends to show the contrary. Thus, although Heavilin claimed that he had overheard an assurance to try to get $600 for Ele if the latter helped Respondent "get in," he testified also that the speaker had qualified that assurance by adding "but we can't promise all of it to you." Yet, in his description of the purported promise made by Garcia and Perazzo, Ele made no reference to such a qualification. To the contrary, his description of it was unqualified: all of the strike benefits that Ele would have received in 1979 would be paid to him if Respondent prevailed in the election. True, some portions of Ele's various descriptions of the October 15 conversation are susceptible of an interpretation that Garcia had expressed doubt concerning whether the benefits could be paid, at all, to Ele ("We'll go and check with Mr. Null and see.") But, at no point did Ele describe either Garcia or Perazzo expressing any reservation, similar to that described by Heavilin, about whether the entire $600 would be paid if the decision was made to pay Ele at all. Accordingly, Heavilin's testimony, concerning the scrap of conversation that he assertedly overheard, does not tend to corroborate Ele's account of what purportedly had been said to him on October 15 by Garcia and Perazzo.

Inconsistencies also arise from comparison of the various versions advanced of Ele's purported dissemination to other employees of the remarks made by Garcia and Perazzo. For example, as set forth above, Ele claimed that, when he had spoken to Villarreal, he (Ele) had related that Garcia was going to give him strike pay in the amount of $600. Yet, Villarreal denied expressly that, during their telephone conversation, Ele had mentioned either the amount that he had been offered or the names of Respondent's representatives. Hudson, whose memory of what Ele assertedly had said to him had to be refreshed from his pretrial affidavit, claimed that Ele had related that part of the price for receiving the strike benefits would be Ele's agreement to vote for Respondent in the election. Yet, Ele denied that anything had been said specifically by Garcia and Perazzo about Ele actually voting for Respondent. Indeed, at no point did Ele testify that he told Hudson that the strike benefits had been promised to him in return for his assurance that he would vote for Respondent in the election.

Possibly the most significant inconsistency arose from Ele's and Benic's accounts of their purported telephone conversation following Garcia and Perazzo's visit of October 15. During direct examination, Ele testified that he had called employees other than Villarreal on the evening of October 15 and then testified that he had spoken with Benic, telling him, as set forth above, that "I was going to get some money. They was [sic] going to bring me some money, and then, when the Union got in, I'd get the rest of my money." The substance of this account, of course, comports with Ele's description of his conversation with Garcia and Perazzo. However, during cross-examination, Ele switched direction and testified that his conversation with Benic had not occurred until the following morning, October 16. Benic agreed that he had not spoken with Ele until the morning of October 16, testifying, as described above, that Ele had reported that Respondent's agents had promised "to give him some money now and, after the election . . . to give him the rest."

Yet, the election had been scheduled to commence at 6:30 a.m., October 16. Thus, by the time Ele had spoken to Benic that morning it would have been obvious that Respondent was not going to pay part of the strike benefits to Ele prior to the election, as Ele claimed that Garcia and Perazzo had promised to do. Indeed, Ele acknowledged that he had gone to the Colton facility at 7 that morning, before having spoken with Benic, because he had been "mad" about not having received any money from Respondent and had wanted to stop Hudson from voting for it. In these circumstances, it would have been illogical for Ele to have told Benic that Respondent "was going to bring me some money," as Ele described it, or was "going to give him some money now," as Benic testified. For, by his own admission, by the time he had spoken to Benic, Ele knew that that was not "going to" happen.

Of course, it could be argued that Ele had been doing no more than advising Benic of the promise that had been made by Respondent's officials. Yet, it seems unlikely that Ele would have withheld from Benic the fact that the initial part of that promise had been broken by Respondent. Certainly, Benic provided Ele ample opportunity to disclose that the preelection portion of the full payment had not been made. For, Benic testified, as set forth above, that he had responded to Ele's description of the promise by pointing out that "if they did that, that's illegal . . . ." (Emphasis supplied.) In the final analysis, what appears to have happened is that, in their haste to fortify the case that Respondent had made an illegal promise that Ele had disseminated to other employees, Ele and Benic lost track of the setting against which their asserted telephone conversation had occurred.

Both the General Counsel and the Charging Party argue that it simply made no sense for Garcia and Perazzo, both vitally concerned that Respondent prevail in the election, to take time out simply to tell an employee something that would tend to lead that employee to vote against Respondent. While a superficially logical argument, it overlooks certain factors. First, neither Garcia nor Perazzo had been involved in the 1979 strike, or in the decision at that time to deny strike benefits to Ele. Second, neither Garcia nor Perazzo had ever met Ele prior to the latter's encounter with Perazzo at the Colton facility during the week prior to the election. Consequently, neither official of Respondent had ever had the opportunity to discuss with Ele the latter's complaint about not having received his strike benefits. Third, in describing their conversation during the week prior to the election, both Ele and Perazzo agreed that the former had said only, in essence, that he had walked the picket line for 13 weeks and had been denied strike benefits. Neither of them testified that Ele had explained fully to Perazzo, at that time, what had caused Respondent to deny strike benefits to Ele. Thus, so far as the record discloses, Perazzo had been unaware that Ele already knew that he had been denied those benefits because his dues had not been paid during the period immediately preceding the strike. Finally, so far as the record discloses, Respondent's records did not show that Ele had been made aware of the reason that Respondent had denied him strike benefits in 1979. In sum, it was hardly illogical for Garcia and Perazzo to assume that Ele was unaware of the true reason that he had been denied strike benefits in 1979 and, based on that assumption, for them to understand how Ele could be mistakenly justified in believing that he had been "cheated."

It is against this background that Garcia decided, having ascertained from Respondent's records why the strike benefits had not been paid to Ele, that, as Garcia testified, "[W]e'd better let this guy know why he didn't receive any benefits, you know, so he'd get that part of it straight. So we went to explain to him why he never received any benefits." It may be Pollyannaish, but hardly uncommon in the course of human affairs, to believe that people will accept even an adverse decision if accorded a logical explanation for it. Here, Perazzo had been confronted with a facially valid complaint by an employee who appeared not to be aware of the reason he had been deprived of a benefit to which he seemingly was entitled. Upon discovering the reason for that deprivation, Garcia and Perazzo sought out Ele to explain that the deprivation had not been wrongful or capricious, but rather, in Respondent's view, had a valid basis: the lack of dues payments on Ele's behalf during the period preceding the strike. In these circumstances, it cannot be said that Garcia and Perazzo acted illogically in considering it possible that, once having heard that explanation, Ele might change his mind about opposing representation by Respondent—or, as Garcia pointed out, at least that he might stop villifying Respondent by saying that he had been "cheated" out of these benefits.

But, if Garcia and Perazzo's visit to Ele was not illogical in the circumstances, it can hardly be said that the scenario portrayed by Ele was a logical one. For, to accept Ele's testimony about the October 15 conversation would be to conclude that Respondent's agents had promised to deliver money to him prior to the election, to secure his support in that election, and then had undermined their own purported effort by failing to return with the partial preelection payment. Both Garcia and Perazzo appeared sufficiently knowledgeable to perceive that any favorable change in Ele's attitude toward Respondent resulting from their promise quickly would be undermined by failure to fulfill their side of the bargain. Accordingly, it appears unlikely that they would have put themselves in the position of promising to perform an act before the election, in return for Ele's support in it, if they had any question concerning their ability to perform that promised act.

The foregoing considerations, among others not all of which are enumerated specifically herein, confirm my impression at the hearing, based on their demeanor, that Ele and the other witnesses called by the General Counsel and the Charging Party were not testifying candidly. Inasmuch as there is no credible evidence that Respondent's officials made any unlawful or objectionable remarks of the nature alleged in the complaint and report on objections, I shall recommend that the complaint be dismissed, that the objection be overruled, and that Respondent be certified as the bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described bargaining unit.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Colton-Wartsila, Inc., is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local Union No. 226, International Brotherhood of Pottery and Allied Workers, Seafarers' International Union of North America, AFL–CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Local Union No. 226, International Brotherhood of Pottery and Allied Workers, Seafarers' International Union of North America, AFL–CIO, has not violated the Act in any manner alleged in the complaint.

Based on the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[7]

It is hereby ordered that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Case 31–RC–4863 be severed from Case 31–CB–3966, that the objection in Case 31–RC–4863 be overruled, and that Local Union No. 226, International Brotherhood of Pottery and Allied Workers, Seafarers' International Union of North America, AFL–CIO, be certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate bargaining unit.

January 27, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On October 21, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Frank H. Itkin issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

FRANK H. ITKIN, Administrative Law Judge: An unfair labor practice charge was filed in this case on December 2, 1980. Amended charges were filed on December 11, 1980, and on January 5, 1981. A complaint issued on January 15, 1981. A hearing was held in Boston, Massachusetts, on August 13, 1981. The General Counsel alleges that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, by refusing to execute a written contract with the Charging Party Union after having "reached full and complete agreement with respect to the terms and conditions of employment" of Respondent's employees in an appropriate bargaining unit. Respondent Employer denies that it has violated the Act as alleged.

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the brief filed by the General Counsel, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

Respondent Home is admittedly an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act. The Union is admittedly a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. On December 17, 1979, the Union was certified as exclusive bargaining agent of the following unit employees:

> All full-time and regular part-time service and maintenance employees including dietary employees, dietary aides, housekeeping employees, ward clerks, nurses aides, orderlies, laundry employees, receptionists, bookkeeper and assistant bookkeeper employed by the Respondent at its Danvers, Massachusetts facility, but excluding all professional employees, technical employees, RN's, LPN's, social workers, occupational therapists, chef, head dietician, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Union Representative Paul Dufault testified that commencing about February 1, 1980, the parties met at approximately 14 bargaining sessions and "reached an agreement" on a collective-bargaining contract on August 25, 1980. The "agreement" was "ratified by the Union's membership" on September 9, 1980. Later, on October 29, 1980, the Union delivered to counsel for Respondent "a contract in final form for signing" and submission to the Massachusetts Rate Setting Commission.[1] The "contract" (G.C. Exh. 2) provides, inter alia:

> APPENDIX A—WAGES
> The individual straight time hourly rate of pay of all employees shall be increased by the following amounts on the following dates:
> Effective July 1, 1980, a general increase of 25¢ per hour;
> Effective November 1, 1980, a general increase of 25¢ per hour;
> Effective July 1, 1981, a general increase of 50¢ per hour.
> New employees shall receive a starting rate of 3.60 per hour and after (sixty (60)) days, 3.85 per hour, and shall receive the general wage increases set forth above.
> The terms set forth in Appendix A—Wages—reflect the settlement reached between the Home and the Union subject to approval of the Massachusetts Rate Setting Commission. Any retroactive monies to July 1, the effective date, shall also be subject to approval of said Commission. It is understood that the Home shall make application for implementation of those wages set forth in Appendix A and that the Union will also apppear before the Commission with the Home in order to secure the wage adjustment agreed to in negotiations and no retroactive monies will be paid until approval of the Commission.

[1] The role of the Commission, insofar as pertinent here, is discussed below.

Dufault further testified that he later "checked" with the Massachusetts Rate Setting Commision in order to ascertain whether the Home had "presented" the "contract" and "application" for "approval." Dufault discovered that "the owner of the Home, Gerald Martin, had failed to sign the particular agreement" and, consequently, "the Rate Setting Commision had failed to rule on the application because of the failure of the Home to sign the agreement." Dufault explained:

> We had to go into state court and get a motion to get the Home to furnish the necessary documentation to the Rate Setting Commission, so that they could comply with what the Commission requested in order to secure some rate adjustments, so that the employees could get a pay raise.

Following this court action: the Home "executed the contract, and qualified it, on May 13, 1981, and submitted it to the Rate Setting Commission." (See G.C. Exh. 3.)[2]

According to Dufault, the Commission thereafter "granted" the Home what amounted to a .24 increase in their daily room rate allowance. The notification from the Commission to the Home, dated July 20, 1981, states (G.C. Exh. 4):

> This is to inform you that the [Commission], after consideration of your petition for an adjustment to the fiscal year 1981 interim rate of payment, took the following action:
> A change in the rate from $36.08 to $36.32 effective 3/1/81.

The Home, in its application to the Commission, had requested "an increase in our interim rate of at least $1.90." See Resp. Exh. 1.[3]

James E. Sullivan, director of the bureau of longterm care in the Massachusetts Rate Setting Commission, explained that his Commission "sets rates of payment to providers of health care, such as hospitals, nursing homes and ambulances," and these "rates will be paid for by the Department of Public Welfare." Director Sullivan, in further explaining how the Commission determined in July 1981 to allow the Home a .24 increase in its rate (see G.C. Exhs. 4 and 5), testified as follows:

> Q. The petition [of the Home] seeks an interim rate increase of $1.90 per patient per day. Is that correct?
> A. Yes.
> Q. Does that figure in the petition, $1.90, accurately reflect the cost of a wage increase pursuant to the contracts, Exhibits #3 and 4, I believe?
> A. I don't know.
> Q. Did the Commission take into consideration the wage increase contemplated by the collective bargaining agreement in computing an interim rate increase based upon the petition, Respondent's Exhibit #1?
> A. No.
> Q. Could you tell us why the Commission did not take into consideration in determining an interim rate increase pursuant to Respondent's Exhibit #1, that's the petition for an interim rate?
>
> A. Yes. The Commission does not take into account raises contemplated, but relies on the fact that the provider [the Home] provide evidence that costs have increased beyond the base year plus the cost adjustment factor.
> Q. So is it fair to say that the Rate Setting Commission or the rate structure in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is predicated on—or rate of reimbursement is predicated on—an actual cost, an expenditure?
> A. Yes.
> Q. The Rate Setting Commission will not consider costs that are anticipatory, i.e., for example in the collective bargaining agreement.
> A. Not in this section of the regulations.
> Q. As it relates to wages?
> A. Yes.
> Q. So is it fair to say that the parties to the collective bargaining agreement can never obtain prior approval to any rate increase provided in a collective bargaining agreement?
> A. That's fair to say.

The director added: "The .24 increase [which the Commission allowed] was based on evidence supplied in June [198] that the June 13th payroll [of the Home] represented an amount that was in fact higher than the base year 1979 plus [a cost adjustment factor of] 12.94 percent." The cost adjustment factor, the director noted, essentially reflects the Consumer Price Index as adjusted to the industry involved here.

In addition, Director Sullivan also testified:

> Q. Do I understand you to say that in Appendix A of General Counsel's Exhibit #2 [if] the wages reflected there were actually implemented, the Commission will allow reimbursement for those rates?
> A. I can't say that. The Commission certainly would consider them, and there would then be evidence that they were being paid. Then that evidence would be taken and measured against whether or not the Commission was already reimbursing those amounts

* * * * *

> Q. On a number of occasions, both by my questions and the court's you've indicated that if the wage increases as contemplated by this collective bargaining agreement were implemented, that the

---

[2] The Employer, in signing the "agreement" (G.C. Exh. 3), noted, inter alia, above his signature that it "is signed" pursuant to the court's order subject to "whatever appellate remedies" are available.

[3] Dufault claimed that since the Home had received a percentage of the "increase" requested, a "percentage of that should go back to the employees as part of wage increase." Dufault, however, was unable to explain what portion of the 24-cent increase allowed by the Commission should be allocated to employee wages and, consequently, how much employee wages should in fact be increased, if at all.

Rate Setting Commission would act and would reimburse. Is that correct?

A. No, I haven't said that.

Q. I guess I misunderstood you.

A. I think I can just clarify that.

Q. Okay, go ahead.

A. If these wages based on these contracts were paid, and the provider submitted evidence of that payment, that it would then be compared with the rate because it is conceivable that a nursing home could enter a contract, increase wages, pay them, and already be reimbursed within the rate. In fact, it is almost inevitable that in some portion, that would occur.

JUDGE ITKIN: In other words, what you're saying is that 24 cents increase already allowed may cover part of the total $1.90 if that base figure is correct.

THE WITNESS: That is correct.

* * * * *

Q. Can you here today speak on behalf of the Commission with regard to whether or not an increase would be granted to cover the increased costs if the wage increases covered by the collective bargaining agreement were implemented?

A. I can speak on behalf of the Commission, but I couldn't answer that in a yes or a no.[4]

Discussion

It is settled law that "when an oral agreement is reached as to the terms of a collective-bargaining contract, each party is obligated, at the request of the other, to execute that contract when reduced to writing, and failure or refusal to do so constitutes an unfair labor practice." Oil Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union and its Local 7-507 (Capitol Packing Company), 212 NLRB 98, 108 (1974). It is also settled law that, where there is "no meeting of the minds" as to essential terms of an agreement which may be traced to "ambiguity for which neither party is to blame," there is in effect no "contract" which the parties can be directed to execute. Capitol Packaging Company, supra, 212 NLRB at 107-108, quoting from Reinstatement Contracts, §501 (1932). In sum, as the Restatement notes:

> When, however, misunderstandings may be traced to ambiguity for which neither party is to blame, or for which both parties are equally to blame, and the parties differ in their understanding, their seeming agreement will create no contract. [Id. at 108.]

Also see B. F. Goodrich Chemical Co., etc., 232 NLRB 399, 401-401 (1977), where the Administrative Law Judge, in dismissing a complaint, noted, with Board approval, "What does emerge in my opinion is a mutual misunderstanding concerning inclusion of the qualifying language at issue here, for which misunderstanding neither party is at fault. . . . I accordingly conclude that Respondent did not violate the Act by refusing to execute" the document.

The evidence of record here, summarized supra, is essentially undisputed. The parties, after some 14 bargaining sessions, arrived at what they believed to be a full and complete "agreement." However, with respect to that portion of the "agreement" pertaining to "wages," the parties expressly made this provision "subject to approval of the Massachusetts Rate Setting Commission," including "any retroactive monies," stating further that "no retroactive monies will be paid until approval of the Commission." Thus, commission approval was to be a condition precedent to the implementation of the wage provision. And, as Director Sullivan credibly explained, his Commission will not approve rate increases based on a "contemplated. . . . collective bargaining agreement"; the Commission will only reimburse for an "actual cost or expenditure"; and, therefore, it is "fair to say that the parties to the collective bargaining agreement can never obtain prior approval to any rate increase provided in a collective bargaining agreement." Accordingly, as a consequence of this mistake or misunderstanding, an essential portion of this "agreement" pertaining to wages cannot be implemented.

Neither party has been shown here to be at fault or to blame for this mistake or misunderstanding. There is therefore no meeting of the minds as to an essential contractual provision. Moreover, there is no demonstrated basis on which I can rely in correcting this mistake or misunderstanding so as to reflect the agreement of the parties. Implementation of the wage provisions was expressly made "subject to approval" by the Commission. To implement this contract so as to render it operative and meaningful, I would be required to rewrite the agreement, changing the condition precedent to a condition subsequent, directing payment of the wage increases, and providing for reimbursement to the Employer in the event the Commission fails to grant approval commensurate with the wage increases. I perceive this to be beyond my authority under the Act and certainly beyond the boundaries of this complaint. Likewise, I cannot sever the wage provisions from the entire "agreement" and require signing what remains. That too is contrary to the seeming agreement of the parties.

In sum, the General Counsel has failed to sustain his burden of proof here and the complaint is dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce as alleged.

2. Charging Party Union is a labor organization as alleged.

3. The General Counsel has failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act as alleged.

4. The complaint will therefore be dismissed in its entirety.

[4] Pelino Campea, associated with Regional Management Resources, Inc., testified, on behalf of the Home, that the "wage costs" for the Home between 1979 and 1980 "rose higher than the 12.94 wage adjustment allowed by the Rate Setting Commission."

ORDER[5]

I recommend that the complaint herein be dismissed in its entirety.

---

[5] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

University of Southern California and California Teamsters Public, Professional & Medical Employees Union Local 911, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America. Case 31–CA–11272

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on June 26, 1981, by California Teamsters Public, Professional & Medical Employees Union Local 911, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, herein called the Union, and duly served on University of Southern California, herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 31, issued a complaint on July 24, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and the complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that on May 22, 1981, following a Board election in Case 31–RC–4721, the Union was duly certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate;[1] and that, commencing on or about June 10, 1981, and at all times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative, although the Union has requested and is requesting it to do so. On August 3, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint.

On September 14, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on September 24, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its opposition to the Motion for Summary Judgment, as in its answer to the complaint, Respondent contends that it is not obligated to bargain with the Union because the certification issued to the Union in Case 31–RC–4721 is invalid by reason that the Board erroneously denied Respondent's request to set aside the election and order a new election. The General Counsel submits that Respondent's contention should be discounted as an attempt to relitigate issues which were or could have been disposed of by the Board in the prior representation proceeding. We agree.

A review of the entire record, including that in Case 31–RC–4721, reveals that on April 16, 1980, the Regional Director for Region 31 approved a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election executed by the Union and Respondent. Pursuant to this, a secret-ballot election was held on June 6, 1980, which resulted in a tally of 20 votes for, and 19 against, the Union, with 1 determinative challenged ballot. Following the election, the parties signed an agreement stipulating that the employee who had cast the challenged ballot was ineligible to vote. In view of this agreement, the parties received a corrected tally of ballots.

On June 13, 1980, Respondent, by letter, filed with the Regional Director six timely objections to conduct affecting the results of the election. The Regional Director issued his Report on Objections on July 31, 1980, recommending that all six objections be overruled without a hearing. Thereafter, Respondent filed timely exceptions to the Regional Director's recommendations regarding its Objections 1 through 5.

On October 21, 1980, the Board issued its Decision and Direction, which adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations, except that it remanded for hearing the issues raised by Respondent's Objection 5. On November 6, 1980, Respondent filed an untimely motion for reconsideration of the Board's Decision. On November 7, 1980, the Board denied Respondent's motion as untimely.[2]

[1] Official notice is taken of the record in the representation proceeding, Case 31–RC–4721, as the term "record" is defined in Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended. See LTV Electrosystems, Inc., 166 NLRB 938 (1967), enfd. 388 F.2d 683 (4th Cir. 1968); Golden Age Beverage Co., 167 NLRB 151 (1967), enfd. 415 F.2d 26 (5th Cir. 1969); Intertype Co. v. Penello, 269 F.Supp. 573 (D.C.Va. 1967); Follett Corp., 164 NLRB 378 (1967), enfd. 397 F.2d 91 (7th Cir. 1968); Sec. 9(d) of the NLRA, as amended.

[2] In our Decision and Direction, issued on October 21, 1980, we stated:

On November 14, 1980, the Regional Director issued a notice of hearing on objection. Thereafter, a hearing regarding Respondent's Objection 5 was held on December 10 and 11, 1980. On February 26, 1981, the Hearing Officer issued a report, recommending that Respondent's objection be overruled and that a certification of representative be issued. The Hearing Officer's findings and recommendations were adopted by the Board on May 22, 1981, when it issued its Decision and Certification of Representative, certifying the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

Thereafter, the Union, by letter dated May 26, 1981, requested that Respondent meet and confer with it for the purposes of collective bargaining. Respondent, by letter dated June 10, 1981, acknowledged receipt of the Union's letter and stated it refused to recognize and bargain collectively with the Union because it considered the Union's certification to be invalid.

In its answer, and in its response to the Notice To Show Cause, Respondent alleges four affirmative defenses. As a first affirmative defense, it alleges that the Regional Director, in his Report on Objections, improperly recommended that each of said objections be overruled and that a certification of representative be issued. As a second affirmative defense, Respondent alleges that the Board erroneously sustained the Regional Director's recommendations as to Objections 2, 3, and 4 and that it erroneously failed to respond to Respondent's exception to the Regional Director's recommendation that Objection 1 be overruled. As a third affirmative defense, Respondent alleges that the Hearing Officer, in her Report on Objections and Recommendations, improperly recommended that Respondent's Objection 5 be overruled and that a certification of representative be issued to the Union. As a fourth affirmative defense, Respondent alleges that the Board erroneously adopted the Hearing Officer's findings and recommendations and improperly issued a certification of representative to the Union.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[3]

All issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is a California corporation, maintaining its principal place of business in Los Angeles, California, where it is now and continuously has been engaged in the operation of a nonprofit university. Its annual gross revenues exceed $1 million. Annually, it purchases and receives goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 from sellers or suppliers located within the State of California, which sellers or suppliers receive such goods in substantially the same form directly from outside the State of California.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

California Teamsters Public, Professional and Medical Employees Union Local 911, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, and hereby adopts the Regional Director's findings and recommendations, except that it finds that substantial issues of fact and law have been raised regarding the conduct described in Objection 5, which can best be resolved after a hearing.

Thus, we made it clear that Respondent's Objections 1 through 4 and 6 had been overruled. However, since we wanted to clarify our holding as to Objections 2, 3, and 4, we added a footnote that specifically addressed each of these.

Respondent's motion for reconsideration alleged that the Board failed to address its exception to the Regional Director's recommendation as to Objection 1. We denied this motion as untimely. However, even if it had been timely filed we would have denied it. Merely because we did not specifically address Objection 1 in a footnote does not mean that we failed to rule on it. In our Decision and Direction we considered Objection 1 and the Regional Director's disposition of it, and, after reviewing the record in light of the exceptions and brief, adopted his recommendation that it be overruled.

[3] See Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. N.L.R.B., 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941); Rules and Regulations of the Board, Secs. 102.67(f) and 102.69(c).

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All parking lot attendants and utility attendants employed by Respondent at its University Park and Health Sciences campuses; excluding office clerical employees, janitors, guards, professional employees, all other employees and supervisors as defined in the Act, as amended.

2. The certification

On June 6, 1980, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 31, designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on May 22, 1981, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on or about May 26, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit. Commencing on or about June 10, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since June 10, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817; Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. University of Southern California is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. California Teamsters Public, Professional & Medical Employees Union Local 911, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All parking lot attendants and utility attendants employed by Respondent at its University Park and Health Sciences campuses; excluding office clerical employees, janitors, guards, professional employees, all other employees and supervisors as defined in the Act, as amended, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since May 2, 1981, the above-named labor organization has been and now is the certified and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing on or about June 10, 1981, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of Respondent in the appropriate unit, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, University of Southern California, Los Angeles, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with California Teamsters Public, Professional and Medical Employees Union Local 911, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All parking lot attendants and utility attendants employed by Respondent at its University Park and Health Sciences campuses; excluding office clerical employees, janitors, guards, professional employees, all other employees and supervisors as defined in the Act, as amended.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its University Park and Health Sciences campuses copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Repondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 31, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with California Teamsters Public, Professional & Medical Employees Union Local 911, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with the above-named Union, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All parking lot attendants and utility attendants employed by us at our University Park

January 28, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On February 23, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Sidney J. Barban issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in response.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions [2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, District #1, Pacific Coast District, Marine Engineers Beneficial Association, Washington, D.C., its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against our employees because they join, support, or engage in activities on behalf of a union seeking to represent our employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge or take other reprisals against our employees because they join, support, or engage in activities on behalf of a union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL offer Doris G. Hardesty and Theodore A. Kane, Jr., immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and benefits they may have suffered by reason of their discharges, with interest.

DISTRICT #1, PACIFIC COAST DISTRICT, MARINE ENGINEERS BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

SIDNEY J. BARBAN, Administrative Law Judge: This matter was heard at Washington, D.C., on June 16, 17, 18, and 19, 1980, upon a complaint in Case 5-CA-11688-2 issued on January 21, 1980 (based on a charge filed November 19, 1979), and a complaint in Case 5-CA-11688 issued on March 26, 1980 (based on charges filed on November 14, 1979, and December 28, 1979), consolidated by an order issued on May 23, 1980. The complaint alleges that the above-named Respondent (herein

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

We agree with the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that the November 13, 1979, discharge of Doris Hardesty violated Sec. 8(a)(3), and we agree with his rejection of Respondent's argument that its president, Jesse Calhoon, had decided to discharge Doris Hardesty on November 6, 1979, before he learned of Hardesty's union activities, because Joseph Miller had told Calhoon he would no longer work with Hardesty. Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, however, we find that the record is not fully developed on Miller's state of mind on November 6 regarding Hardesty's work and his alleged hope for its improvement. Nonetheless, we find that the record does establish that Miller did not tell Calhoon on November 6 that he thought Hardesty should be discharged, and that Miller did not write a memorandum recommending Hardesty's discharge until November 9.

[2] In affirming the conclusion that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) when it discharged Doris Hardesty, we do not rely on the Administrative Law Judge's statement that the pretextual nature of the reasons for Hardesty's discharge which Respondent presented during the course of this proceeding follows from a determination of Respondent's real motive for the discharge. Nor do we rely on his analysis of the test in cases involving allegedly discriminatory discharges which we established in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). However, we also do not interpret the Administrative Law Judge's statement concerning Respondent's real motive for Hardesty's discharge to mean that he did not fully analyze the record in this proceeding. Rather, we find that the record as a whole supports the Administrative Law Judge's factual findings and his conclusion that Hardesty was unlawfully discharged, particularly in view of Respondent's direct statements to her when she was discharged concerning her attempts to organize Respondent's employees, and the absence of prior complaints to her about her work.

Member Jenkins would find any application of the burden of proof and sufficiency of rebuttal test set forth in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., supra, unnecessary in this case because the reasons set forth by Respondent for Hardesty's discharge have been found to be pretextual. Also, Member Jenkins notes that he would award interest on any backpay owed on the basis of his position set out in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

MEBA) violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (herein the Act), by discharging Doris G. Hardesty and Theodore A. Kane, Jr., because of their activities on behalf of Office and Professional Employees International Union, Local No. 2 (herein OPEIU), and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by questioning employees concerning activities on behalf of OPEIU, and by threatening employees with reprisals because of support of and assistance to that Union. The answers to the complaints deny commission of the unfair labor practices alleged.

Upon the entire record in this case, from observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent,[1] I make the following:

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

MEBA, an unincorporated association, which is a labor organization with offices in Washington, D.C., engaged in representing licensed marine engineers and other licensed marine officers in the maritime industry, during a recent annual period received dues payments from its members in the maritime industry in excess of $3 million and received at its offices in Washington, D.C., during this period products valued in excess of $2,000 from points outside the District of Columbia.

It is admitted, and I find, that MEBA is an employer as defined in Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce and operations affecting commerce as defined in Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that OPEIU is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ISSUES

As has been noted, the General Counsel asserts that MEBA, in addition to committing certain alleged violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, discharged Doris Hardesty and Theodore Kane because of their activities on behalf of OPEIU. Respondent denies this and, in addition, contends that Hardesty and Kane were not employees protected by the Act, asserting that Hardesty should be classified as managerial, and Kane as a managerial trainee. Respondent further argues that, even if Hardesty may be considered as an employee under the Act, she was discharged because of her job performance. The General Counsel contests these contentions.

III. THE FACTS

The following findings of fact are based on a consideration of the record as a whole. No attempt has been made to note every apparent or nonapparent conflict in the evidence. Testimony in the record which is inconsistent with findings made herein is not credited on the basis of my evaluation of the reliability of the witnesses, and the entire record.

A. MEBA Headquarters Organization

MEBA's main office is in Washington, D.C., as has been noted. The office is headed by Jesse M. Calhoon, president of MEBA. His administrative assistant is William Devine. The MEBA vice president in this office is Leon Shapiro. MEBA controller is Francis A. Laurito, who also exercises some of the functions of a personnel director. Also employed in the Washington office until January 1979 was Fred Schamann, with the title of director of research and development, whose position will be considered in more detail hereinafter. Joseph S. Miller, who has no regular or assigned office space in the MEBA headquarters, has represented MEBA, as one of several clients, for many years as a lobbyist. He seems to report for the most part to Calhoon.

The headquarters staff seems very loosely structured. There appear to be no written tables of organization and no written job classifications containing specific job content. When an issue was raised as to the unequal application of MEBA job severance policy to two employees, MEBA was unable to find any written statement of that policy.[2]

B. Kane's Alleged Managerial Status

MEBA President Calhoon testified that Kane was employed with the expectation that after 3 years of training he would take over the functions then being performed by Fred Schamann, who then, as has been noted, bore the title of director of research and development. It thus becomes necessary to consider at the outset Schamann's qualifications and functions.

1. Fred Schamann

Schamann, beginning about the age of 17 (he was apparently about 49 at the time of the hearing), seems to have had extensive experience in the maritime industry. When Calhoon first became aware of him, Schamann was involved in a training program conducted by Admiral Rickover to prepare engineers for duty aboard nuclear-powered surface vessels. Though originally scheduled for a shorter period, this training eventually took 3 years. According to Calhoon, Schamann was very strong in mathematics and, in Calhoon's opinion, was practically a nuclear physicist when he completed this program.

About this time, Calhoon concluded that MEBA was in need of someone who could perform some complicated cost analyses (which Calhoon referred to as "creating an economic module") apparently then required in collective bargaining for MEBA contracts, a person who also could do research and analysis of the impact of new technological changes upon the maritime industry, and represent MEBA in dealing with certain international organizations.

[1] On August 19, 1980, I received a request from counsel for MEBA for permission to file an attached reply to the General Counsel's brief. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed a motion to strike Respondent's request, which motion is itself a rebuttal to Respondent's requested reply brief. I have read all of these documents, and they contain nothing that I would not have derived from the record and the original briefs. I see no necessity to pass upon Respondent's request or the General Counsel's motion. In October, Respondent also called my attention to the Board's recent Decision in Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

[2] Although Calhoon insisted that MEBA is as rigidly structured as a Navy ship, Miller, who had represented MEBA for years, stated (with respect to his "loose direction" of Hardesty, considered hereinafter), "MEBA is very loosely structured, and very successfully so, I think."

Notwithstanding Schamann's qualifications, Calhoon states that he expected that it would take Schamann 3 additional years' training for the position and therefore hired Schamann as a management trainee. He had Schamann take courses in public speaking and international law. At the end of a 3-year period, Schamann assumed the newly created title of director of research and development. In addition to the tasks for which Schamann was specifically employed, or in conjunction with them, Calhoon emphasized in his testimony, Schamann also participated in collective bargaining for MEBA and its affiliates. Schamann received a salary of $54,000.

During the summer of 1978, Calhoon had reason to believe that Schamann would be leaving MEBA headquarters, probably in January 1979, to assume another post with the union, for which Calhoon had sponsored him, and about this time, Calhoon states he began looking for a replacement for Schamann.

2. Kane's qualifications

Calhoon became aware of Kane through a resume of Kane's qualifications that he received. This showed that Kane had attended high school in Indiana, worked as a patternmaker and equipment operator for a firm in Indiana, during which time he held various local union offices, including that of president of Local 10 of the Molders Union, that he had a degree in political science and speech communication from Indiana State University, and had successfully completed certain labor-oriented courses at the University of Wisconsin and in the vicinity of Washington, D.C. In 1977, Kane became employed as a legislative intern with the AFL-CIO in Washington. Thereafter, though not shown on the resume, Kane was temporarily employed by AFSCME, AFL-CIO, in Washington.

In addition, as known to Calhoon as a result of the interview discussed below, Kane had also participated in the negotiation of one collective-bargaining agreement while an officer of the Molders Local and had some limited experience with an organizing campaign. Kane had no prior experience with ships or the maritime industry.

3. The interview with Calhoon

Calhoon states that, in the course of seeking a replacement for Schamann, he interviewed Kane, among others.[3] Calhoon further testified that at this interview he went through "the entire litany of what the Research and Development Director was" and "what the training program would be," asserting that he told Kane that the training program would be approximately 3 years (or in excess of 3 years), initially under Schamann, who would instruct Kane in the construction and operation of economic modules and the costing out of contracts, that at this meeting he discussed Kane's deficiency in mathematics and asserts that evaluation of Kane's performance in negotiations of economic modules with management in 1980 for the 1981 negotiations of the offshore contracts would be critical to his retention on the job. Calhoon further states that he told Kane that "I would be using him as a troubleshooter, and in small negotiations, he would be representing the Union in the negotiations . . . and . . . if he could accomplish the mathematical parts, then I would put him in training in the international arena, and this would still be training under Fred Schamann [who] would stay with him until he was capable . . . to take over representation of MEBA in the international area."[4]

Kane testified that during this interview Calhoon did not specify what his duties would be, but advised that he would act as an aide to Calhoon, and do whatever he assigned, that they talked about Kane's union background and experience, his knowledge of organizing and participation in collective bargaining. In the course of discussing collective bargaining, Kane believes that his lack of proficiency in math came up, and that Calhoon may have told him that he would need specific training before he could cost out contracts on his own, and may well have said that costing out contracts was a most important aspect in the negotiation of MEBA contracts. However, Kane denied that he ever received any instructions with regard to any training program for management employees that MEBA had or that he was ever advised that he was being placed in any kind of training program.[5] Kane recalled no conversation during this interview about the job of director of research and development or Fred Schamann, though after he was employed, he was told to learn some of the things that Schamann was doing.[6]

To the extent material to this case, I am convinced that Kane's recollection of this interview is more reliable than Calhoon's. Certainly Kane's actual experience was that of an aide doing whatever Calhoon needed to be done, and Kane's asserted training appears to have been more casual and haphazard than organized or formal. Though Calhoon seems to assert that he expected Kane's indoctrination to be largely under the tutelage of Schamann, it is clear that Calhoon could not have anticipated that Schamann would be able to work closely with Kane for more than about 4 or 4-1/2 months out of the 3 years Calhoon asserted Kane would be in training, for Schamann was expected to leave in January 1979. As it turned out, because Calhoon assigned Kane to a project in Florida (discussed hereinafter) which took from November 1978 to July 1979, Kane and Schamann were in the same office together for only about 2 months. Though Calhoon asserts that he considered sending Kane to a school to improve his math, this was not done.

[3] Respondent asserts that there were two interviews with Kane, the first being aborted when it was discovered that Kane then had a job with another AFL-CIO union, and a second, substantive interview occurring later. Kane referred to only one interview, occurring about a week and a half before he was hired on September 18, 1978. I am satisfied that this is the same occasion which Respondent contends was the second interview.

[4] After Kane was hired, Calhoon told Kane that he had decided to assign certain duties formerly taken care of by Schamann in "the international area" to another agent. There is no evidence of any other discussion of this function with Kane or of any effort to train Kane for this function.

[5] After he was employed, Kane was given a desk between two secretaries in the hall outside Schamann's office and was told by Calhoon's administrative aide, William Devine, that he was "to train under" Schamann during the time the latter remained in Washington.

[6] Kane recalled that in talking to Calhoon about Schamann at a congressional reception, in late October, Calhoon said that he expected some "things out of [Kane]: One was to become an economist, be able to run a union meeting and possibly handle preparations for negotiations." Kane states that he "hoped" to be promoted to Schamann's position after Schamann left.

4. Kane's employment

Kane was hired on September 18, 1978, at a salary of $22,500. He was first assigned to work with Schamann, who gave him certain bargaining agreements to compute labor cost analyses, Schamann correcting the errors that Kane made in these exercises. Also at Schamann's direction, Kane contacted other maritime unions and management to secure bargaining contracts. Kane took wage tables from these contracts and assembled them for Schamann's use. Kane also did some contract analyses.

In November 1978, Calhoon requested Kane to go to Florida to assist an affiliate of MEBA, Florida Association of Professional Employees (herein FAPE), in collective bargaining with the Boeing Company.[7] He was told to report to Calhoon weekly and whenever he returned to Washington. Kane was given a first class air ticket to travel to Florida. Controller Laurito says this is a management privilege at MEBA.[8] At first, Laurito gave Kane travel advances for his trips to Florida, but in late January or early February 1979, as this assignment continued, assigned Kane a credit card, instead of cash advances, another management privilege, according to Laurito. Kane regularly turned in expense reports. At Devine's suggestion, Kane also began turning in certain authorization forms, showing his projected travel and purpose, for Calhoon's advance approval.

Kane successfully negotiated a bargaining agreement for FAPE, which that organization approved and signed. During the course of this activity, another union sought to raid FAPE. Calhoon suggested the assistance of an attorney. Kane suggested that FAPE file a petition with the National Labor Relations Board and appeared on its behalf at a Board proceeding. Kane assisted FAPE during the election campaign which FAPE won. Kane apparently assisted FAPE in securing a contract for these employees.[9] Calhoon expressed himself as pleased with Kane's performance.

During this period, after Schamann left, Kane was moved from his desk in the hall into Schamann's office, which was one of the largest on the floor, and given the title which Schamann had held. His salary, however, remained the same.

In the early summer of 1979, Calhoon requested Kane to investigate a member's inquiry concerning a certain chemical being used in boiler water aboard ships. Kane checked with congressional offices, Government agencies concerned with health and safety, and the Library of Congress concerning the questioned chemical and he visited some ships. He concluded that the substance was very dangerous and wrote an article on the subject which was published in the MEBA house organ.

At the request of an executive vice president of MEBA, Kane researched and did a comparison of two ships for a hearing in which the vice president was to participate.

Before his retirement, MEBA Agent Winstock, whose office was in New York, negotiated Government contracts and handled grievances under the Government contracts from their inception to the national level. It was decided after his retirement to have those grievances handled by local agents to the district level and by headquarters personnel from that point to the national level. Kane was advised that he was expected eventually to take care of the Government contracts, including participation in the negotiating of those contracts and processing grievances under the Government contracts from the district level. Pursuant to these instructions, Kane began to establish a liaison with the Army Corps of Engineers and others who represented the Government, as well as local MEBA agents handling these grievances. Devine referred two grievances under the Government contracts to Kane. He investigated them and contacted the two grievants, each of whom decided to drop his grievance, which Kane reported to Devine. Kane handled no other grievances.

In October 1979, Kane was instructed to attend a meeting of trustees of the MEBA pension plan in the expectation that this would assist him in his duties in connection with the negotiation of the MEBA offshore agreement. He attended, but did not participate.

During the period of his employment, Kane did not attend any meetings (except possibly the trustees' meeting mentioned above) which were devoted to discussion of MEBA policies and did not make any contribution affecting any such policies so far as the record shows.

Kane was discharged on November 9, 1979, under circumstances discussed hereinafter.

C. Hardesty's Employment and Alleged Status

Doris Hardesty and MEBA President Calhoon had known one another for several years prior to 1978, when Calhoon assisted Hardesty in securing employment with the Joint Maritime Congress, where she received a salary of $35,000 for work as a legislative representative. Hardesty was not happy with her assignment at the Joint Maritime Congress, desiring to work more with political matters, and apparently the executive director of that organization, David Leff, was not satisfied with her work. When Hardesty approached Calhoon in August 1979[10] for employment with MEBA, according to Leff, he told Calhoon that Hardesty was an unsatisfactory employee who would not follow orders and was trying to organize employees of the Joint Maritime Congress and MEBA. Leff says that Calhoon replied that perhaps Hardesty needed a firmer hand than she was receiving at the Joint Maritime Congress.

[7] Another MEBA agent, Bernie Winstock, apparently located in the New York office, had been assigned to service FAPE, and also to handle matters concerning bargaining agreements between MEBA and certain Federal Government agencies (referred to as Government contracts). Winstock had recently retired.

[8] Kane refers to the fact that MEBA members travel first class. I am aware of maritime contracts that provide that, when crewmembers are paid off their ship away from home, they must be given first class air fare to their home port.

[9] In the course of this campaign, Kane prepared written material for FAPE (one pamphlet printed at MEBA expense with Calhoon's approval), and on occasion took members to dinner, the cost of which was paid in some instances by FAPE, in other instances by MEBA.

[10] All dates hereinafter are in 1979, unless otherwise noted.

At the time Hardesty was employed by Calhoon in late August, at the same salary which she had received at the Joint Maritime Congress, MEBA transferred a legislative representative (lobbyist) on its staff to the Joint Maritime Congress. According to Hardesty, whose testimony I credit, when Calhoon hired her, she was told that her work with MEBA would encompass (1) legislative activity, "which meant attending hearings before congressional committees on maritime matters, analyzing proposed legislation that would affect [the union], preparing fact sheets on such legislation, and I was working on testimony for Mr. Calhoon on a maritime matter when I was fired"; (2) political issues, in which she "was to analyze the voting record of members of Congress . . . related to maritime affairs, to try to keep a handle on what was happening in the presidential primary . . . and report to Mr. Calhoon on political matters . . . ."; (3) "also to work on development of coalition type relationships with other unions and public service organizations."[11] The only designation of her job to the public (as shown on her business cards) was "Headquarters Staff."

Shortly after Hardesty was hired, she was summoned to a meeting in Calhoon's office with the MEBA president and Joseph Miller, MEBA's professional lobbyist. Calhoon there informed her that, with respect to her duties as a legislative representative, she was to report to Miller and be under his direct supervision.[12] Calhoon explained that he thought she would be able to learn much from Miller. The record as a whole makes it clear that Miller quickly developed an antipathy to Hardesty, which she probably reciprocated, though it is indicated that she was hopeful that the relationship between them would improve. Their difficulty in communicating with one another was compounded by the fact that Miller visited MEBA headquarters infrequently and Hardesty had some difficulty in reaching him by telephone.

1. The daily worksheets

Within a few days after the meeting in Calhoon's office, Miller "suggested" to Hardesty that she begin to keep daily records of all of her activities, which he would like to see. Though originally admittedly a "suggestion," Miller, not having received any daily worksheets by September 11, sent Hardesty a memo asserting: "Now, I want it understood that this is an instruction. Henceforth, I will expect daily worksheets and would appreciate your written confirmation of this instruction." On the next day, September 12, Hardesty sent Miller a memo stating that the daily work records were being typed.

In the worksheets thereafter submitted to Miller (with copies to Calhoon) Hardesty included a number of purely personal activities, to which Miller strenuously objected.[13] However, it is noted that Miller, himself, in addition to verbally telling Hardesty to keep a "blow by blow" account of her daily activities, showed her examples of daily worksheets which he kept for his own purposes in which he dutifully recorded his own personal activities (e.g., breakfast with family; watching television)[14] in making day-to-day notations.

There is no question but that Hardesty thought that the requirement that she keep detailed daily records of her activities during the workday was frivolous and a waste of her time.[15] After submitting worksheets for the period from September 4 through 13, although Miller continued to insist on daily reports, Hardesty did not submit any further daily worksheets.

2. Hardesty's work

Hardesty performed several assignments in political areas directly for Calhoon,[16] in which Miller was not involved. One such project was a trip Hardesty made to Florida with Calhoon's approval to check on the activities of one of the candidates in the Presidential primary there. Calhoon told Hardesty that she should go, observe, "keep [her] mouth shut," and report back to him. Upon her return she was reimbursed by MEBA for her expenses.

Toward the end of her tenure with MEBA, Hardesty volunteered to draft testimony for Calhoon to give on legislation in which he was interested. Hardesty was working on this at the time she was discharged. Though Calhoon now complains that this assignment was not finished, it does not appear that he ever complained to Hardesty before she was discharged that this project had not been completed.

On legislative matters, Miller's instructions to Hardesty generally were to make and enlarge her contacts with the Congress, particularly with staff members who might be helpful in keeping her informed as to legislation important to MEBA, to attend hearings of committees involved with maritime matters, and generally to watch legislation of interest to MEBA. Miller also instructed Hardesty to watch certain specific legislation. The record contains several memos from Hardesty to Miller concerning these matters and other items that Hardesty thought were of significance.[17]

[11] Though Calhoon indicated that Hardesty was hired only as a lobbyist, it is clear that Hardesty did, in fact, perform in broader areas. Indeed, it would be somewhat surprising that Calhoon would have "swapped" a lobbyist already employed unless he expected Hardesty could provide a broader range of services.

[12] I do not credit the testimony, particularly that of Miller, that Miller was to supervise Hardesty's activities other than in the legislative area.

[13] Examples of these include Hardesty's activities during the day on behalf of her children, household problems, the time at which she made coffee in the office, took a short walk, and took a train home at the end of the day.

[14] When faced with this, Miller sought to explain these personal notations away as occurring only on weekends, asserting that such notations do not appear during the regular workweek. The record shows otherwise. I was not impressed with Miller's candor as a witness and do not credit his testimony except as consistent with findings made herein.

[15] In a memo, to Hardesty, dated September 17, Miller not only objected to the personal references in the daily worksheets she submitted, but also advised that he wanted more detail, e.g., not only who she talked to, but what they talked about.

[16] Calhoon sought to disassociate himself from what Hardesty accomplished, on the basis that these matters were not assigned, but matters for which Hardesty volunteered. Calhoon says that he now "sees" that Hardesty only performed tasks for which she volunteered. However, the record is convincing that Calhoon either approved, or did not object to, the projects for which Hardesty assertedly volunteered. Lastly, I find no assignment made by Calhoon—for which Hardesty did not volunteer—which Hardesty did not perform. There is no showing that Calhoon criticized Hardesty for any such asserted failure.

One specific assignment made by Miller is of particular significance. About the same time that Miller suggested to Hardesty that she keep daily records of her activities, she was also assigned to a task which may be referred to as the Kings Point project. This involved a series of articles recently published by The Philadelphia Inquirer critical of the Kings Point Merchant Marine Academy. These articles tended to support a position espoused by MEBA President Calhoon, which position had been undermined by other reports in a television investigative news series. Miller and Calhoon agreed that it would be advisable to have the Inquirer articles inserted in the Congressional Record by a member of Congress who agreed with Calhoon's position. Hardesty was to draft introductory material to be used by the member of Congress, referred to as "lead-ins."

On September 11, the same day Miller sent Hardesty the memo instructing her to submit daily worksheets, he sent her a second memo, stating that "nothing, to my knowledge, has been done on [the Kings Point project]," which he asserts Hardesty was informed was "a first priority project." Miller instructed, "Please report immediately to me, in writing, as to your progress." On September 12, Hardesty replied that she was working on the Kings Point project. On September 17, in the same memo in which Miller criticized Hardesty's worksheets, he also sharply noted that the worksheets did not indicate that she was working on the Kings Point project. (In her testimony Hardesty indicated that some of the congressional contacts shown on the worksheets related to this project.) Attached to a memo dated September 14, Hardesty submitted to Miller and Calhoon her "preliminary drafts" of the Kings Point lead-ins.[18]

3. Miller's complaints to Calhoon

Miller testified that he considered Hardesty's failure to submit proper daily worksheets "appalling" insubordination. On November 6, at a luncheon with Calhoon, Miller asserts that he told Calhoon that Hardesty's "performance" had been "thoroughly unsatisfactory so far as I was concerned; that I felt completely unable to reach Mrs. Hardesty and communicate with her and that she had by this time indicated no willingness whatever to work under my supervision." Miller says that Calhoon replied, "that's been her M.O. in everything she's been involved with, ever since she's been in town, and I guess we've failed, too."[19] Of some significance, as noted hereinafter, Calhoon did not ask Miller at this time to put his recommendation as to Hardesty in writing, until, as Miller put it, "after our luncheon and Mr. Calhoon had had some time to think on it."[20]

During this luncheon, Calhoon contends Miller took the position that Calhoon had to get rid of Hardesty or get rid of him. Miller, however, stated that he was still, at that time, willing "to give her all the benefit of the doubt . . . something might happen . . . that she might be salvageable. Because . . . I fervently hoped that she'd turn out well . . . ."

Nothing further seems to have occurred with respect to Hardesty until November 9, the day that Calhoon discovered that Kane and Hardesty were attempting to secure authorization cards for union representation from staff employees, as discussed hereinafter. Miller asserts that during a conversation with Calhoon, during the morning of November 9, "the matter of Mrs. Hardesty was discussed . . . . It was a rather cryptic conversation, as I recall that I suggested to Mr. Calhoon that I would give him a memorandum on the subject, and he thought—he told me to go ahead with it."[21] That afternoon Miller went to the MEBA office where he dictated a memo recommending Hardesty's discharge, as discussed hereinafter.

D. The Discharges

1. The attempt to organize MEBA employees

A clerical in the MEBA office, Cheryl Priest, was assigned to act as secretary for both Hardesty and Kane. On November 8, Hardesty discovered that Priest had been discharged by Laurito, without consultation with her or, apparently, Kane. She sought to protest on Priest's behalf to Calhoon and Laurito, without success. A number of the clerical employees spoke to Hardesty about the distress and anxiety that Priest's discharge was causing the clericals. When the clericals began talking about unionization, Hardesty suggested that they meet after office hours at a nearby place. Hardesty secured authorization cards from the AFL–CIO and, at the meeting that evening, clericals signed cards authorizing the AFL–CIO, or a designated affiliated union, to represent them (apparently Hardesty expected this to be OPEIU). Kane and Hardesty signed authorizations also.

[17] In the course of her activities, Hardesty took various persons to lunch at restaurants in Washington. She was reimbursed by MEBA for these expenses. Hardesty understood that it was part of her duties to promote the legislative goals and policies set by MEBA officers, in her contacts with "people on the Hill."

[18] Miller testified that Hardesty did not complete any assignments that he gave her. However, none of these deficiencies are specifically referred to, except the Kings Point project. So far as the record shows this is the only assignment of which Miller complained to Hardesty (unless the worksheets be considered an assignment). Miller admittedly received the Kings Point work submitted by Hardesty, but now says it was unsatisfactory. However, this was never communicated to Hardesty before she was discharged.

[19] On cross-examination, Miller volunteered that, in mid-October, he had made a similar complaint to Calhoon, stating at that time that he "had to wash his hands of her because I could get no responses from her." Calhoon indicated receiving several such complaints from Miller.

[20] At another place, Miller indicated that, in his experience with Calhoon, there is a "gestating period" after "Calhoon is informed . . . of things." Calhoon's testimony, however, tended to indicate that he asked Miller at this luncheon to write such a memo, e.g., "when I met with Miller and he told me he'll no longer supervise her, he'll no longer take responsibilities and I said put it in writing . . . ." On the basis of the record, as a whole, I credit Miller in this instance.

[21] It is noted that this telephone call was not noted on Miller's daily worksheet for that date, notwithstanding the care with which Miller indicated that he prepared these documents. In this case Miller asserted that he did not record short telephone calls.

The next day, November 9, Hardesty and Kane went into the office of Victor Rollo, editor of the MEBA house organ, about noontime.[22] They asked if Rollo would support an outside union as bargaining representative. Hardesty asked if Rollo would sign an authorization card, which made Rollo quite nervous and upset. He refused to support the idea of a union or sign a card, stating that "You don't know them like I do." Rollo refused to go to lunch with Kane and Hardesty.

2. Kane's discharge

Apparently immediately after Kane and Hardesty left his office, Rollo went to see Calhoon. According to the MEBA president (Rollo did not testify), Rollo, a man in his 60's, was trembling and "visibly shaken." Calhoon asserts that Rollo complained that he could not "work under this pressure"; that Kane and Hardesty had come to his office "and closed the door, and told me to sign some union card and that they had checked with you and this was your wishes." Calhoon states that, after assuring Rollo that his job was not in jeopardy, he sent Rollo home to calm his nerves.

When Kane returned from lunch, he was called into Calhoon's office, where the latter said, according to Kane, "I understand you were in Mr. Rollo's office this morning and asked him to join a union. Is that true?" Kane replied, "No. I didn't ask him to join a union. I asked him if he might support one, or thought it was a good idea." Calhoon then told Kane, "Pick up your check, you're through." Kane left.

Calhoon, on his part, asserts that he discharged Kane for two reasons: First because he solicited Rollo to join a union, which Calhoon did not think proper in Kane's asserted management position, and, secondly, because Kane had intimidated Rollo. When asked how he thought Rollo had been intimidated, Calhoon responded that the intimidation occurred because Kane closed Rollo's office door, not because Rollo was asked to sign a union card. I cannot credit this. The two men had been employed in the same office over a year. There is no evidence of animosity between them, or any threat of force on this occasion or any prior occasion. I do not believe that the mere closure of the door, if in fact it was closed, and not the message in the conversation threw Rollo into a panic. I find it difficult to credit that Calhoon thought so.[23]

3. Hardesty's discharge

Shortly after Kane and Hardesty returned from lunch on November 9, Hardesty called Kane to suggest that they go to see Calhoon to seek recognition for the AFL–CIO, or its designated union, as the representative of the MEBA headquarters staff employees. Kane said that it was too late, that he had already been discharged. Hardesty left to avoid a confrontation with Calhoon that afternoon.

That afternoon, as previously noted, Miller went to the MEBA office where he dictated a memorandum to Calhoon recommending Hardesty's discharge, stating, in pertinent part, as follows:

> On August 30, 1979, you instructed Doris Hardesty that she would be under my supervision in her new post with MEBA.
> Shortly thereafter, I requested to Mrs. Hardesty that she undertake certain assignments. To this date she has yet to complete the first one.
> I then requested that she provide me with daily work sheets, a practice which I have followed for many years. I felt that these work sheets would be necessary for me in order to evaluate her performance and to assist her in her new duties.
>
> Except for 3 or 4 work sheets, in which she attempted to poke fun at the idea, she has refused to comply with my instructions.
> I have admonished her in person and in writing on several occasions but, to no avail. (See attached memoranda)
> Since then, I have had no contact with Mrs. Hardesty, nor do I have any idea of what her activities have been on behalf of this organization.

The attached memoranda are those Miller sent Hardesty with respect to the Kings Point project and in regard to Miller's instruction that she keep daily worksheets, the last memo dated September 21.

Hardesty and Calhoon next met on November 13, during a recess in a meeting Calhoon was attending. According to Hardesty's testimony (the following is a synthesis of her testimony on direct and cross-examination), she asked to talk to Calhoon privately to tell him her side of the story, that Calhoon accused her "of trying to organize," asserting that he had told her "not to get involved in this union activity. You can't be part of it anyway. It's none of your business to be involved with the other employees." Hardesty asserts that the conversation turned to the unfavorable conditions of work at MEBA, the concerns of the secretaries, and the fact that, when her secretary was fired summarily, she felt it was her business to become involved, because "there was no reason that it could not happen to the rest of us." Hardesty asserted that there was precedent for a clerical and professional unit. She further told Calhoon that she had done nothing that was not in his best interests.

Apparently at this point in the conversation, Calhoon asked why Hardesty was having difficulty getting along with Miller, and asked why she had never turned in the lead-ins for the Kings Point project. Hardesty replied that she had submitted the lead-ins to Miller, and that the problems she and Miller had, one with the other, could be solved and that Miller's hostility towards her could be eliminated if she did her work "and didn't cross him," and this could be accomplished without bothering Calhoon or Shapiro.[24]

Calhoon told Hardesty, according to her account, "Well, you know that if there was a union, people with only a year or so or only a few months to go on their pension, due to gain their pension benefits, would lose their benefits." Hardesty protested that would not be legal, that he could not take the employees' pension benefits away from them, to which Calhoon responded that he would do so.

[22] Rollo is admittedly an employee under the Act.

[23] Calhoon states that he did not believe Hardesty intimidated Rollo on this occasion.

[24] Hardesty recalled that Calhoon said that Miller had not been critical of her.

Hardesty testified that she had read Calhoon's testimony that "when Marine Engineers get old or maimed, he does not allow them to be thrown on the garbage heap as long as they can do their jobs. And I suggested that that situation also applied to us. That we couldn't allow Cheryl Priest to be thrown on the garbage heap."

At this point, Hardesty recalls, Calhoon said, "Well, you've made your choice. No gal is going to get in the way of my priorities. You either quit or be fired." Hardesty denied that Calhoon said that Miller's evaluation of her work, or Miller's memorandum, had anything to do with her termination.

Calhoon's version of this conversation (which undoubtedly lasted about half an hour) is considerably briefer. According to MEBA President Calhoon, he received "a quite lengthy speech on the evils of M.E.B.A., how terrible it was. The personnel was demoralized, it wasn't progressing . . . and when the speech was over, I said, 'Doris, Joe Miller has given me a memorandum saying' . . . that she cannot work for him and . . . recommends that I ask for her resignation. I get another speech and some discussion back and forth at that point, and I said, 'Doris, you've got a choice, submit your resignation or be fired' . . . and I said, 'Doris, that's it.'"

Hardesty picked up her check and her belongings at the MEBA office the next day.

Inasmuch as this conversation may be critical to the resolution of the issue of Hardesty's discharge, I have given it close consideration. Three things become particularly apparent: While Hardesty's account of the conversation is specific and detailed, Calhoon's, for the most part, is generalized and nonspecific; both agree that Hardesty's poor relationship with Miller was discussed, Calhoon placing more emphasis on this, Hardesty less; and lastly, and most importantly, Hardesty's version shows that her union organizing efforts, and their likely consequences, were predominant in the conversation, which Calhoon does not mention in his version of the conversation, but also, significantly, he does not deny.

Upon consideration of all of the factors, including the relative credibility of the witnesses, I credit Hardesty's account of the conversation.[25]

IV. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. The Managerial Status of Hardesty and Kane

It is now settled that "managerial" personnel, although not specifically excluded from the protection of the Act, are by past practice and judicial interpretation not covered by the statute. See N.L.R.B. v. Bell Aerospace Company, etc., 416 U.S. 267 (1974); N.L.R.B. v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672 (1980). In Bell Aerospace, the Court noted that, in enacting the Taft-Hartley Act, amending the National Labor Relations Act, Congress did not specifically exclude managerial personnel from the Act because they assumed such personnel to be "executives and are excluded from the Act in any event." 416 U.S. at 283.[26]

However, it is not always simple to determine which individuals fall within this group of excluded managerial executives. In Yeshiva University, the Court defined the group as follows:

> Managerial employees are defined as those who "'formulate and effectuate management policies by expressing and making operative the decisions of their employer.'" N.L.R.B. v. Bell Aerospace Co., supra, 416 U.S. at 288 (quoting Palace Laundry Dry Cleaning Corp., 75 NLRB 320, 323, fn. 4 (1947)). These employees are "much higher in the managerial structure" than those explicitly mentioned by Congress, which "regarded [them] as so clearly outside the Act that no specific exclusionary provision was thought necessary." 416 U.S. at 283. Managerial employees must exercise discretion within, or even independently of, established employer policy and must be aligned with management. See id. at 286–287 (citing cases). Although the Board has established no firm criteria for determining when an employee is so aligned, normally an employee may be excluded as managerial only if he represents management interests by taking or recommending discretionary actions that effectively control or implement employer policy. [444 U.S. at 682–683.]

To this may be added the Court's admonition in Bell Aerospace, "Of course, the specific job title of the employees involved is not in itself controlling. Rather, the question whether particular employees are 'managerial' must be answered in terms of the employees' actual job responsibilities, authority, and relationship to management." (416 U.S. at 290, fn. 19. Emphasis supplied.)

1. Doris G. Hardesty

Upon consideration of all the factors presented, I find that Hardesty was not a managerial employee as defined by the courts and the Board and is an employee within the protection of the Act. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive an organization in which the secretary to a true executive would be fired by the office manager without notice to or consultation with such alleged executive; or in which such claimed executive could get so little satisfaction when she protested such action; or in which such asserted executive would be placed under the direct supervision of a private contractor lobbyist, and, according to Respondent MEBA, be finally discharged because she refused to keep a daily, detailed log of her work activities to suit the instruction of the independent contractor-lobbyist, all of which occurred to Hardesty. In fact, such instruction implies a demeaning constraint quite incompatible with the status of executive.

[25] Hardesty's assertion that Calhoon said that Miller had not been critical of her was not sufficiently developed. This may have occurred in several different contexts. Hardesty admits that Calhoon was aware that Miller and she were having difficulty with one another. I am inclined to believe that the discussion of this relationship lay somewhere between the two versions.

[26] The Court, 416 U.S. at 284, quoted from the court of appeals decision in Bell Aerospace: "Congress failed to enact that portion of [the] Packard dissent relating to . . . executives, not because it disagreed but because it deemed this . . . unnecessary." (Emphasis supplied.) The Court further noted, Id. at 284, fn. 13, "Moreover, it cannot be denied that Congress thought that 'executives' were excluded from the Act for the House Report so stated in express terms."

A major activity of Hardesty was to keep advised of legislation and congressional action which might affect MEBA, for the purpose of keeping Miller and MEBA President Calhoon informed. In the course of performing this function, Hardesty made contacts with congressional staff and others, occasionally taking some of these persons to lunch at MEBA expense. Hardesty understood that, insofar as possible, it was part of her function, under Miller's direction, to promote MEBA's legislative policies, and she attempted to do so.

In addition to memoranda to Miller and Calhoon on legislative matters, Hardesty made a number of suggestions to Calhoon for action by MEBA, such as that she be permitted to travel to Florida to observe a Presidential candidate's campaign in the primary (this was granted on the condition that she "keep her mouth shut"; while there she was reimbursed for her expenses), and that MEBA sponsor a luncheon for a particular congressman (Calhoon agreed because he favored the congressman). Many of her suggestions were disapproved or ignored. Calhoon's testimony was to the effect that, for the most part, he did not find her suggestions useful.

In addition, Hardesty was one of MEBA's representatives to the meetings of AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education (COPE), in which she seems to have acted as an observer.

Respondent argues in its brief that Hardesty's activities were those of a lobbyist, and as such she was engaged in promoting MEBA's legislative goals, that she represented MEBA to the public, was reimbursed for expenses, and was not closely supervised; further, that she could recommend policy actions (such as the luncheon for a congressman), and if she did not have authority to decide policy, she had authority to decide how to implement it. Respondent cites several precedents, mostly in an industrial context, as supporting its argument that one or more of these factors imply managerial status. These have been duly considered. However, other cases, more closely analogous, in a labor union context, indicate the contrary.

Thus the Board has held that because union staff personnel engage in political activities, including assignments to attend meetings of COPE,[27] or represent the union to the public,[28] or incur expenses or pledge the union's credit in the ordinary course of staff duties,[29] or make recommendations which may influence the union's policy or business decisions,[30] this does not necessarily indicate that such personnel are managerial employees. Nor does the fact that the staff employee performs his functions without close supervision, and thus may exercise discretion in carrying out his work, brand the employee an executive type.[31]

While Hardesty sought, admittedly, to promote MEBA policy in her daily activity, there is no evidence that she did so "by taking or recommending discretionary actions that effectively control or implement employer policy." Nor does the record indicate that Hardesty's activities—mainly involved with information gathering—involved formulation and effectuating MEBA policies (it is noted that the rule is stated in the conjunctive—both must be shown), or that she exercised "discretion within or even independently of established employer policy," as stated by the Court in Yeshiva University.

Lastly, Respondent argues that Hardesty's large salary and the fact that she had a large office and a secretary (which she shared with Kane) mark her as managerial. The fact that Hardesty had an office and a part-time secretary (over whose employment she had little or no control) is quite compatible with a nonmanagerial status. Her large salary, in a more structured or hierarchical organization, would be more persuasive, if combined with other factors indicating executive position. However, these factors do not exist here.

2. Theodore A. Kane

Respondent contends that Kane at the time of his discharge was a management trainee, in training for the position of director of research and development. In reliance on the Board's Decision in Curtis Industries, Division of Curtis Noll Corporation, 218 NLRB 1447 (1975), Respondent argues that Kane must be treated as occupying managerial status, not protected by the Act.

This adds an additional difficulty to the formidable problems otherwise presented in merely determining whether Kane falls within the guidelines set up by the court for managerial status. That determination, as the Court stated in Bell Aerospace, is to be determined "in terms of the employees' actual job responsibilities, authority and relationship to management." (Emphasis supplied.) This additional concept requires inquiry also into whether the position for which Kane was allegedly hired, and for which he was assertedly being trained, was itself a managerial position; also whether Kane was, in fact, being trained for that position within the meaning of Curtis Industries, and whether Kane had any reasonable expectation at the time he was discharged of succeeding to the alleged managerial functions associated with that position.

Clearly Kane's actual job responsibilities, authority, and relationship to the Union during his employment with MEBA do not mark him as managerial within the Board and court precedents. The majority of his time was spent in collective bargaining, advising and assisting a local affiliate of MEBA, including participation before the Board on behalf of that affiliate, preparing to engage in collective bargaining on behalf of MEBA itself, processing grievances and engaging in some research projects, and incurring routine expenses in connection therewith. Kane further seems to have been involved in working with a local representative in sharing responsibility for processing certain grievances under MEBA Government contracts, in accordance with a policy decision made by the MEBA executive board. Kane also attended one meeting of the board of trustees of the MEBA pension plan, as an observer, to assist him in preparing for participating in bargaining for certain MEBA contracts. However, Kane did not actually participate or engage in such bargaining.

The Board has consistently held that the exercise of such functions as collective bargaining, processing grievances, assisting local labor organizations, and participating in Board proceedings on behalf of such organizations by union staff personnel is not managerial. Grand Lodge, IAM, supra; Retail Clerks International Association, supra; Retail Store Employees Union, Local 880, supra; American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, supra. Indeed, I do not understand MEBA to claim that Kane's actual responsibilities and duties while employed by MEBA were managerial as defined by the Board and the court. Rather, the contention is that Kane was not within the protection of the Act because he was assertedly a trainee for a position that was allegedly managerial—that of director of research and development.

The position and title of MEBA director of research and development appear to have been created to fit the qualifications and abilities of its initial occupant, Fred Schamann. Schamann had a lifetime of experience with ships and the maritime industry, and apparently had exceptional mathematical ability and some years of intense technical training in the operation of nuclear-powered surface vessels. According to MEBA's brief, Schamann was "assigned the task of creating an economic module . . . to be used in computing total employment cost" in collective bargaining;" was personally responsible for negotiating an agreement on total employment costs" with employer bargaining groups; had the duty of "monitoring and evaluating the impact of rapid technological changes" in the maritime industry; and served as the MEBA representative to an international organization of free labor unions and as the MEBA advisor to the U.S. representative to a United Nations subsidiary. To assist in this latter function, MEBA had Schamann take courses in international law and public speaking. And finally, according to MEBA, Schamann was assigned, when needed, to assist MEBA affiliates and to negotiate collective-bargaining agreements for them. Schamann's salary was in excess of $50,000.

Kane, when employed, had no experience with ships or the maritime industry, though he had been an officer of a production local in Indiana, where he had some limited experience with organizing activities and collective bargaining. When MEBA President Calhoon employed Kane, he knew that Kane did not have the mathematical skills to perform the cost analyses which were a main function of Schamann.

Though Calhoon asserts that he hired Kane to train for 3 years to replace Schamann, it is clear that Calhoon had no systematic course of training in mind. Kane, who understood that he was being employed to assist Calhoon and do whatever was required, was under the tutelage of Schamann for a short time—about 2 months—during which time Schamann gave him exercises to do relative to costing out contracts.[32]

Thereafter, Kane was informed that he would not be doing work in the international arena which Schamann had been doing.

It is assumed for the purposes of this Decision that some or most of Schamann's functions were managerial (though an argument could be made that, on this record, there is no showing that he formulated and effectuated management policies, however technically important his job may have been.[33]) However, by the time Kane was discharged, it is clear that these functions had substantially changed. Thus, it seems obvious that Calhoon was aware, at a very early stage of Kane's employment, that Kane would not fill Schamann's shoes. He did not have the background or skills of the older man, and Calhoon was making no real effort to provide any formal training to qualify him. One important aspect of the position, that of dealing in the international arena, had already been removed. Basically, what was left were the functions of collective bargaining and grievance processing. But, as has been noted, these are functions which ordinarily are not managerial. Nor is there any showing that Kane, if he were permitted to participate in the upcoming negotiations for new contracts, would have had a managerial function to perform within the guidelines set forth in Yeshiva University, supra.

In essence, Kane did not possess the qualifications to perform Schamann's functions, nor was he given the sustained training required to equip him to do so. Thus, when he was given the title of director of research and development, after Schamann left, he was given a job that was tailored to fit his special qualifications. This position (aside from the title) was not the one held by Schamann, and was one that I find was not managerial within the guidelines set forth above. This is emphasized by the fact that, when Kane was given the title (and the office that went with it), his salary (less than half what Schamann was receiving) remained the same.

Because the work that he was doing was not managerial, because I am not convinced that Kane was really ever trained for a management position within the meaning of Curtis Industries, supra, and because it is clear to me that the position he was finally given was not managerial within the meaning of the cases, I find that Kane was, at all times material, an employee within the meaning of the Act.

[32] Calhoon says that, as a result of these exercises, Schamann informed him that Kane lacked the necessary math competence. Calhoon states that he contemplated sending Kane to school to improve his math but, significantly, did not do so.

[33] Calhoon referred to Schamann as the second most important man in the organization.

B. The Discharges

1. Kane

MEBA does not contend that its discharge of Kane was justified under the Act, if Kane is found to be an employee within the meaning of the Act. Calhoon testified that Kane was discharged for attempting to get an employee to sign an authorization card or support an outside union and causing the employee extreme emotional distress in the process by closing the door to the employee's office. I have previously expressed my doubts as to this latter reason. However, in any event, I have had occasion, some years ago, to note that:

> The mere fact, however, that [an employee] may have been opposed to unionization, or was easily upset by its advocacy, cannot serve . . [as] an additional restraint upon the proper exercise by an employee of rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act. . . . Such activity tends, as the facts in the present case show . . . to increase the tension of those susceptible of stress . . . . However, this does not clothe the employer with immunity to discipline an employee because of otherwise legitimate union activities because such activities offended other employees who might hold opposing views on that subject. Welsh Industries, Inc., 154 NLRB 463, 477 (1965), enfd. 385 F.2d 538 (6th Cir. 1967).]

On the basis of the above, and the entire record, I find that Respondent MEBA, by discharging Theodore A. Kane, Jr., violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

2. Hardesty

At the outset, Respondent MEBA argues that Hardesty's discharge on November 13 cannot be said to have been caused by her union activities because, it is asserted, Calhoon had decided to fire her on November 6, prior to those activities. This is based on Calhoon's testimony to the effect that, on the latter date, Miller gave Calhoon to understand that Calhoon had to get rid of Hardesty or Miller would discontinue his services for MEBA; that Calhoon at that time asked Miller to support his accusations against Hardesty in writing; and that the discharge took place shortly after Miller supplied that memorandum (which occurred on the same day that Hardesty's union activities came to Calhoon's attention).

The difficulty with this position lies in the fact that, as has been previously found, for reasons stated, Miller did not give Calhoon reason to understand on November 6 that he would leave if Hardesty was not terminated. Nor did Calhoon ask Miller on that date to give him a memo on Miller's difficulties with Hardesty, and, in fact, according to Miller's testimony, he suggested on the morning of November 9 that he would provide Calhoon with a memo that day. I am convinced that Calhoon had not decided, finally, on November 6, to discharge Hardesty. Miller himself states that at that time he had hopes that she would improve and rehabilitate herself.

However, in any event, the real issue here is why did Calhoon discharge Hardesty on November 13. This may be determined best by what was said at that meeting. During that conversation, Calhoon not only brought up Hardesty's poor relations with Miller, but also accused her of trying to organize the staff, reminding her that he had previously told her not to become involved in such union activity; Hardesty argued that the staff needed union protection, to which Calhoon asserted that, if they became unionized, he would see to it that they lost pension benefits; after Hardesty further argued that he could not do this, and reminded him of his own strong support for MEBA members, Calhoon told Hardesty, "Well, you've made your choice. No gal is going to get in the way of my priorities. You either quit or be fired."

These comments are convincing that Calhoon intended to and did fire Doris G. Hardesty for her activities in attempting to unionize the MEBA staff and, by such action, I find, MEBA violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

In coming to this conclusion, I have considered MEBA's argument that Calhoon had expressed himself on other occasions as being neutral, or unconcerned as to whether employees in MEBA headquarters staff became organized. However that may be, on this occasion Calhoon showed himself strongly opposed to Hardesty and Kane becoming involved in such activity and disciplined them for it, which discipline violated their rights and the rights of the other employees under the Act.

Respondent MEBA suggests, citing Wright Line, supra, that that case supports its position. I have carefully considered that precedent also. Wright Line is concerned, as I have been in this case, with determining the real reason for the discrimination against certain employees by their employers. In Wright Line, the Board abandoned one analysis, the so-called in part test, sometimes employed in past cases where the evidence tended to show that a possible legitimate reason for discharge as well as an illegal motive in discriminating against employees existed and holds that, except where the employer's alleged legitimate reason is pretextual, such "dual motive" cases may be resolved by means of a "burden of proof" test.

I have found, for the reasons set forth above, that MEBA's real reason for terminating Hardesty was her protected union activities. It follows, therefore, that MEBA's insistence on other reasons for that action must be held pretextual. Further, Respondent's failure credibly to overcome the General Counsel's proof that Hardesty was discharged for her protected activity constitutes a failure to carry the burden of proof of its affirmative defense.

3. Alleged interference

The General Counsel argues that MEBA President Calhoon violated the Act by questioning Kane as to whether he had solicited employee Rollo to sign a union authorization card, and by telling Hardesty that MEBA employees would lose pension benefits if they were unionized. These activities, in the context in which they occurred, clearly tended to interfere with the exercise by employees of rights guaranteed under the Act and thus violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent MEBA is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Doris G. Hardesty and Theodore A. Kane, Jr., each is an employee within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act.

3. AFL-CIO and OPEIU, AFL-CIO, each is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. By coercively interrogating and threatening its employees with reprisal, as found above, Respondent MEBA violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By discharging Doris G. Hardesty and Theodore A. Kane, Jr., for engaging in activities on behalf of and supporting a labor organization, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that Respondent MEBA has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, it will be recommended that Respondent MEBA cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent MEBA discriminated against Doris G. Hardesty and Theodore A. Kane, Jr., in violation of the Act, it will be recommended that Respondent MEBA offer Doris G. Hardesty and Theodore A. Kane, Jr., immediate and full reinstatement to the position that each held at the time each was discharged or, if such position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to the seniority or other rights or benefits each possessed, and make each of them whole for any loss of pay or benefits which each may have suffered by reason of his (or her) discharge, by payment to each of them of a sum of money equal to that each would have earned as wages and other benefits from the date of termination to the date of reinstatement, less net earnings during that period and interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[34]

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I issue the following recommended:

ORDER[35]

The Respondent, District #1, Pacific Coast District, Marine Engineers Beneficial Association, Washington, D.C., its officers, agents, and representatives, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discharging, or otherwise discriminating against, employees because they join, support, or engage in activities on behalf of a labor organization.

(b) Threatening employees with discharge or other reprisal if they join, support, or engage in activities on behalf of a labor organization.

(c) Coercively interrogate employees concerning the union activities of employees.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights protected under Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

2. Take the following affirmative action which it is found will effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Offer Doris G. Hardesty and Theodore A. Kane, Jr., immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, and make each of them whole for any loss of earnings or benefits each may have suffered by reason of their discharges, in accordance with the provisions set forth in the section herein-above entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post in conspicuous places at its operations in Washington, D.C., copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[36] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being duly signed by Respondent's president, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 5, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps it has taken to comply herewith.

[34] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[35] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[36] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Boston Mutual Life Insurance Company and Francis A. Thone. Case 1-CA-17993

January 28, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Van de Water and Members Jenkins and Hunter

On September 18, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Norman Zankel issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[1] and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the Administrative Law Judge's Decision.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Boston Mutual Life Insurance Company, Methuen, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Norman Zankel, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me on July 13-15, 1981, at Boston, Massachusetts.

Upon an original charge filed on October 24, 1980,[1] by Charging Party Thone, the Regional Director for Region 1 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a complaint and notice of hearing on December 5.

In essence, the complaint alleges that the Employer interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (the Act), when, on or about April 24, it threatened to discharge Thone because of his concerted or union activities. Also, the complaint alleges that the Employer discriminated against its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Thone on May 8.

The Employer filed a timely answer which admitted certain matters but denied the substantive allegations and that it had committed any unfair labor practices.

All parties appeared at the hearing. Each was represented by counsel and was afforded full opportunity to be heard, to introduce and meet material evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to present oral argument, and to file briefs. Counsel for the Board's General Counsel and the Employer's counsel submitted post-trial briefs, the contents of which have been carefully considered.

Upon consideration of the entire record, the briefs, and my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

Findings and Conclusions

I. JURISDICTION

Jurisdiction is uncontested. The Employer's answer admits, and I find it is, and at all material times has been, a Massachusetts corporation. The Employer maintains its principal office and place of business in Canton, Massachusetts, from which it is engaged in the retail sale and servicing of life insurance policies. The Employer maintains a number of regional offices. Only the regional office located at 240 Pleasant Street, Methuen, Massachusetts, is involved herein.

The Employer's total assets are in excess of $1 million and consist of cash, stocks, loans, and real estate located in Massachusetts and elsewhere. The Employer's annual premiums received exceed $500,000 of which premiums in excess of $50,000 are derived from outside Massachusetts. The Employer's annual gross revenues exceed $500,000.

[1] Respondent has requested oral argument. This request is hereby denied as the record, the exceptions, and the briefs, adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] The Administrative Law Judge incorrectly attributed the statement that Charging Party Thone was "a pain in the the ass" to Respondent's vice president and regional sales director, John A. Topjian. The record testimony reveals that this statement was made by Regional Sales Manager Eugene D. DiPirro. In our view, this error does not undermine the ultimate finding that Respondent discharged Thone in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) inasmuch as the Administrative Law Judge also found, and we agree, that Topjian also stated, in reference to Thone: "we have to get that bastard." Thus, the requisite finding of animus made by the Administrative Law Judge in reference to Topjian remains undisturbed.

In addition, Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

Member Jenkins does not rely on Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980); Castle Instant Maintenance/Maid, Inc., 256 NLRB 130 (1981); or Limestone Apparel Corp., 255 NLRB 722 (1981). In his view, Wright Line end its progeny concern identifying the cause of discharge where a genuine lawful and a genuine unlawful reason exist. Where, as here, the asserted lawful reason is found to be a pretext, only one genuine reason remains—the unlawful one. Thus, the Wright Line analysis is not pertinent in cases such as this. See Castle Instant Maintenance/Maid, supra.

[3] In determining backpay liability, Member Jenkins would compute interest thereon in the manner set forth in his partial dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

[1] All dates hereinafter are 1980 unless otherwise stated.

259 NLRB No. 172

Upon the foregoing, and the record as a whole, I find the Employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Based on the Employer's admission, and the record as a whole, I find that Insurance Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Thone's employment began on September 28, 1970. Throughout his employment, Thone was a debit insurance agent. It is undisputed Thone was discharged on May 8.

Thone's employment with the instant Employer was not continuous. It was interrupted twice, by a discharge and a suspension. Thus, on December 27, 1974, Thone was discharged after an audit uncovered a deficiency of $331.41 in his accounts. He was reinstated on February 10, 1975, at the Union's behest. Thereafter, Thone was suspended from May 27, 1977, through May 31, 1977, for insubordination.

Thone's employment was punctuated by a series of oral and written reprimands and warnings. Thus, on November 16, 1971, he was orally reprimanded for applying dividends to premiums without customer authorization.

When Thone was reinstated on February 10, 1975 (after his discharge), he received a written warning that "any further deficiency in your accounts or other violations of . . . rules and regulations will result in your immediate termination from the Company."

On March 15, 1977, Thone was orally reprimanded for failure timely to submit a case for lapsing.

On December 17, 1979, Thone received a written reprimand for failure to submit a policy for lapse. That reprimand warned "future violations may result in disciplinary action, up to and including suspension or termination."

On March 11, 1980, Thone was reprimanded in writing for failing timely to submit a case for lapse. He was warned "future violations will result in disciplinary action, up to and including suspension or termination."

During his employment, Thone was a member of Insurance Workers International Union, AFL-CIO (herein the Union). From approximately March 1975, Thone served as the Union's office chairman (hereafter called steward). He was the local Union's vice president since February 1978, and a member of its negotiating committee in January 1980.

The Employer and Union maintained a continuous collective-bargaining relationship covering the debit agents since 1953. The most recent collective-bargaining agreement between them is effective January 15, 1980, through January 14, 1982. Thone participated in the negotiations which culminated in that agreement.

Investigation and processing of grievances was part of Thone's steward duties. Additionally, Thone testified without contradiction, that the duties of that office entailed the "appraisal [sic] of the new agents and the senior agents of what protection they had under the contract that the Union had with the Company, and to assist them in whatever way I might to better understand their job, and be happy and successful in it."

Debit agents sell insurance policies and maintain collections of customers whose accounts appear in their collection books. They also are expected to prevent existing policies from lapsing, a process known as conservation.

At all material times, the Employer's relevant supervisory hierarchy was as follows: Roy G. Daniels, vice president and director of district agencies; John A. Topjian, vice president and regional sales director; Eugene D. DiPirro, regional sales manager; Donald Morrison, regional sales supervisor; and Thomas Stankard, staff (or sales) manager. All but Daniels and Topjian regularly were assigned to the Employer's Methuen office. The latter regularly worked at the Employer's Canton, Massachusetts, home office.

DiPirro's ascension to his position as regional manager at Methuen is relevant. He assumed that position in approximately June 1979. DiPirro's predecessor in that job was Raymond Longshaw, Jr. Longshaw was regional manager from at least December 27, 1974, until DiPirro replaced him. Jimmie Bletsis was regional manager before Longshaw. Thone testified, without contradiction, that he filed approximately 10 grievances.[2] One of them was filed with Longshaw and the others with DiPirro.

All grievances filed are submitted to Topjian, if not resolved within a district office, such as Methuen. Also, Daniels is made aware of grievances, although he is not directly involved in the grievance procedure.

Apparently, Thone's grievance activity accelerated in late 1979. The grievances, and their disposition, are outlined as follows:

(1) August 6, 1979: Grievance complained of unnecessary and uncompensated paperwork and threats of financial reprisal upon agents for what was claimed to be "company oversights." DiPirro denied the grievance. Topjian overruled DiPirro.

(2) December 17, 1979: Claimed that Thone was entitled to receive a commission upon business written by another debit agent, Schau. DiPirro denied the grievance. Topjian reversed the denial. The grievance was granted on January 28, 1980.

(3) February 6, 1980: Thone grieved that his staff manager had been discriminatory in that customers had been transferred from Thone's account book to the book of debit agents in other geographic areas but had not transferred accounts from other debit agents' books to Thone's when the customers became situated in the geographic area serviced by him. DiPirro did not respond to this grievance. It remained pending at Thone's discharge.

(4) March 20, 1980: Grieved that collection books of new agents were not "blocked" by the Employer in the usual manner. (To "block" a book requires marking each page to indicate the date to which a customer had paid at the time a new agent assumes responsibility for that particular collection book). DiPirro discussed this grievance with Thone. Both Thone and DiPirro recalled that Thone explicitly complained that agent Karen Greenberg's book was not blocked. DiPirro testified, without contradiction, that he immediately took corrective action.

(5) March 31, 1980: Thone grieved a written reprimand of March 11 from DiPirro. The warning was given purportedly because Thone neglected to timely submit a policy for lapsing. Thus, DiPirro warned Thone "future violations will result in disciplinary action, up to and including suspension or termination." This grievance remained pending at Thone's discharge.

The following are the facts leading to Thone's discharge.[3] On May 8 DiPirro delivered a letter dated May 6, signed by Daniels. The letter advised that Thone was discharged effective May 8 because he "falsified D.L.P.'s on M.D.O. dividend up-date requests."[4]

In effect, Thone was charged with having breached a fiduciary relationship with customers. By the asserted "falsification," the Employer contends Thone permitted use of policyholders' earned dividends without the policyholders' knowledge or authorization.[5]

Four options are available to policyholders regarding the application of their dividends. Those options are: (a) cash payment to policyholder; (b) used to pay premiums; (c) applied to acquire new policies; or (d) remain on deposit with the Employer, at interest. This fourth option also automatically authorizes the Employer to apply the dividend to overdue premium payments in order to prevent lapse.

Option (d) automatically applies to all policies. To exercise any of the other three options, a policyholder is required to sign a "Dividend Request" form.

Premium payments on MDO policies are due the first day of each month. If premiums are not paid on the first day of any particular month, and again not paid on the first of the following month, the policy is subject to lapse. Thus, on the 15th of the second consecutive month where timely premiums are not paid, and no dividends are available for application to premiums, the policy will be lapsed. If dividends are available for premium payment, a so-called M card is prepared by the debit agent servicing the customer's accounts.

The M card is the basis, inter alia, for application of dividends to premiums. The debit agent inserts the date of last payment. The M card is then submitted to the agent's staff manager in the district office. The cards are further submitted to a regional supervisor who, in turn, forwards them to the home office. There, the cards are processed. Authorization slips which indicate the amount of dividends available for application to premium payments are returned to the district office.

The events which directly led to Thone's discharge began on or about March 13. On that date, Stankard, then Thone's staff manager, had reviewed certain dividend authorization forms for some of Thone's accounts. He advised Thone of discrepancies he uncovered. Thus, Stankard told Thone that the dividends authorized exceeded the sum which appeared justified by Thone's account book.

M card requests for application of dividends to premiums require that only so much of accumulated dividends as are required to pay arrearages in premiums are initiated by the debit agents. The vice inherent in the discrepancies claimed by Stankard to exist had the effect of increasing Thone's compensation which, in part, was based on a percentage of collected premiums.

Stankard reported his findings to Morrison, then Thone's regional sales supervisor. Morrison compared the nine allegedly improper dividend authorizations to Thone's collection book. Morrison concluded that Stankard's report of apparent discrepancies was correct.

Morrison reported his findings to DePirro. Later, on March 13, DiPirro, in the presence of Morrison and Stankard, confronted Thone. DiPirro accused Thone of falsifying the dates of last payment on the dividend update requests, the M cards. Thone protested he did not believe he did so but, in any event, he commented to the effect that the situation presented no "big deal."[6] DiPirro told Thone his books would have to be audited.

Morrison was instructed to conduct the audit by DiPirro and Topjian. The nine customers whose accounts were involved were visited. Only one of the customers wanted the dividend applications reversed. Meanwhile, on March 21, DiPirro wrote Topjian. He recounted the confrontation with Thone over the nine incidents of apparent "falsification." The dividends had not yet actually been applied to the premium payments of those customers. Thus, DiPirro's March 31 report states, "I am not presently going to apply these dividends, as I believe by law we do not have the right to use them." DiPirro also informed Topjian that he counseled Thone concerning the "seriousness of . . . manipulating policyholders funds."

When Morrison completed the audit, he submitted a written report to DiPirro. In salient part, that report concludes:

> Audit shows agent Fran Thone . . . had a [sic] industrial shortage of $76.35 & a MDO overages of $115.59. Mr. Thone has had a history of sloppy bookkeeping methods. It was next to impossible to verify DLP's in his collection book when compared to policyholders' (——). Mr. Thone has many cases with blind advances as a result of Div. being paid and never being applied to the customer's PRB. Div. are not marked in red in the collection book and no markings indicate when the div. were applied. The adjustments of $76.35 industrial and $115.59 of MDO have been made on a form 87. The difference has been placed on a MDO overage coupon. [Emphasis supplied.]

---

[3] There is a plethora of evidence which describes the technical functions of debit agents, and the Employer's policies and operations in that connection. I shall allude only to that which is considered material and relevant.

[4] DLP refers to date of last payment of a premium. MDO is an abbreviation for monthly debit ordinary, which are policies on which customers make monthly premium payments.

[5] The analysis, infra, will assume the accuracy of the Employer's assertions. In view of this, and my findings based on that assumption, I conclude it is unnecessary to decide whether or not Thone's conduct actually was of the heinous nature claimed by the Employer.

[6] Both Thone and DiPirro recalled Thone's use of the quoted words.

Morrison's uncontradicted testimony reflects that DiPirro was present with him when he wrote his audit report and assisted him in doing so.[7]

On April 9, DiPirro forwarded the audit report to Topjian. DiPirro's cover letter also complained about Thone's performance in matters not involved in the audit. Thus, DiPirro enclosed a letter from customer MacDonald. DiPirro commented that Thone apparently caused MacDonald's policy to lapse improperly. In this connection, DiPirro stated, "I am sure that if necessary I could substantiate as many as 15 or 20 additional cases, identical to . . . [MacDonald's]."

DiPirro's April 9 submission also discusses customer Carbonneau whose business was lost, according to DiPirro, "due to Mr. Thone's poor business practices and lack of service." DiPirro noted, also, that Stankard "has had more than a dozen complaints over the past 2 months concerning Mr. Thone's refusal to provide service requested by policyholders, and clients who stated they do not want him to come to their house again because of his manners." DiPirro enclosed a sample of a page from Thone's collection book. This was enclosed to support DiPirro's claim that Thone "continues to operate in a manner not complying with Company procedures." In his April 9 submission to Topjian, DiPirro also indicated that Thone had received several letters of warning in the past from the Employer's management officials. DiPirro's April 9 letter also states Thone "is attempting to undermine our operation, especially with junior agents by making comments like 'as soon as you write your friends and relatives, the Company will get rid of you.'" Finally, the April 9 letter recommended Thone's immediate termination.

Topjian forwarded DiPirro's April 9 letter, or a copy, to Daniels. Daniels was out of town on April 11, the date the letter was received in his office. No action was taken on the letter until approximately the last week in April. Then, Daniels discussed the contents of DiPirro's April 9 letter and decided to terminate Thone.[8]

Thone has not been recalled since his discharge.[9] It is undisputed that the commissions Thone would have realized from the "falsification" would have been approximately 30 cents a week for 13 weeks.

B. Credibility

Credibility of the respective witnesses is the foundational element for resolution of the alleged unlawful discharge threat. Moreover, witness credibility governs an understanding of the motivational factor necessary to support a prima facie case of discrimination.

The ultimate choice in resolving credibility issues and findings of fact is based on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, the weight of the respective evidence provided by them, established or admitted facts, inherent probabilities and reasonable inferences which may be drawn from the record as a whole. Northridge Knitting Mills, Inc., 223 NLRB 230 (1970); Warren L. Rose Casting, Inc., d/b/a V & W Castings, 231 NLRB 912 (1977); Gold Standard Enterprises, Inc., et al., 234 NLRB 618 (1978).

Additionally, I have carefully weighed all the testimony, bearing in mind the general tendency of witnesses to testify as to their impressions or interpretations of what was said rather than attempting to give verbatim accounts.

In the credibility contest between the General Counsel's witnesses who testified as to what occurred during conversations with some of the Employer's officials and the witnesses presented by the Employer upon the same subject matter, a fair assessment of the testimony convinces me that the versions presented by the General Counsel's witnesses are the most reliable.

In addition to the above-described criteria used to resolve credibility, there are a number of objective factors contained in the record which aid in that regard. These factors follow:

1. Unrefuted testimony supports the credibility of Thone and Leland Greenberg

Thone testified that, in January or February, DiPirro "lectured" him on the duties of a steward. In particular, Thone testified that DiPirro admonished him not to look for things about which to file grievances.

DiPirro was asked to refute neither that he had a discussion involving the subject matter claimed by Thone nor that he even spoke to Thone in January or February. This aspect of Thone's testimony remains unrefuted.

Thone's testimony in this connection is plausible. He candidly acknowledged that he spoke with employees in pursuit of his steward's duties. (His description of those duties has been described hereinabove.) In this context, and in view of DiPirro's failure to rebut this aspect of Thone's testimony, I find it likely DiPirro would have "lectured" Thone as the latter described.[10]

Thone's rebuttal testimony further illuminates this matter. Thus, he candidly admitted that he told new agents that the Employer would terminate him as soon as they wrote policies on friends and relatives. This admission was made, though potentially detrimental to Thone. DiPirro had used those remarks of Thone to support the assertion to Topjian that Thone was disloyal and undermining the Employer to its employees. Thus, Thone's rebuttal testimony forms a plausible predicate for DiPirro to have "lectured" Thone, as claimed. I conclude that the totality of the above-described circumstances lends credence to Thone.

Leland Greenberg testified that he had a private conversation with DiPirro concerning Thone's steward activities. Thus, Greenberg stated that, on December 17, 1979, DiPirro asked him to speak with Thone and tell him to "knock off the small b— going on familiarizing the new agents with procedures." Greenberg asserted that DiPirro said if Thone "didn't knock it off, that he'd be terminated." Further, Greenberg claimed he told DiPirro he could not terminate Thone for doing his job.[11] According to Greenberg, DiPirro responded, "We'll find a way. We can terminate him," and commented that Thone had a history of having problems with management and management was "gunning" for Thone.

[7] Morrison, without contradiction, testified that the underscored language of his report had been dictated by DiPirro. The effect of DiPirro's assistance will be discussed in the analysis section, infra.

[8] The Employer maintains no formal written rules or regulations regarding discipline. District managers possess, and have exercised, discharge authority. The usual practice when termination decisions are made is for district managers to request employees to resign. Daniels' participation in discharges was unusual. In 1978 he discharged one employee, in 1979 none, and in 1980 only one other prior to Thone.

[9] The Union filed and processed a grievance over the discharge. However, no arbitration has been pursued.

[10] This finding is buttressed by DiPirro's allusion to such activity in his April 9 letter to Topjian, a matter which will be further discussed infra.

DiPirro's account of the December 17 conversation is confusing. He recalled that he had a conversation with Greenberg which concerned Thone's actions in the office. However, DiPirro unequivocally denied he asked Greenberg to do anything to stop Thone's activity. Instead, DiPirro testified that Greenberg approached him and asked "if there was any way I [DiPirro] could quiet or slow Mr. Thone down in some" of his complaints because "he [Greenberg] was there to sell insurance and make money and didn't have the time to get involved in meetings and things of that nature."

DiPirro testified that he responded he could do nothing and invited Greenberg to take up the matter directly with Thone. Further, DiPirro denied he made any threat to terminate Thone during this conversation with Greenberg.

Interestingly, DiPirro was not asked to refute Greenberg's testimony that Greenberg commented to DiPirro, that he believed Thone could not be terminated for doing his job.

As a rebuttal witness, Greenberg denied initiating the December 17 conversation. Specifically, he denied the conversation began by asking DiPirro to slow Thone down.

As indicated, DiPirro's accounts of conversations with Leland Greenberg were confusing, at the very least. Indeed, such testimony may be perceived as an evasive tactic. This latter view stems from DiPirro's narration of another conversation Leland Greenberg claimed to have had with DiPirro in April 1980. The latter conversation is particularly critical. DiPirro is alleged to have made the unlawful discharge threat in violation of Section 8(a)(1) during the April discussion.

Thus, during his cross-examination, DiPirro testified that the conversation in which he claimed Greenberg asked him to slow down Thone occurred at the end of March or the beginning of April. However, when DiPirro was asked to recount what was said during that conversation his responses make it clear that he confused the substance of the conversation which he admitted he had privately with Leland Greenberg with another conversation which he further admitted was held with Greenberg and his wife.

Greenberg, his wife, and DiPirro all agreed they had a conversation at some time. As will be further described, infra, the Greenbergs corroborated each other regarding DiPirro's issuance of the unlawful discharge threat. DiPirro's acknowledgment that he spoke privately with Leland Greenberg when Greenberg is supposed to have asked to slow Thone down tends to confirm Greenberg's testimony that two conversations occurred—the first in December 1979 and the second in April 1980.[12] Greenberg presented comprehensive testimony concerning what was said at each of these meetings. On the other hand, DiPirro's testimony effectively obscures the issue of how many conversations occurred between him and Leland Greenberg.

Seen either as honest confusion or as not-so-subtle evasion, I conclude that these circumstances render DiPirro less reliable a witness than both Leland and Karen Greenberg.

Furthermore, I conclude that Leland Greenberg's account of the December 17 conversation is more reliable than DiPirro's for other reasons. First, the words attributed to DiPirro are consistent with Thone's testimony that he had been told to stop looking for material on which to file grievances. Second, I find it improbable that Greenberg would have complained about spending time in meetings, as DiPirro claimed. The record shows that Greenberg was a union activist. In fact, he replaced Thone as steward after Thone's discharge. It is difficult to imagine one who assumes such a position would be at all upset with the performance of the same union obligations he himself undertakes to perform.

Greenberg's and Thone's testimony regarding conversations they had with DiPirro become more convincing when examined in the light of Thone's description of a conversation he had with DiPirro on December 17, 1979. The two of them, according to Thone, discussed the grievance of the same date filed over Thone's claim that he was entitled to business written by agent Schau. Thone testified that DiPirro said if the grievances were not withdrawn, DiPirro "would basically 'get me' [Thone] on one thing or another." DiPirro acknowledged that they spoke concerning the grievance but denied that he threatened to "get" Thone.

I credit Thone. His description of what DiPirro said to him on December 17 is consistent with what Greenberg claimed DiPirro said to him the same date. It is plausible that Greenberg would have been told to have Thone "knock off the b—" and that if Thone did not do so, the Employer would find some way to terminate him virtually simultaneously with the request of Thone that he withdraw the Schau grievance or the Employer would "get" him.[13]

There exists yet another reason which makes Leland Greenberg's testimony more probable than DiPirro's. The record shows that DiPirro had become impatient with Thone's apparent acceleration in filing grievances. Thus, the grievances of August 6 and December 17, 1979, were answered by DiPirro within a day or two of filing. However, the grievances Thone filed on February 6 and March 31, 1980, went unanswered by DiPirro. I consider this circumstance some, but not dispositive, evidence of the likelihood that DiPirro made the April discharge threat (the explicit terms of which will be discussed infra) as related by Leland and Karen Greenberg.

[11] Greenberg's comment apparently is a reference to the functions of a steward.

[12] The Employer's brief apparently concedes that two conversations occurred.

[13] The record does not show precisely the time elapsed between DiPirro's separate discussions with Thone and Greenberg on December 17 or which conversation preceded the other. However, I conclude that these omissions do not detract from the inherently consistent character of the two events.

It is more probable that Greenberg's purported observation of disbelief that Thone could be fired for doing his job as steward would be made by one who demonstrates such fealty to the Union.

Indeed, DiPirro's own testimony enhances the probability of Greenberg's. Thus, with regard to the March 20 grievance concerning the blocking of agents' books, DiPirro's testimony reflects that he was disturbed by Thone's having filed the grievance. Thus, DiPirro testified that he spoke with Thone after receiving the grievance. According to DiPirro, he told Thone that the grievance was a matter which Thone "could have come in and discussed with me . . . as a courtesy-type thing rather than take the time to file a grievance on it which I had to answer, and we [management] were absolutely wrong." DiPirro's testimony continued: He claimed Thone asked, "Are you saying I can't file grievances?" DiPirro claimed he responded, "No, I am not. You absolutely file one if you feel you have to." Nonetheless, DiPirro testified, "I just felt it was something that, if he [Thone] had mentioned, would have been done right away." (This last seemingly exculpatory remark does not diminish the general attitude with which I find DiPirro demonstrated a clear annoyance at Thone's grievance filings.)

Upon all the foregoing, I conclude that wherever conflicts exist between Leland and Karen Greenberg on one hand, and DiPirro on the other, the former two witnesses should be credited.

2. Crucial testimony of DiPirro

The crucial testimony of DiPirro was more vague than that of Leland and Karen Greenberg, and was adduced through leading questions. As noted above, the unlawful 8(a)(1) conduct is alleged to have occurred during the April conversation between DiPirro and the Greenbergs. I have already observed that DiPirro was confused and/or evasive regarding his conversations with Leland Greenberg.

Moreover, DiPirro's recollection was vague. He needed to be prompted by leading questions. When first recounting the contents of the April conversation, DiPirro testified that he could not remember how it started. However, DiPirro, consistent with both Greenbergs, acknowledged they spoke in his office. Nonetheless, during direct examination, DiPirro was asked the following leading question: "I think you said you were having a conversation with Greenberg who was standing in the door—" DiPirro responded (interrupting)," "Uh-huh." Thus, it was counsel, not DiPirro, who placed the conversation at his office door.

Additionally, it was counsel, not DiPirro, who indicated that Greenberg "brought up this question about is there anything that could be done about Mr. Thone [sic]." At first, DiPirro testified, "I don't really recall how it [the conversation] started."

Yet another attempt was made, during DiPirro's direct examination, to elicit a definitive response. DiPirro finally was asked, "Did Mr. Greenberg initiate a conversation with you about this complaint against Mr. Thone having falsified the DLP?" DiPirro answered, "Yes."

The above-described content of DiPirro's testimony makes it extremely difficult to place reliance upon his recollection. Indeed, his initial response indicated that he could not remember how the conversation started. In contrast, the Greenbergs, especially Leland, presented comprehensive, direct, sure, and spontaneous narrations of what occurred. Each was unshaken by cross-examination. Accordingly, I credit their accounts of the April conversation.[14]

3. The General Counsel's witnesses

The General Counsel's witnesses were corroborated by those of Respondent in positive terms and by the failure to refute their testimony. There are two areas where DiPirro presented testimony consistent with that of Thone and Greenberg. In isolation, these matters may seem insignificant. However, in the context of the vagueness of DiPirro's testimony, I conclude that such corroboration provides some added basis of reliance upon Thone and Greenberg.

Thone testified that when DiPirro confronted him in March with the DLP "falsification," he (Thone) commented that DiPirro should not make such a "big deal" out of it. When examined from the bench, DiPirro recalled that Thone had said "'Don't make a big deal out of it, or a big issue, one or the other." Seemingly, this bit of corroborative testimony is of little importance. However, witness credibility herein is a key factor in resolving the issues. Virtually every major area contains conflicting evidence from the opposing witnesses. The search for the truth must, therefore, be based on microscopic analysis.

I recognize that to conclude, as I do, that DiPirro has corroborated Thone is equally susceptible to the conclusion that Thone has corroborated DiPirro. However, it has already been demonstrated that DiPirro was vague, confused, and imprecise. Viewed in its totality, I find Thone's testimony internally consistent, inherently logical, forthright, precise, and comprehensive. These factors persuade me that the corroborative evidence should be utilized to enhance Thone's credibility.

As to corroboration of Leland Greenberg, when DiPirro finally unraveled his testimony concerning his conversation with Greenberg over the DLP "falsification," DiPirro claimed (consistent with Greenberg) that he referred to Thone's former disciplinary problems. Thus, DiPirro testified that he told Greenberg he could not overlook Thone's "situation." According to DiPirro, Greenberg asked him to "drop it."

In his testimony concerning the April conversation, Greenberg testified, in part, that DiPirro asked Greenberg to tell Thone to stop filing grievances or he would be terminated.

I credit Greenberg. The agreement between DiPirro and Greenberg that DiPirro referred to Thone's disciplinary history provides a logical sequence to Thone's narration. I have earlier noted that DiPirro was disturbed over Thone's increased grievance filings. DiPirro had "lectured" Thone about them. Also, Greenberg's testimony regarding the April conversation is consistent with that of what occurred between him and DiPirro on December 17, 1979. In the earlier conversation, DiPirro warned that Thone would be terminated unless he discontinued familiarizing new agents with procedures.[15] Finally, I have noted that DiPirro expressed concern over Thone's grievance activity in his discussion regarding the March 20 grievance. At that time DiPirro himself testified that he would have preferred Thone to discuss the blocking of books with him on an informal basis.

In the foregoing backdrop, it is plausible that the April conversation occurred as described by Greenberg. DiPirro was armed with Thone's disciplinary history. Earlier, he had alluded to the plausibility that Thone might be again disciplined. DiPirro clearly was disturbed by Thone's grievance and other steward activity. In this context, I conclude that Greenberg's testimony to the effect that the April discharge threat actually was made by DiPirro flows out of logical progression from the prior events and the setting in which the April conversation occurred.

Even accepting DiPirro's testimony as true, the same result follows. Thus, assuming Greenberg actually asked DiPirro to "drop it," such a remark reasonably is a consequence of the alleged unlawful threat Greenberg attributed to DiPirro. Unless Greenberg had been confronted with some type of threat, the request to "drop it" has no predicate and is unexplained.

In another area I consider important, DiPirro made no effort to refute the testimony of the General Counsel's witness Morrison. As reported above, Morrison testified DiPirro helped him prepare the audit report. Specifically, the emphasized language appearing supra, was provided in the audit report by DiPirro. He was not asked to deny he had participated in the preparation of Morrison's audit report, as claimed by Morrison. The failure to attempt rebuttal of Morrison's testimony lends credence to his account.

4. Employer witness Daniels

Employer witness Daniels was self-contradictory and evasive. Although DiPirro recommended Thone's discharge in his April 9 letter to Topjian, it was Daniels who made the final decision and wrote the May 6 termination letter. During his direct examination, Daniels unequivocally denied knowledge of Thone's union activities. In this connection, he asserted without contradiction, that he is not directly involved in the grievance procedure. Nonetheless, Daniels acknowledged that he is made aware of grievances filed.

Later, during his testimony, Daniels admitted that, at the time he terminated Thone, he knew Thone was union steward at the Methuen office. Further, Daniels asserted that he discussed the Employer's reaction to the audit report with Topjian prior to the decision to terminate Thone. Daniels' testimony proceeded:

> Q. Did you know anything in detail about what he was doing as office chairman in the office?
> A. Not as office chairman.

Interestingly, Daniels was not then asked to be more specific. His direct examination did not return to the subject of Daniels' knowledge of what grievances might have been filed by Thone. Instead, Daniels' testimony ended with his unequivocal denial that he considered Thone's union activities in the decision to discharge.

I conclude the above discussion of Daniels' testimony contains a subtle self-contradiction which gives rise to a demonstrable effort to evade. Daniels' initial claim that he had no knowledge of Thone's union activity is directly contradicted by his admission that he was aware Thone was union steward. Also, Daniels' carefully phrased response that he was unaware of what Thone was doing "as office chairman" is contradictory to Daniels' practice of being advised of grievance filings. These contradictions, considered in the light of the predischarge discussions between Daniels and Topjian, render it difficult to believe Daniels was not apprised of all of Thone's activities. This is especially true because the Employer digressed from its normal termination practices in Thone's case.

The record reflects that the normal termination procedure does not involve Daniels. Customarily, district managers request employees to resign rather than be discharged. In the 2 years immediately preceding Thone's discharge, Daniels participated in the termination of only two others. If Thone's union activities had not been a consideration in Daniels' discharge decision it is unlikely he would have become involved in the instant case. Thus, I do not credit his unequivocal denial to the contrary.

5. Morrison's testimony

Morrison's testimony regarding Topjian's statements of animus is more plausible than Topjian's denial. Morrison testified, inter alia, that Topjian referred to Thone as a "pain in the a—" more than once since January 1980. DiPirro was not asked to deny he made these remarks.

Also, Morrison testified that Topjian spoke to him shortly before Morrison conducted the March audit over the alleged DLP "falsification." At that time, Topjian asked for a description of the M card procedures. During their conversation, according to Morrison, Topjian said, "We'll have to get this b— and we will."

Morrison's testimony was extensive and comprehensive. He appeared relaxed and testified in a forthright and direct manner. DiPirro's testimony was quite brief. He unequivocally denied telling Morrison the Employer would have to "get" Thone. However, as noted, Topjian did not seek to refute the reference to Thone as a "pain in the a—."

I credit Morrison's undenied testimony that Topjian had called Thone a "pain in the a—." Those references occurred as early as January 1980. The audit was conducted 2 months later. I find it plausible that Topjian said the Employer would "get this b—" at that time.

Such remark is the logical culmination of Topjian's view of Thone as a "pain in the a—."

The undisputed evidence makes it plausible that Topjian harbored the feelings and uttered the expressions attributed to him by Morrison. Thus, Topjian regularly was involved in grievance processing. Each of the grievances Thone filed reached Topjian. Twice, Topjian overruled DiPirro's denial of grievances filed by Thone (the August 6, 1979, and December 17, 1979, grievances). The three additional grievances filed by Thone in early 1980 also reached Topjian's attention.

I conclude that these events, coupled with Topjian's failure to deny he made the "pain in the a—" comment, lend credence to Morrison's testimony regarding what Topjian said to him. Accordingly, wherever conflicts exist in their testimony, I credit Morrison.

6. Conclusions

Apparent deficiencies in the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses are insufficient to cause them to be discredited.

(a) Karen Greenberg testified that, on April 20, DiPirro spoke to her and Leland Greenberg. Karen (Leland's wife) recalled DiPirro said, "please tell Thone if he didn't stop filing grievances they'd find a way to get rid of him." Leland Greenberg testified that DiPirro displayed a "folder" and said "these are the problems we're having with him [Thone], and we have enough on him. We're going to get rid of him. He's caused enough trouble and we want him out, and you better tell him just to knock off all he's doing. Tell Thone to stop filing grievances or he'd be terminated."

The Employer argues that neither Karen nor Leland Greenberg should be credited. I have already discussed why I credit Leland over DiPirro.

As to Karen, the Employer claims the indisputable chronology vitiates reliance on her testimony. I disagree.

It is true, as the Employer observes, that DiPirro's discharge recommendation (April 9) preceded the conversation during which the Greenbergs claim DiPirro threatened Thone's discharge for filing grievances. The Employer argues it is implausible to believe the threat postdated the recommendation. In other circumstances, the Employer's contention might have merit. However, I find the chronology not inconsistent with other statements of DiPirro on April 20. Also, it is consistent with extrinsic events. Thus, Leland Greenberg's account shows DiPirro had asserted the Employer was "going to get rid of" Thone. I consider that statement an allusion, albeit not specific, to DiPirro's April 9 discharge recommendation. Also, I conclude the reference to the "problems" Thone was causing and the conclusion "he's caused enough trouble" to be expressions of DiPirro's own consternation over Thone's grievance activity.

Finally, the chronology shows that on April 20 no action yet had been taken by either Topjian or Daniels upon the discharge recommendation. In this context, I find it likely DiPirro would have asked that Thone be warned to "stop filing grievances" or suffer termination. I consider it unlikely that DiPirro would have announced his recommendation to the Greenbergs, his subordinate employees,[16] before his superiors acted on it. It is more reasonable that DiPirro would have said something, as I find he did, which would afford him a way to extricate himself from the possibility that his discharge recommendation were rejected, and to lay a foundation for a possible future discharge recommendation.

Karen Greenberg possibly might be discredited because she was patently evasive. In August 1980, the Employer discharged Leland Greenberg. The reason asserted was that he made misrepresentations to policyholders. Leland grieved his discharge into arbitration, filed unfair labor practice charges with the Board and a civil action against the Employer for slander. The arbitration, Board, and court proceedings were pending when Karen Greenberg testified.

On cross-examination, Karen Greenberg was asked the reason for Leland's discharge, whether or not policyholders complained to the Employer about Leland's activities, and whether the Employer conducted any investigation regarding her husband, and the precise location of their April 20 conversation with DiPirro. To each of these questions, Karen responded, "I don't recall."

Given the apparent notoriety attendant to Leland's discharge, I find it unreasonable to believe Karen actually had no recollection of the events relating to it. Clearly, she was evasive. Nonetheless, this evasive conduct does not warrant my disbelief of her total testimony. A trier of fact is not required to believe the entirety of a witness' testimony. Maximum Precision Metal Products, Inc., Renault Stamping Ltd., 236 NLRB 1417 (1978).

As to the questions regarding her husband's discharge, Karen Greenberg's reluctance to provide candid responses is understandable, though I do not condone such testimonial demeanor. Her direct testimony was extremely brief. It was limited to a description of DiPirro's alleged unlawful discharge threat on April 20 and was presented to corroborate that of her husband. Counsel for the General Counsel interposed an objection, on relevance grounds, to the questions regarding the circumstances surrounding her husband's discharge. I overruled that objection based on my perception of apparent relevance to the credibility issue. Thus, the probity of such evidence was left for my evaluation at this time.

In the peculiar circumstances herein, I conclude the evasive responses to the questions relating to Leland's discharge do not detract from Karen Greenberg's overall credibility upon the subject matter of the April 20 conversation with DiPirro. The pendency of the arbitration, Board, and civil court actions reasonably has an inhibiting impact upon Karen. Moreover, those questions were not germane to her testimony concerning the issues before me. These factors clearly contributed to Karen's reticence.

I do not regard the failure to recall the location of the April 20 conversation so aggravated as to warrant rejection of Karen's otherwise credible testimony of what DiPirro said. Whether Karen stood outside or was in DiPirro's office is of little significance. What is more important is whether she heard what was said. No perceivable effort was made to test her on such matter.

[16] Karen started work for the Employer as a debit agent at the end of January or the beginning of February 1980. She remained employed there until around the beginning of June 1980.

Karen Greenberg did not narrate DiPirro's words in haec verba as her husband. Clearly, she testified to what she independently heard. The record reveals nothing to show her testimony had been rehearsed with her husband. I find her version of what DiPirro said substantially consistent with that of her husband, who has already been credited for reasons previously stated.

Upon all the foregoing, and all other discussion applicable to the April 20 conversation, I credit that aspect of Karen Greenberg's testimony and find that, on April 20, DiPirro, in the presence of both Greenbergs, said Thone would be discharged unless he stopped filing grievances.

(b) Leland Greenberg's credibility is challenged by the Employer on several grounds. Explicitly, the Employer submits that Greenberg is a hostile witness who sought refuge in the Act's protection to immunize himself from attack. The Employer contends Greenberg's self-interest in the pending arbitration, Board, and civil court actions provides the basis for him to be less than candid.[17] By implication, the Employer suggests the circumstances of Greenberg's own termination taint his testimonial assertions.

I agree that the Employer's arguments provide valid considerations in resolving credibility. However, I conclude that these factors, viewed in light of the record as a whole, do not diminish Greenberg's credibility.

First, I have earlier discussed some reasons Greenberg should be credited, supra. Second, Greenberg's account of the April 20 threat by DiPirro was credibly corroborated by his wife. Third, Greenberg's demeanor was impressive. He was forthright, direct, comprehensive, and precise. He was unshaken during cross-examination. Particularly, I noted no apparent hostility in his demeanor. The Employer has provided no transcript citations which objectively demonstrate the claimed hostility. Leland Greenberg testified pursuant to a subpena served upon him by the General Counsel.

In the above context, I conclude that the Employer's assertions relative to Greenberg's credibility are based on surmise and speculation. These formulations do not necessarily prove hostility. I decline to make credibility determinations based on such tenuous grounds when the other above-described sources are available. Accordingly, I reject these credibility arguments which the Employer propounds.

(c) As to Morrison, the Employer asserts his "image had been tarnished by his admission of his own, previously undisclosed, violations of his duty to the Company and its policyholders." Also, the Employer observes that Morrison sat in close proximity to Leland Greenberg and Thone throughout the hearing and his testimony shows "an eagerness" to cast his testimony in a light most favorable to Thone or adverse to the Employer.

The reference to Morrison's tarnished image apparently refers to his testimony that even he had "falsified" DLPs. That revelation was elicited by counsel for the General Counsel clearly to provide some evidence that the Employer treated Thone in a disparate manner. Morrison had not been subjected to any disciplinary action for his infraction. There is no evidence that the Employer was aware of Morrison's dereliction. In any event, as will be shown below, I do not base my decision on the merits upon a claim of disparate treatment.

Morrison's testimony does not taint his credibility. It shows no eagerness to slant it. Morrison simply responded to a legitimate area of inquiry by counsel for the General Counsel. He told what he knew. In this connection, there is evidence that debit agent Dubois had similarly placed incorrect DLPs on M cards. Dubois was not disciplined. There is evidence to justify the Employer's failure to act against Dubois. Nonetheless, Dubois' situation tends to show that Morrison was not fabricating evidence when he claimed he, too, had made incorrect DLP entries.

I place no significance in Morrison's choice of seats in the hearing room. He was a witness for the General Counsel. All such witnesses were more or less grouped together during the course of the hearing. This aspect of the Employer's challenge to Morrison has no merit.

The assertion that Morrison seemed eager to give testimony supporting the General Counsel's case is rejected. As previously noted, and as will be further demonstrated below, I consider Morrison's testimony regarding preparation of the audit report an important element of the General Counsel's prima facie case. In that area, the Employer made no effort to refute Morrison's testimony. Specifically, his assertions that the audit report contains references to Thone's work which were effectively inserted by DiPirro remain undenied. Such uncontradicted testimony belies this aspect of the attack upon Morrison's credibility.

Finally, the record shows that Morrison left his job with the Employer in August 1980 under disagreeable circumstances. Morrison had resigned, apparently voluntarily. However, he and Topjian then disagreed with Morrison's personal timetable for leaving. Morrison told DiPirro of his displeasure with Topjian. I find this incident an insufficient basis to discredit Morrison. I have assessed this circumstance against Morrison's general demeanor, his uncontradicted testimony, and all other factors discussed which relate to his credibility, and conclude that the record as a whole shows him to be a credible witness.

C. Analysis

1. Interference, restraint, and coercion

In complaint paragraph 8(a) it is alleged that, on or about April 24, DiPirro threatened employees with discharge for engaging in protected concerted or union activities.

As earlier observed, this allegation is based on DiPirro's April 20 statement to the Greenbergs to the effect Thone would be terminated unless he stopped filing grievances.

The Employer contends that there is no evidence that Thone had been engaged in conduct protected by the Act. The Employer argues at length that the evidence herein does not show Thone's activity was designed to "attempt to induce, prepare for, or contemplate group action." Specifically, the Employer contends "Thone's contacts with group agents cannot be considered protected activity."[18]

[17] In this connection, it is self-evident that each Employer official who testified in its behalf is equally vulnerable to attack on grounds of self-interest.

I conclude that the Employer's arguments are misplaced. The General Counsel claims it is Thone's grievance filings and advice regarding the employees' collective-bargaining rights which comprise the requisite protected activity. It is well established that grievance filing is within the umbrella of the Act's protection. The underlying rationale of this principle is designed to promote the viability of collective bargaining. It assures employees of maximum benefits of their collective-bargaining agreement. E.g., Crown Wrecking Co., Inc., 222 NLRB 958, 962-963 (1976). Indeed, the right to file grievances, and have them adjusted, is explicitly granted in Section 9(a) of the Act.

Arguably, the Employer is correct that the subject warnings given to new agents exceed permissible activity. The Supreme Court, in N.L.R.B. v. Local Union No. 1229, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers [Jefferson Standard Broadcasting Company], 346 U.S. 464, 472 (1953), stated, "There is no more elemental cause for discharge of an employee than disloyalty to his employer."

Thereafter, the Board has had occasion to consider types of employee conduct which might establish such disloyalty as to remove the conduct from the protection of the Act. In Jeannette Corporation, 217 NLRB 653 (1975), enfd. 532 F.2d 916 (3d Cir. 1976), the Board held that employees who breached confidential salary information in violation of their employer's rule were engaged in protected activity; in Community Hospital of Roanoke Valley, Inc., 220 NLRB 217 (1975), enfd. 538 F.2d 607 (4th Cir. 1976), disparagement of an employer or its business activities were held protected; in American Arbitration Association, Inc., 233 NLRB 71 (1977), the sending of letters and a questionnaire to the employer's clients concerning its dress code was held concerted activity, although the sarcastic and denigrating tone of the letters removed the employees from the Act's protection; and in Automobile Club of Michigan, et al., 231 NLRB 1179 (1977), the Board agreed that an employee press release was defamatory but nonetheless held that the employees were engaged in protected activity. The Board concluded that the employer's remedy was a suit in defamation and not disciplinary action against the employees.

In N.L.R.B. v. Circle Bindery, Inc., 536 F.2d 447, 452-453 (1st Cir. 1976), enfg. 218 NLRB 861 (1975), it was held that the fact the employer might lose business because of an employee's advice to his union that the employer was preparing a booklet which did not carry a union label did not render such conduct unprotected.

In the case at bar, I conclude that the warnings against writing policies on friends and agents reasonably are tantamount to legitimate advice regarding the employees' collective-bargaining rights and obligations. The parties' collective-bargaining agreement contains a quite broad reservation to the Employer (art. VII, discharge) regarding termination. In salient part, that clause retains in the Employer "full and complete power of discharge and discipline of all employees for just and sufficient cause . . ." with a grant to the Union of a privilege to arbitrate such matters.

The parties stipulated that the Employer maintains no rules and regulations governing employee conduct and discipline. In these circumstances, it is reasonable that a steward should be free to impart to the new agents his understandings and beliefs concerning possible discipline. To prevent such discussion effectively would undermine the Union's representational standing granted by the Act.

In my view, Thone's actions in this regard were not so indefensibly disloyal as to remove them from their protected character. Advising employees of their rights under a collective-bargaining agreement is an activity which the Act protects. In Clara Barton Terrace Convalescent Center, etc., 225 NLRB 1028 (1976), a union official's letter, "abrupt or officious in tone," which protected grievance rights, was held within the Act's protection. Herein, I conclude Thone's advice to new agents was in furtherance of his duties which, in part and in his words, were the "appraisal [sic] of . . . what protection they had under the contract."

The sinister significance attached to Thone's warnings to the agents by DiPirro looms as a figment of DiPirro's apparent resolve to rid himself of Thone. The record shows that it was Stankard who reported to DiPirro that Thone was advising against writing policies for friends and relatives. DiPirro made only a shallow investigation. Thus, he contacted only one unidentified agent from whom he determined that Thone did give such advice. However, the interpretation which the Employer claims is objectionable strictly was DiPirro's. There is no evidence he made any effort whatsoever to confront Thone with his comments. Had he done so, he surely would have received the same explanation provided by Thone in the witness chair and which I have found to be reasonable.

Upon all the foregoing, I conclude that Thone's grievance filings and giving advice as steward to new agents constituted protected union activity.

The test for 8(a)(1) conduct is whether it reasonably tends to interfere with, restrain, and coerce employees in the exercise of their statutory rights. Keystone Pretzel Bakery, Inc., 242 NLRB 492 (1979), citing Hanes Hosiery, Inc., 219 NLRB 338 (1975).

The credited evidence shows, that on April 20, DiPirro said Thone would be discharged unless he stopped filing grievances. I conclude the clear meaning of those words imparts a threat of disciplinary action conditioned upon ending the activities found herein to be protected.

The remark was made to both Greenbergs, each of whom was employed by the instant Employer at the time.

No extensive analysis or discussion is necessary to demonstrate the coercive character of DiPirro's statement. Indisputably, it bears adversely upon employees' Section 7 rights. In the instant case, DiPirro's statement impedes the statutory and contractual right to file grievances and the general ability of Thone, as steward, to communicate with the employees whom he represents on matters appropriate for maintenance of the stability of the collective-bargaining relationship. See Ohio Ferro-Alloys Corporation, 209 NLRB 577, 578 (1974); Superior Motor Transportation Co., Inc., 200 NLRB 892, 893 (1972).

[18] This is an apparent reference to the inclusion in DiPirro's April 9 letter of Thone's warnings to new agents that they would be terminated if they wrote business on friends and relatives.

Accordingly, I find that the Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged in complaint paragraph 8(a).

2. Discrimination

In the aggregate, complaint paragraphs 9-13 allege that Thone's May 8 discharge and subsequent failure to be reinstated are discriminatory within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

The Employer's position may be fairly summarized as follows: The Employer and the Union have maintained a long-standing collective-bargaining relationship void of evidence of union animus; none of the General Counsel's witnesses testified to any statement or other indicia of such animus; and the record shows that the alleged "falsification" which caused misapplication of policyholder funds was not a common practice among the agents. Thus, the Employer argues that Thone, by his misconduct, provoked his discharge. Affirmatively, the Employer pleads that "Thone was discharged for a record of offenses beginning in 1971" and culminating in the "falsification" of DLPs discovered in March 1980.

Both the General Counsel and the Employer submit that the instant case is not one which involves a so-called dual motive. In any event, the Employer argues that the evidence has sufficiently rebutted any prima facie case which may have been established by the General Counsel.

In Wright Line, A Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), the Board declared that in dual motive cases the General Counsel must first prove the existence of a prima facie case showing that the alleged discrimination was motivated by antiunion considerations. Thereafter, the burden of proof shifts to Respondent to demonstrate it would have taken the action alleged as discriminatory even in the absence of the employees' protected activity. The test of causality applied by the Supreme Court in Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977), was adopted by the Board.

Recently, the Board has indicated the same test may apply to so-called "pretext" cases. Limestone Apparel Corp., 255 NLRB 722 (1981). See also Castle Instant Maintenance/Maid, Inc., 256 NLRB 130 (1981).

In Quality Broadcasting Corp. of San Juan d/b/a WQBS—AM Radio Station "La Gran Cadena," 254 NLRB 960 (1981), the Board reconsidered its Decision and Order in 241 NLRB 318 (1979), in the light of various relevant decisions of the First Circuit Court of Appeals which had jurisdiction over the subject matter involved in Quality Broadcasting. Specifically, the First Circuit addressed the issue of the element of motivation requisite to the General Counsel's prima facie case of alleged discrimination under the Act. Thus, the Board took cognizance of N.L.R.B. v. Eastern Smelting and Refining Corporation, 598 F.2d 666 (1979); Liberty Mutual Insurance Company v. N.L.R.B., 592 F.2d 595 (1979); Coletti's Furniture, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 550 F.2d 1292 (1977); and N.L.R.B. v. Billen Shoe Co., Inc., 397 F.2d 801 (1968). Additionally, the Board's reconsideration of the Quality Broadcasting decision was made in the light of Wright Line.

The Board's reconsideration of Quality Broadcasting resulted in issuance of a Supplemental Decision and Order. Therein, the Board concluded at footnote 4 that case was "essentially a pretext case, i.e., one in which the Employer's defense of business justification is found to be without merit. The General Counsel presented a prima facie case that the discharge . . . was unlawfully motivated . . . . Although Respondent attempted to demonstrate that it discharged [the discriminatee] because of poor work performance, it was unable to present convincing evidence in support of that defense." Further, the Board concluded "although the instant case is a pretext case, not a dual motivation case, we find that under any analysis Respondent's discharge . . . violated . . . the Act." In so concluding, the Board noted that the tests applied both by the Board and its Administrative Law Judge were consistent with the First Circuit pronouncements of the applicable standard to be used in the type of issue presented in Quality Broadcasting. The Board further observed that its Wright Line test places a greater burden of proof on the General Counsel than is required by Mt. Healthy. The Board stated, at footnote 5 in Quality Broadcasting, that the First Circuit "appeared to have moved away from the 'dominant motive' test towards adoption of the test outlined in Mt. Healthy."

The First Circuit recently had another occasion to consider the motivational issue in 8(a)(3) cases. Thus, in Wyman-Gordon Company v. N.L.R.B., 654 F.2d 134, 141 (1981), a dual motive case, the court declared "the initial inquiry is whether the Board has made a prima facie showing that a "'significant" improper motivation' underlay the discharge decision." The court cited its decisions in Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666, 671 (1981), and Statler Industries, 644 F.2d 902, 905 (1981). Additionally, the court reiterated that the burden of proof shifts to a respondent to establish "that it had a good reason, sufficient in itself, to produce the discharge." Ibid. The court noted this shifting burden "does not impose an overall burden upon the Company to prove itself innocent of violating the statutes. Rather, the Company must come forward with evidence to the point where no longer does a preponderance of the evidence establish a violation." 91 LC at ¶18,174.

The composite of the foregoing decisional authority of the court and Board presents consistent views of the evidentiary burdens which are to be utilized in resolving the allegations of discrimination in the case at bar. My analysis, based thereon, appears below.

First, I conclude, in agreement with the parties, that the instant matter presents a pretext issue. As will be explicated below, the Employer's defense that Thone's purported "falsification" of DLPs in March 1980, together with his prior history of discipline, was a serious consideration and justification for his discharge is not convincing.

3. The General Counsel's prima facie case

a. Protected activity

The above-described findings of fact show that Thone had been, at all material times, engaged in protected union activity which consisted of grievance filing and processing, and of advising employees of their collective-bargaining rights. No further discussion of this prima facie element is necessary. I find this ingredient of the General Counsel's present herein.

b. Knowledge

The record contains ample evidence of this prima facie element. Indeed, it is undisputed. The Employer admits it was fully aware of Thone's grievance activities. Moreover, DiPirro's April 9 letter and his "lecturing" of Thone over looking for things upon which to file grievances demonstrate his awareness of Thone's counseling other employees regarding their collective-bargaining rights.

c. Antiunion motivation

I conclude that there is substantial direct and circumstantial evidence of unlawful motivation. Such evidence consists of:

(1) The variety of DiPirro's expressions of hostility toward Thone's exercise of protected activities. These expressions are: the December 17 remark to Thone that the Employer would "get" him made in the context of asking Thone to withdraw the Schau grievance; the December 17 request to Greenberg to have Thone knock off the "b— s—," concerning his counseling activities; the "lecturing" of Thone not to look for matters over which to file grievances.[19]

(2) Topjian's comments to Morrison that "we have to get the b—" and that Thone was a "pain in the a—." These statements are illuminating. They provide a nexus for evaluating the true causation of Thone's discharge. Apparently, Topjian's principal contact with Thone was through the grievance procedure. Topjian was intimately acquainted with Thone's activity in that connection. Topjian regularly worked in the Canton home office, separated from Thone. Thus, the profane references to Thone reasonably are equated with, and demonstrate, Topjian's dislike of Thone's protected activities.

(3) DiPirro's instructions to Morrison to insert DiPirro's detrimental conclusions about Thone into the audit report. I conclude that DiPirro's intervention is indicative of the depth of his animosity toward Thone resulting from the latter's protected activities. I recognize the possibility that DiPirro's hostility may be considered based purely upon personality differences between him and Thone. This is particularly true in context of having been overruled on grievance dispositions twice by Topjian. However, the record in its entirety shows Thone had been persistent in his protected activity. It was, therefore, in this setting that DiPirro's animosity nurtured. DiPirro's state of mind regarding Thone was directly related to Thone's protected activity. In such circumstances, his animus assumes a proscribed effect. See Magnetics International, Inc., 254 NLRB 520 (1981).

(4) Thone's April 20 threat of discharge which has been found to constitute a violation of Section 8(a)(1). Such unlawful conduct strongly supports a finding of unlawful motivation.

(5) DiPirro grossly exaggerated the documentation supporting his April 9 discharge recommendation. DiPirro's letter, forwarding the audit report, related more than the alleged "falsification." He included a reference to customer MacDonald and then claimed he could "substantiate as many as 15 or 20 additional" identical cases. The quoted language is conjectural on its face. No documentation was provided.

DiPirro then set forth his generalized conclusionary comment that the loss of customer Carbonneau's business was due to Thone's poor business practices and inattentiveness to customer service. However, DiPirro provided no specific support for this characterization of Thone's work habits.

The April 9 letter referred to more than a dozen customer complaints made to Stankard over Thone's demeanor. No specific information attended this generalized observation.

DiPirro enclosed a single page from Thone's collection book to support his generalized claim that Thone was ignoring company procedures. In my view, such selective action tends to support a conclusion that DiPirro was attempting to distort circumstances against Thone.

DiPirro then reminded Topjian of Thone's disciplinary history. I will conclude, infra, this history could have played no operative part in the decision to discharge Thone. Accordingly, this historical reference is viewed as an element of exaggeration.

Finally, DiPirro's April 9 letter contains what is, perhaps, the most revealing bit of exaggeration and evidence of unlawful motivation. That reference is to Thone's advice to new agents not to write policies for friends and relatives. I have earlier noted that the casting of Thone's advice in terms unflattering to the Employer was DiPirro's abberration, pure and simple. His investigation of the incident was shallow. To have included his conclusions based upon it is strong evidence of the length to which DiPirro would go to rid himself of Thone.

In sum, I conclude that the totality and tenor of DiPirro's April 9 letter shows DiPirro harbored animus against Thone's protected activities and provides a reasonable basis for an inference that the discharge recommendation was discriminatorily motivated.

Upon all the foregoing discussion concerning the element of motivation, I conclude that the General Counsel has satisfied his burden.

4. The Employer's defense

I conclude that the Employer's defense does not withstand scrutiny. It is true there is no evidence that the Union enjoyed less than harmonious relationships with the Employer. There is no evidence the Employer has a proclivity to violate the Act. Nonetheless, these factors must be balanced against the credited evidence showing antipathy to Thone's protected activities.

[19] In this connection, I find no cogent evidence that Thone's activities disrupted the Employer's operations. There is only DiPirro's bare assertion to that effect.

Ostensibly, the Employer had good reason to discipline Thone. His previous offenses and disciplinary history might well support the subject discharge. However, as noted, the Employer's burden of proof requires a showing that it would have discharged Thone even if he had not been engaged in protected activity. I conclude that this burden has not been met.

(a) The Employer's reliance upon Thone's disciplinary history is not persuasive. Thone was merely orally reprimanded on November 16, 1971, for applying dividends without customer authorization. That offense was similar, if not identical, to that which the Employer asserts caused the instant discharge. The letter reporting the 1971 incident reflects that Thone had apparently signed a customer's signature to a dividend application request. Such activity is, at least, tantamount to a "falsification."

The February 1975 infraction involved a deficiency in Thone's accounts. He was explicitly warned that further violations would result in his "immediate termination." The March 1977, December 1979, and March 11, 1980, disciplines were imposed for Thone's failure to timely lapse policies. He was only orally reprimanded for the first such offense. The second two resulted in written warnings. These second and third warnings advised he would be suspended or terminated for future violations.

The above history shows the Employer long tolerated numerous breaches by Thone of his work obligations. Even repetitions of a particular offense (submission of lapses on time) were no more severely punished than by a written warning, although previous written warnings spoke of vulnerability to suspension or termination. Additionally, in 1971, Thone engaged in a "falsification" of sorts. At that time, that offense warranted only an oral reprimand.

I agree with the Employer that the disciplinary history is a most relevant factor herein. This is so because written rules and company policy do not exist. It may be argued that their absence justifies the Employer imposing whatever discipline it chooses, at any time and for any reason it selects, on a case-by-case basis. However true that may be, the Employer's actions must be evaluated in the light of all circumstances.

Thone was discharged twice. In 1974, his accounts showed a monetary deficiency. He could not explain that condition. In contrast, the instant discharge occurred over insertion of wrong DLPs on M cards. There is no showing the Employer suffered any financial loss. Thone's benefit would have been minimal—30 cents per week for 13 weeks! Moreover, Morrison's audit showed that eight of the nine customers were satisfied with the result of Thone's activity. Only one wanted the dividend application to be reversed. Finally, DiPirro's April 9 letter shows that the alleged misuse of funds actually had not occurred. Thus, the letter concludes, "I am not presently going to apply these dividends, as I believe by law we do not have the right to use them." Thus, it appears, without deciding, that Thone's 1980 offense was less egregious than that of 1971. The quoted words cast substantial doubt that the alleged "falsification" occurred at all.

Had Thone's discharge occurred in the absence of his apparently accelerated protected activities, there would be a basis for accepting the Employer's contentions. However, those protected activities, together with DiPirro's and Topjian's verbal reactions thereto, are critical intervening factors which impact upon the Employer's evidentiary burden. The various expressions of animus remove respectability from the claim that Thone was terminated for good cause. Rather, I conclude that they fortify the General Counsel's contention that the defense is pretextual.

(b) Daniels' denial that Thone's protected activity was not an element in the discharge is refuted by his demeanor and other circumstances. I have noted that Daniels was evasive in a critical area. Moreover, whatever value he provided the Employer is vitiated by the evidence that the Employer deviated from past practice in Thone's discharge. Regional managers have general authority to terminate employees. That authority was exercised as to Thone in 1974 by Longshaw. Nonetheless, it was Daniels, and not Regional Manager DiPirro, who effectuated the 1980 discharge.

The two agents who had been discharged by Daniels in 1978 and 1980 prior to Thone were terminated by him for patently more serious offenses. Thus, agent Keene had advised customers to withdraw their funds from permanent life insurance and agent LeGarde requested customers to surrender their policies for cash and apply such cash to policies with a competitor.

Daniels' termination of Thone, as an isolated event, presents only suspicious circumstances. However, compared to the nature of the offenses for which he personally earlier imposed discharge, there appears to be no reason for him to have become involved in Thone's case. Given the peremptory discipline authority of regional managers, it is not unreasonable to conclude that DiPirro's failure to impose Thone's 1980 discharge was based on special circumstances. I conclude herein that the Employer has not satisfactorily adduced evidence that such special circumstances existed. There is scant, if any, evidence to explain why it was Daniels who discharged Thone. It is reasonably inferable that the protected activities played a part in Daniels' discharge decision. Cf. Fayette Cotton Mill, 245 NLRB 428 (1979).

(c) The Employer has not proved that Thone's infraction was sufficient cause for discharge. The Employer contends it was not a common practice among agents to insert wrong DLPs on M cards.

All of the Employer's witnesses who alluded to this subject disclaimed knowledge that agents had engaged in this practice. However, the Employer produced no debit agents to testify on this issue. Thus, the Employer's proof rests upon credibility resolutions. I have credited Morrison's assertion that he inserted the wrong DLPs. Even though the Employer may have been ignorant of that fact, that Morrison engaged in such conduct diminishes the strength of the Employer's contentions to the contrary. There is a lack of credible evidence to sustain this aspect of the defense.

(d) There is no substance to the Employer's claim that there is no direct evidence of animus.

The credited evidence shows that DiPirro unlawfully threatened to discharge employees for filing grievances. Thus, I conclude that the Employer has not borne its burden in this respect.

The foregoing discussion convinces me that the Employer has not shown it had good reason, sufficient in itself, to discharge Thone. There is insufficient evidence effectively to rebut the General Counsel's prima facie case. That prima facie case, in its totality, leads me to conclude that the Employer's defense is a pretext. The various warnings of possible termination given to Thone throughout his employment cannot be considered mere rhetoric. Had each subsequent offense warranted termination, the Employer surely would have imposed that discipline. It is apparent that the Employer considered Thone's offenses, however slight, actionable only when accompanied by his pervasive protected union activity. On the state of this record, I find that DiPirro's and Topjian's expressed annoyance and resentment of Thone's accelerated grievance filing and counseling activities in his role as steward comprised the initial and motivating cause of his discharge. Thus, the General Counsel's burden of proof of causality has been satisfied.

Upon all the foregoing, I find that Thone was discriminatorily discharged as alleged in the complaint.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW[20]

1. Boston Mutual Life Insurance Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Insurance Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Employer interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when DiPirro, on April 20, told Leland Greenberg and Karen Greenberg that Thone would be discharged unless he stopped filing grievances.

4. By discharging Francis A. Thone on May 8, 1980, because he engaged in the protected union activities of filing grievances and counseling other employees in his role as office chairman, the Employer discriminated against employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act I shall recommend it cease and desist from engaging in such conduct in the future and affirmatively take such action as will dissipate the effects of its unfair labor practices.

To remedy Thone's discriminatory discharge, the Order shall require the Employer to offer him immediate and full reinstatement to his former position of employment as debit agent in the Employer's Methuen, Massachusetts, office or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position of employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights, privileges, and benefits to which he was entitled, and to make Thone whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the discriminatory discharge, by payment of a sum equal to that which he would have earned, absent the discrimination, to the date of the Employer's offer of reinstatement. Loss of earnings shall be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Inasmuch as the record contains no evidence of a proclivity to violate the Act, I conclude that it is not necessary that the Order contain broad proscriptive language. See Hickmott Foods, Inc., 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). However, the Employer shall be ordered to refrain from in any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

Upon the above findings of fact, conclusions of law, the entire record of this case, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[21]

The Respondent, Boston Mutual Life Insurance Company, Methuen, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Threatening to discharge employees unless they stop filing grievances.

(b) Discharging any of its employees because they engage in union activities.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of any of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the act:

2. Take the following affirmative action which it is found will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to Francis A. Thone to his former position as debit agent in the Methuen, Massachusetts, office or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position of employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights, privileges, and benefits; and make him whole in the manner prescribed above in the section entitled "The Remedy" for any loss of pay or other benefits suffered by reason of his discharge on May 8, 1980.

(b) Preserve, and upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

[20] In view of the Conclusions of Law set forth below, the Employer's written motion to dismiss is denied in its totality.

[21] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Post at its Methuen, Massachusetts, location copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[22] Copies said notice on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being duly signed by an authorized representative of the Employer shall be posted by the Employer immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Employer to insure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 1, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Goverment

After a hearing in which all parties were represented by their attorneys and were given the opportunity to present evidence in support of their respective positions, it has been found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, in certain ways and we have been ordered to post this notice and to carry out its terms.

The Act gives all employees the following rights:

To organize themselves into labor organizations

To form, join, or support unions

To bargain as a group through a representative they choose

To act together for collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from any or all such activities except to the extent that the employees' bargaining representative and employer have a collective-bargaining agreement which imposes a lawful requirement that employees become union members.

In recognition of these rights, we hereby notify you that:

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge any of you because you file grievances.

WE WILL NOT discharge any of you because you engage in union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce any of you in the exercise of any of the rights described above.

WE WILL offer Francis A. Thone immediate and full reinstatement to his former position with us as a debit agent in our Methuen, Massachusetts, office or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights, privileges and benefits; and WE WILL make him whole, with interest, for all loss of earnings resulting from his discharge on May 8, 1980.

BOSTON MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

January 28, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS FANNING AND HUNTER

On August 14, 1981, Administrative Law Judge D. Barry Morris issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and briefs in support thereof and in reply to Respondent's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.[3]

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Insert the following as new Conclusion of Law 4, and renumber the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"4. By impliedly promising employees that, if they voted against the Union, Respondent's president would bequeath the shares of Respondent to the employees upon his death, Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act."

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Datagraphic, Inc., Rochester, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Insert the following as new paragraphs 1(b) and (c) and reletter the subsequent paragraph accordingly:

"(b) Impliedly promising employees that if they vote against Graphic Arts International Union, or any other labor organization, Respondent's president will bequeath the shares of Respondent to the employees upon his death.

"(c) Discharging or otherwise disciplining any supervisor because said supervisor failed or refused to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act."

2. Insert the following as paragraph 2(b) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees for activities protected by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL NOT impliedly promise employees that if they vote against Graphic Arts International Union, or any other labor organization, the company president will bequeath the shares of the Company to the employees upon his death.

[1] Respondent and the General Counsel have excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] We adopt the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Respondent's asserted reasons for discharging Supervisor Maynard were pretextual. In so doing, we note that the reasons given Maynard at the time of his discharge, i.e., that he was an ineffective supervisor, did not carry out company policies, and improperly used supervisory discretion, were general and conclusory and may have been references to his refusal to commit unfair labor practices. Furthermore, although at the hearing Respondent presented vague testimony that Maynard was discharged because of communication problems with employees and because of his poor handling of inventory, the record fails to establish that any such problems were other than isolated instances. Finally, there is no evidence that Respondent at any time informed Maynard that he had shortcomings in these areas which could result in his discharge or otherwise adversely affect his employment.

[3] The Administrative Law Judge found, and we agree, that Respondent impliedly promised employees that, if they voted against the Union, Respondent's president would bequeath the shares of the Company to the employees upon his death. The Administrative Law Judge, however, failed to make a specific finding as to whether this conduct was unlawful. We conclude that such reasonably tended to interfere with the employees' rights and therefore was violate of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. We shall amend the Administrative Law Judge's Conclusions of Law and modify his recommended Order and notice accordingly.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discipline any supervisor because said supervisor failed or refused to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer full and immediate reinstatement to Brian Maynard and Louis Walker, Jr., to their positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

WE WILL make whole Brian Maynard and Louis Walker, Jr., for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of their discharges, with interest.

DATAGRAPHIC, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

D. BARRY MORRIS, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Rochester, New York, on March 10-12, 1981. Charges were filed on June 20 and November 10, 1980, and complaints were issued on July 25 and December 18, 1980,[1] alleging that Datagraphic, Inc. (herein called Respondent), violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Respondent filed answers denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

The parties were given full opportunity to participate, produce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue orally, and file briefs. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and Respondent.

Upon the entire record of the case,[2] including my observation of the witnesses, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, a New York corporation, with its principal office and place of business in Rochester, New York, is engaged in the manufacture and sale of business forms and related products. During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaints, Respondent directly sold goods valued in excess of $50,000 from its plant in Rochester to consumers located in States other than New York. Respondent admits that it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and I so find.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Graphic Arts International Union (herein called the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. See Roytype, Division of Litton Business Systems, Inc., 199 NLRB 354 (1972).

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The complaints, as amended, allege that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Brian Maynard because he refused to engage in surveillance of Respondent's employees' union activities; by threatening to change the shift of Louis Walker, Jr., because of his union activities; by issuing Walker a negative evaluation, withholding a pay increase, and discharging him because of his union activities; and by impliedly promising benefits to Respondent's employees if they would vote against the Union. Respondent denied the allegations. The issues, accordingly, are:

1. Was Brian Maynard's discharge a violation of the Act?
2. Was Louis Walker threatened with a change of shift, issued a negative evaluation, and denied a pay increase because of his union activities?
3. Was Louis Walker discharged because of his union activities?
4. Was there an implied promise of benefits to the employees if they would not vote for the Union?

B. The Facts

1. Background

During the spring of 1980, Respondent's employees began to discuss the unionization of Respondent's plant in Rochester. The Union was approached by the employees in April[3] to assist them in organizing. Meetings were held with the Union's president and International representative, and employees signed union authorization cards. A petition was filed by the Union on May 2 with the National Labor Relations Board, seeking to represent all production and maintenance employees at the Rochester plant. An election was held on June 26, but the outcome was not immediately known because three challenged ballots had been cast and were sufficient in number to affect the results. The challenged ballots were subsequently resolved, and on July 28 a revised tally was issued which showed that of the 25 votes counted, 11 had been cast for, and 14 against, the Union.

2. Brian Maynard

Maynard began his employment with Respondent in June 1972. In 1978 he was promoted to the position of pressroom foreman, the position which he held at the time of his discharge. Maynard testified that a meeting was held in April, present were: Allan Shackelford, attorney for Respondent; George Baker, Respondent's president; Carl Cattau, the Rochester plant manager; and the supervisors. Maynard credibly testified that Shackelford and Baker said they were going to "combat" the Union and advised the supervisors, that "there were going to be plenty of meetings with the supervisors, because they were going to be involved with a campaign against the Union." At a subsequent meeting with supervisors, Shackelford told them that they were not permitted to "threaten, interrogate, promise or spy on employees."

[1] The complaint in Case 3-CA-10102 was further amended on February 6, 1981, and at the hearing.

[2] Certain errors in the transcript are hereby noted and corrected.

[3] All dates refer to 1980, unless otherwise specified.

Maynard testified that on June 9, Cattau called him into his office and told him, "Brian, you are the only person who isn't coming forth with tidbits of union information for me." He told Maynard that as of June 11, Maynard would be shifted from operating the Schrieber 800 press[4] and instead be working on the floor where he would "again be involved on a one-to-one basis with the employees." Maynard credibly testified as follows:

> Q. Did Carl say anything else during this meeting?
> A. Yes, he did. He told me to use my family ties and personal relationships with fellow employees at work or at home or at a bar or on and off company property, 24 hours a day, to break-up the union drive.
> Q. Did he say what you were supposed to do?
>
> A. Yes. He told me to tell people that he didn't believe the reason because he had heard only a couple of weeks before the petition was filed. He figured that the union involvement stemmed back way before this. And he felt the people ought to give him a chance to show him that he could do a good job. And he knew that there were promises that were made to people in the past that weren't upheld. He told me there's a chance in the Rochester Plant, if the union got in, that the company would fold. This was two weeks before the election. The election, as far as straw were taken, were still on the union side. He was worried about it. He asked me to use these points, when I talked to these people, because a lot of them I was close with, some of them I was related to; that he thought I could persuade these people to vote for the company.

Maynard further credibly testified as follows:

> Q. Did you say that the company would fold—what did you say about that again?
>
> A. That there was a chance that the Rochester Plant would close down if a union got in.
> Q. And what were you supposed to do with this information?
>
> A. Use it to persuade the employees that I was close with and with family ties, to vote for the company instead of the union.

In addition, Maynard credibly testified:

> Q. [D]id he ask you to use your family contacts and personal relationships to find out anything?
>
> A. Yes. He wanted me to find out information, whatever I could on who was voting which way and report back to him.
> Q. Did he say anything about what if the union lost?
>
> A. Yes. He did.
> Q. What did he say?
>
> A. He said that some people might say he was cleaning house, but he was going to smile as they went out the door.
> Q. Did he say who was going to go out the door?
> A. Yes. He stated that he was going to get the troublemakers out.

Maynard testified that on June 13 he asked to have a meeting with Cattau. At the meeting, he told Cattau that he had been advised that it was illegal for him to do what Cattau had requested. Approximately 1-1/2 hours later Cattau asked to see Maynard. At this time Cattau said, "[Y]ou are terminated because you are an ineffective supervisor; did not carry out the company policies and improper use of supervisor discretion."

Michael Dill, who was production manager of Respondent during 1980, also credibly testified that at a meeting held prior to the election, Cattau mentioned that "George Baker would be working on a plan to turn the company over to the employees in one form or another, when he passed on." Dill testified that in late May or early June, after it appeared that the Union would win the election, Respondent's strategy changed. Dill was requested to talk to several of the employees concerning the Union. Dill corroborated Maynard's testimony that at the time of his discharge, Cattau told him he was being discharged because he was inadequate as a supervisor. In addition, Dill testified that Cattau listed the reasons he was firing Maynard as "improper use of supervisory discretion and I'm not sure if it was unwilling or unable to support company policies."

Cattau testified that at the meeting with Maynard on June 9 he insisted that Maynard initiate conversations with all employees. He stated that he terminated Maynard because of his failure to follow company policy and his failure to act as a supervisor.

Cattau further testified as follows:

> Q. During the course of the campaign, what statement did you make to the employees regarding the possibility of their getting ownership of the company at some point in time?
>
> A. Prior to the election, during one of the weekly meetings that I held; a few days prior to that I had come across a piece of literature in the company files pertaining to the fact that Mr. George Baker had requested a law firm in Atlanta, Georgia, in the latter part of 1979, to investigate the possibility that upon his death the employees of Datagraphic would receive shares or holdings in the Company.

---

[4] The Schrieber press had been delivered in January or February and Maynard had worked on it steadily until June 11.

> Q. Okay. What was the general subject of the conversation of which you mentioned this to the employees?
> A. At that point in time, in our meeting we were discussing benefits. And this was not a benefit being given to the people then, but we were discussing benefits in general; the benefits that they were receiving then and possible benefits in the future.

With respect to the change in policy concerning election tactics, Cattau was asked why he wanted the names of the employees, as opposed to just a tally. He answered:

> [W]e were not really getting enough information; they were not bringing forward the information needed to see how we stood in the campaign. I then took it upon myself to direct them to give individual names and by writing the names and by making a list out of them so that we could get a better feel as to how we were doing in the campaign, and possibly have more of a knowledge as to either changing our strategy in the campaign or to know how we were doing at that point in time.

Maynard's testimony is to a large extent corroborated by the testimony of both Dill and Cattau. On June 9, when it appeared that the Union was winning the election, Respondent decided to change its strategy. Maynard was asked to initiate conversations with employees concerning the Union. I conclude that he was asked to find out from the employees what their feelings were about the Union. In addition, I conclude that he was asked to pass on the information to the employees that if the Union were successful, there was the chance that the Rochester plant would be closed. I find that Maynard was discharged because he refused to involve himself in what he regarded to be illegal activity. I find that the reason given by Cattau for the discharge, that Maynard was an ineffective supervisor, was a mere pretext. I find that the reason Maynard was discharged was because he refused to comply with Cattau's directive that he initiate conversations to ascertain what the feelings of the employees were concerning the Union.

3. Louis Walker, Jr.

a. Discharge

Walker began his employment with Respondent in April 1977. He testified that the union organizing drive began in the spring of 1980, that he went to all of the union meetings which were held before the election, that he signed an authorization card for the Union to represent him, and that he helped solicit others to sign cards.

Walker testified that on October 28 he and another employee, Terry Graham, were standing in front of their presses talking. Vincent DiNicola, another employee, came up to them and overheard their conversation. Walker and Graham complained to DiNicola that DiNicola was getting overtime, whereas Walker and Graham were not. I credit DiNicola's testimony as to what then ensued. DiNicola testified that Walker said to him "I know why you got all the overtime, because Carl is your buddy." DiNicola was very upset by the insinuation that he was a "buddy" of the plant manager. He then returned to his press, but soon came back to where Walker was standing, and took a swing at a pile of boxes that was next to Walker.[5] At thar point DiNicola left the plant. Later in the afternoon DiNicola called Cattau. After telling Cattau what had happened between himself and Walker, Cattau told DiNicola that he was going to fire Walker. Walker testified that that afternoon Cattau called him into his office, showed him the handbook rule against "provoking a fight or any kind of fighting or disruption in the plant," and terminated him.

A number of witnesses testified that there had been several fights in the plant both prior, and subsequent, to the incident between Walker and DiNicola. No one was fired at these times for fighting. Maynard testified that no one was ever fired for fighting or provoking a fight during the 8 years that he was employed at Respondent. Walker and Graham similarly testified. Flynn testified that he was involved in a fight with DiNicola several months after Walker was fired. Ken Heath, a supervisor, saw the altercation and approached Flynn and DiNicola, telling DiNicola to go back to his press. Neither of the two was terminated for the altercation. Similarly, Drew and Dill testified that no one had been fired for fighting provoking a fight.

It is not clear from the record whether Walker "provoked" the fight. While I credit DiNicola's testimony that Walker called DiNicola a "buddy" of Cattau, I do not decide whether that constitutes "provocation." With respect to who struck the first blow, I credit DiNicola's testimony that he did not attempt to strike Walker, but instead attempted to, and did, strike a stack of boxes. There is no question that both Walker and DiNicola were engaged in a "fight" or argument. However, the testimony is uncontroverted that no one had been terminated for such behavior either before or after the incident. Indeed, DiNicola and Dill testified that there was constant teasing going on in the plant. Inasmuch as there was constant teasing going on and no one had previously been discharged for fighting, I do not believe that the actual reason for Walker's termination was the fighting. I believe that the reason for Walker's discharge was his prior union activities, and I find that the reason given for Walker's termination, namely, that he was engaged in fighting or provoking a fight, was a mere pretext.

b. Threat to change shifts

Walker testified that in August Cattau asked him to work nights. Walker stated that he could not because his wife was pregnant. Cattau then responded that he could wait until after his wife gave birth but "then he wanted me on nights." Walker further testified that he was in fact not required to work nights.

Maynard testified that Walker was never ordered to go on the night shift. Dill testified that Cattau wanted to transfer Walker to the night shift because there were more people on the day shift than on the night shift and because Walker was able to run the 8-1/2- and 11-inch printers. When it was pointed out to Cattau that, because of Walker's seniority he had preference with respect to which shift he wished to work, Cattau changed his mind and decided that Walker would not be transferred to the night shift.

[5] While Walker testified that DiNicola took a swing at him, I credit instead DiNicola's version of the facts. On this point no one corroborated Walker's version. In addition, the record reflects, and I observed, that DiNicola is shorter and weighs less than Walker. It is unlikely that DiNicola would have attempted to strike Walker.

With respect to the reason for the intended transfer, Cattau testified as follows:

> Q. Why did you want Louie Walker, Jr., to go on the second shift?
> A. At that point in time, as a General Manager I found it very necessary to run as much equipment back to back, meaning from one shift to another, as I could. The flow of work going out of the building was very poor. Louie had the capability of running such pieces of equipment. I then proceeded to request him to go on night work. At that point in time the company was losing thousands of dollars every month and I had to do whatever I could to change that.

I find that the General Counsel has not sustained his burden of showing that a threat was made because of Walker's union activities. I find that Cattau had a valid reason for requesting the change in work hours. When it was pointed out to him that Walker had seniority rights with respect to shift preference, the request to change shifts was canceled. Accordingly, the allegation is dismissed.

c. Negative evaluation and denial of raise

Walker testified that on July 16, after the election, he received a poor evaluation and, accordingly, was not granted a raise. Dill testified that Walker was an average employee but that he was "doing below his potential." Dill recommended "a small token raise, maybe ten or twenty cents; not outstanding but something to show we have a little faith in him." Dill testified that Cattau told him, "[W]ell, Mike, you have got all of these 'needs improvement' on here. It is obvious to me that he should not get a raise."

I conclude that the General Counsel has not sustained his burden of showing that Walker was issued a negative evaluation because of his union activities. Respondent claims that the negative evaluation was issued because Walker was performing poorly. Dill did not controvert that contention. He conceded that Walker was "doing below his potential" and that he showed a number of "needs improvement" on the evaluation. Indeed, the evaluation shows six checks in the "average" category and seven checks in the category marked "needs improvement." Dill recommended a "token" raise merely to show that "we still have a little faith in him." Essentially, therefore, it was Dill who gave Walker the poor evaluation, and there is nothing in the record to indicate that this was done because of Walker's union activities. Accordingly, the allegation is dismissed.

4. Implied promise of benefits

Walker credibly testified that, at one of the meetings that was held between the employees and Cattau prior to the election, Cattau told the employees that "George Baker had said that if anything happened to him or if he ever died, that the companies, all three plants would be split up with the employees that were working there at that time." This conversation took place at one of a series of weekly meetings held after the petition was filed. Walker testified that at such meetings Cattau would tell the emloyees the "bad points" about having a union. Similarly, Graham testified that, after the petition was filed, weekly meetings were held between Cattau and the employees, at which time Cattau said "we didn't need a union." Graham further testified that at one of the meetings Cattau said that "George Baker was having his lawyers draw up papers so that when he died the company would be divided up between the employees." Flynn testified to like effect. Dill testified that the meetings of employees were split, so that the procompany employees attended one meeting and the prounion employees attended a separate meeting. At one of the meetings attended by the prounion employees, held prior to the election, Dill testified that "it was basically pointed out that the company had big plans and couldn't make any promises. But George Baker would be working on a plan to turn the company over to the employees in one form or another, when he passed on; but he couldn't go into it any further at that time."

The statements concerning Baker's turning the Company over to the employees were made at meetings specifically called to discuss the benefits of not having a union. Indeed, Dill testified that it was specifically mentioned in the meetings attended by the group consisting of the "pro-Union" employees. Accordingly, I find that Respondent implied to the employees that if they voted against the Union at some point in the future the president, George Baker, would see to it that at his death the shares of Respondent would be distributed to the employees.

C. Discussion and Analysis

1. Discharge of Maynard

It is well settled that a supervisor cannot be lawfully discharged for declining to commit an unfair labor practice. Belcher Towing Co., 238 NLRB 446, 447 (1978), enfd. in part 614 F.2d 88 (5th Cir. 1980). I have found that Maynard was instructed to do various things which would have constituted unfair labor practices. Thus, Maynard was told that there was a chance that the Rochester plant would fold if the Union was elected. He was to use this information to persuade employees to vote against the Union. Such a remark, if made to employees, would violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. See Publishers Printing Co., Inc., 233 NLRB 1070, 1072 (1977), enfd. 625 F.2d 746 (6th Cir. 1980). In addition, I have credited Maynard's testimony that Cattau wanted him to "find out information, whatever I could on who was voting which way and report back to him." Such conduct on the part of Maynard would have constituted coercive interrogation of employees concerning their union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. See Osco Drug, Inc., a wholly owned subsidiary of Jewel Food Companies, Inc., 237 NLRB 231, 233 (1978).

Accordingly, I conclude that Maynard was requested to engage in activities which would have constituted unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1). His discharge, because of his failure to violate Section 8(a)(1), is in itself an unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. Discharge of Walker

With respect to the discharge of Walker on October 28, Respondent had been aware of Walker's prounion sympathies. Dill testified that Walker was identified to Cattau as being "a hard-core union supporter." Respondent's attitude towards the Union is also clear. I have credited Maynard's testimony that Cattau told him to use his personal relationship with employees to persuade them to vote for the Company and "break up the union drive." With respect to the timing of the discharge, it occurred approximately 4 months after the election. I believe that in the interval Respondent was looking for a proper "excuse" so as to be able to terminate what it regarded as the "hard-core" union supporters. See Butler-Johnson Corporation, 237 NLRB 688, 690 (1978), enforcement denied on other grounds 608 F.2d 1303 (9th Cir. 1979).

I conclude that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing to support the inference that the protected activity was a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to discharge Walker. See Wright Line, A Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). As discussed above, I regard Respondent's contention that Walker was discharged for fighting as mere pretext—this, in view of the uncontroverted testimony that no employee was discharged for fighting or provoking a fight, either before or after Walker's termination.[6] Clearly, therefore, Respondent has not shown that the "same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct." See Limestone Apparel Corp., 255 NLRB 722 (1981). Accordingly, I conclude that Respondent, by its discharge of Walker, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

3. Motion to amend complaint

The General Counsel has moved to amend the complaint to include, as a separate violation of Section 8(a)(1), Respondent's instructions to its supervisors to provide it with the names of the union adherents and instigators. This motion was first made in the General Counsel's brief (p. 25, fn. 61). Respondent has objected to the motion on the ground that Respondent "did not have the opportunity to truly litigate the matter or consider it in its brief."[7]

The motion was first made after the close of the hearing in the General Counsel's brief. Respondent was not given an opportunity to meet the allegation at the hearing or in its brief. Inasmuch as Respondent was not aware that the conduct in question would be considered to be a separate violation, it did not adequately deal with the matter on cross-examination. I conclude that the matter has not been fully litigated. Accordingly, the General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint is denied. See Chandler Motors, Inc., 236 NLRB 1565 (1978).[8]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discharging Brian Maynard for his refusal to commit unfair labor practices, Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By discharging Louis Walker, Jr., for his union-related activities, Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices constitute unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Secion 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. Respondent did not violate the Act in any other manner alleged in the complaints.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent having discharged Brian Maynard and Louis Walker, Jr., in violation of the Act, I find it necessary to order Respondent to offer them full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered from the time of their termination to the date of Respondent's offers of reinstatement.

Backpay shall be computed in accordance with the formula approved in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[9]

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

---

[6] The Board has held that an employer's exaggeration of a minor incident out of proportion to its importance and a severe penalty for that offense indicates a pretextual reason for that action. See Electri-Flex Company, 238 NLRB 713, 725 (1978).

[7] Copies of a letter dated May 4, 1981, from counsel for Respondent and a letter dated May 6, 1981, from the General Counsel are admitted into the record as ALJ Exhs. 1 and 2, respectively.

[8] The General Counsel concedes that "no evidence was presented as to whether employees explicitly knew" of the directive. It would appear that the General Counsel thus recognizes that the matter was indeed not "fully litigated."

[9] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

ORDER[10]

The Respondent, Datagraphic, Inc., Rochester, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discharging employees for activities protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer Brian Maynard and Louis Walker, Jr., immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of earnings in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Post at its facility in Rochester, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 3, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 3, in writing, within 20 days of the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that those allegations of the complaints as to which no violations have been found are hereby dismissed.

[10] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[11] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Bourne's Transportation, Inc. and Anthony R. Direnzo. Case 1-CA-16244

January 28, 1982

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On June 1, 1981, the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Order[1] in the above-entitled proceeding in which it directed, inter alia, that Respondent Bourne's Transportation, Inc., its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, make whole employee Anthony R. Direnzo for loss of earnings suffered by reason of Respondent's discrimination against him. Thereafter, Respondent and the General Counsel entered into a stipulation which provided in substance that Respondent had no objection to the Board's June 1 Order, conceding that it was valid and proper in all respects, and that the only issue in dispute was the amount of backpay due Direnzo under the terms of the Board's Order. A controversy having arisen over the amount of backpay due under the terms of the Order, the Regional Director for Region 1, on September 21, 1981, issued and duly served on Respondent a backpay specification and notice of hearing, alleging the amount of backpay due and notifying Respondent that it should file a timely answer complying with the Board's Rules and Regulations, and Statements of Procedure, Series 8, as amended.

Respondent failed to file an answer to the backpay specification. By letter dated October 16, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel informed Respondent of the requirement to file an answer and of the General Counsel's intention to file a Motion for Summary Judgment if no answer was received by October 23, 1981. On November 23, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment and for transfer to the Board for decision, and on November 30, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's motion should not granted. Respondent has not filed an answer, a response to the October 23 letter, a response to the Motion for Summary Judgment, or a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.54 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> (a) . . . The respondent shall, within 15 days from the service of the specification, if any, file an answer thereto . . .
> (c) . . . If the respondent fails to file any answer to the specification within the time prescribed by this section, the Board may, either with or without taking evidence in support of the allegations of the specification and without notice to the respondent, find the specification to be true and enter such order as may be appropriate.

The backpay specification, issued and served on Respondent on or about September 21, 1981, specifically states that Respondent shall, within 15 days from the date of the specification, file with the Regional Director for Region 1 an answer to the specification and that, if the answer fails to deny the allegations of the specification in the manner required under the Board's Rules and Regulations and the failure to do so is not adequately explained, such allegations shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and Respondent shall be precluded from introducing any evidence controverting them.

Respondent has failed to respond to the Notice To Show Cause and, therefore, the allegations of the specification stand uncontroverted. As Respondent has not filed an answer to the specification nor offered any explanation for its failure to do so, the allegations of the specification with respect to its liability, in accordance with the Board's Rules set forth above, are deemed to be admitted as true and are so found by the Board, without taking evidence in support of said allegations.

Accordingly, on the basis of the allegations of the backpay specification, the Board finds the facts as set forth therein to be true, grants the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, and concludes that the backpay due Anthony R. Direnzo is as stated in the computations of the specification and orders that payment be made to him and on his behalf of those amounts.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Bourne's Transportation, Inc., Brockton, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall make whole employee Anthony R. Direnzo by payment to him of backpay in the amount of $1,972.49, and payment on his behalf of $317.94 in pension and health and welfare fund payments, plus interest to be computed in the manner specified in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977), until payment of all moneys due, less tax witholding required by Federal and state laws.

Friederich Truck Service, Inc. and FTL, Inc. and International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 50. Case 14–CA–14290

January 29, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JENKINS, ZIMMERMAN, AND HUNTER

On September 18, 1981, Administrative Law Judge David P. McDonald issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and Respondent Friederich Truck Service filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and Respondents filed briefs in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.[1]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the Respondent, Friederich Truck Service, Inc., O'Fallon, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order.

[1] In accordance with his dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980), Member Jenkins would award interest on the backpay due based on the formula set forth therein.

DECISION

DAVID P. MCDONALD, Administrative Law Judge: The hearing in this case was held in St. Louis, Missouri, on January 22 and 23, 1981, and is based upon unfair labor practice charges filed by International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 50, herein called the Union, on September 30, 1980,[1] as amended on November 7. On November 10, a complaint was issued on behalf of the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 14 and subsequently amended at the hearing.[2] The complaint alleges that Friederich Truck Service, Inc., herein called FTS, established FTL, Inc., as an alter ego, and violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

All parties have been afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Based upon the entire record,[3] from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses,[4] and having considered the parties' post-hearing briefs, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent FTS admits that it is an Illinois corporation engaged in the interstate transport of freight and commodities throughout the St. Louis metropolitan area. It maintains its principal office and place of business at 630 E. State Street, in the city of O'Fallon, Illinois. It further admits that during the 12-month period ending September 30, a representative period, it derived, in the course and conduct of its business operations, gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for transportation of freight and commodities from the State of Missouri directly to points outside Missouri. Accordingly, I find that Respondent FTS is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Respondent FTL admits that it is a Missouri corporation engaged in the interstate transport of freight and commodities throughout the St. Louis metropolitan area. It maintains its principal office and place of business at 400 Brookes Drive, in the city of Hazelwood, Missouri. It further admits that from September 22, 1980, to January 22, 1981, it has in the course and conduct of its business operation within the States of Missouri and Illinois received gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for the transportation of freight and commodities between points located in Missouri and Illinois. Accordingly, I find that Respondent FTL is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

Respondents admit, and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[5]

[1] All dates herein refer to 1980, unless otherwise indicated.

[2] The General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint was granted. Par. 6(a) was amended to indicate the layoff dates of Ronald Renner and Gerald Fix as on or about September 19, 1980. Par. 8(c) was amended to read: "Employees to work for less than contract wages and other terms of conditions of employment."

[3] Counsel for the General Counsel's motion to correct the transcript has been granted.

[4] Witnesses were sequestered.

[5] Since 1975 the Union has been the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent FTS' employees who are engaged in local pickup, delivery, and assembly of freight within the area located within the jurisdiction of the Union, not to exceed a radius of 25 miles. FTS has recognized the Union in successive collective-bargaining agreements effective April 1, 1976, through March 31, 1979, and April 1, 1979, through March 31, 1982.

259 NLRB No. 53

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Issues

The principal issues raised by the complaint and the hearing are as follows:

1. Is Respondent FTL an alter ego of Respondent FTS?

2. Did Respondent FTS violate Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by:

(a) Laying off employees and by failing and refusing to pay employees contract wages and overtime pay as specified in the applicable collective-bargaining agreement?

(b) Encouraging its employees to withdraw from the Union?

(c) Bypassing the Union to deal directly with its employees, without giving the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain as the exclusive representative of Respondent FTS' employees?

(d) Establishing FTL, Inc., as an alter ego nonunion company in order to avoid its collective-bargaining obligations?

B. Facts

1. Friederich Truck Service, Inc.

FTS was incorporated by Frank L. Tempia, his mother, Pearl Friederich,[6] and his wife, Doris Tempia, on December 1, 1954, in the State of Illinois. The original purpose of the corporation as stated in the articles of incorporation have not changed: ". . . to engage in the business of transporting personal property of every type and description by motor vehicle for hire." There are 100 outstanding common shares. Both Frank Tempia and Pearl Skaer each own one share. Skaer has a life estate in the remaining 98 shares with the remainder in the name of Doris Tempia. On December 7, 1974, the following individuals were elected officers: president, Frank L. Tempia; vice president, Frank N. Tempia; and secretary-treasurer, Doris Tempia. On December 3, 1977, the following individuals were elected officers: president, Frank L. Tempia; vice president, Frank N. Tempia; secretary, Doris V. Tempia; and treasurer, Steven J. Tempia.[7] At a special meeting of the shareholders of Friederich Truck Service, on August 15, 1980, both Frank N. and Steven Tempia tendered their resignations as officers and members of the board of directors. Pearl Skaer was elected to fill the unexpired term of Frank N. Tempia.

FTS has been engaged in the interstate and intrastate transport of freight and commodities both as a common carrier, contract carrier, and a commercial zone carrier, as authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission and various state authorities. As a contract carrier, FTS handled the account for Venture Stores, for all points between Chicago, Illinois; Davenport, Iowa; Merrilville, Indiana; St. Louis and Kansas City, Missouri; and Overland Park and Kansas City, Kansas. As a common carrier its authority extends from St. Louis and St. Louis County to various points in Illinois, not to exceed 50 miles from the Missouri border. A commercial zone is a deregulated zone. The size of the zone depends on the population of the city. In this particular case the exempt zone is 25 miles from the city limits of St. Louis or East St. Louis.[8] The union employees were responsible for the work performed in the commercial zone. Respondent FTS also uses owner-operators to perform its contract authority and common carrier work. The owner-operators are not employees of FTS.

Two-thirds of all of FTS' business consists of hauling freight and commodities for the Venture Stores in the St. Louis metropolitan area. In addition, it services Venture Stores in the Chicago area. This hauling not only includes delivery of freight from the Venture warehouse in Hazelwood, Missouri, to the various regional stores, but also includes the hauling of piggyback trailers from the railroad terminals to the Venture warehouse. FTS also hauls freight for Famous-Barr, Welsh Industries, and Star Bedding. Occasionally, it also hauls for Schnuck's Market.

Frank Tempia Leasing, herein called the Leasing Company, is a sole proprietorship owned and operated by Frank L. Tempia. It is located in Lebanon, Illinois, approximately 6 miles from FTS. It owns approximately 120 trailers, all of which are leased to Venture, and 4 tractors, 2 of which are leased to FTL through FTS.

The FTS facility in O'Fallon, Illinois, is owned by Frank L. Tempia and leased to FTS. The property consists of a two-story building, a mechanic's shack, and a garage for the maintenance of vehicles. Apparently the building itself is a converted residence. FTS owns three straight trucks and six tractors. Three of its own tractors are leased to FTL along with two tractors it leased from the Leasing Company. Of the three remaining tractors owned by FTS, it uses one tractor and the other two are available for leasing to anyone.

Tempia emphasized that he does not own, lease, control, manage, or in any way have an interest in FTL. In fact, he had never even seen the FTL headquarters in St. Louis County.

2. FTL, Inc.

Frank N. Tempia testified that during the late spring or early summer of 1980, he and his brother discussed the possibility of forming their own corporation, since FTS was not showing a profit. They wanted their own business and an opportunity to make a living. Upon their resignation from FTS, Frank N. and Steven incorporated FTL, Inc. on August 28, with offices located at 400 Brookes Drive, Hazelwood, Missouri. The brothers own equal shares of all outstanding stock.[9] Frank N. is president, Orville Zimmerman is vice president, and Steven is secretary-treasurer. All three men serve as the board of directors.

---

[6] Pearl Friederich's last name is now Skaer.

[7] Frank N. and Steven J. Tempia are the sons of Frank L. and Doris V. Tempia.

[8] Frank N. Tempia testified he believed the zone to be 20 miles from the city limits of St. Louis and East St. Louis.

[9] On September 3, 19, and 26, 1980, Frank L. Tempia loaned $2,000, $1,000, and $2,000 respectively to FTL, Inc. The loans were secured by three promissory notes with a 3-year maturity date. The loans were made by Frank L. Tempia personally and not in the name of FTS. The purpose of the loans was to assist his sons in starting their new business venture. The $5,000 served as the initial capitalization for FTL.

Article 8 of its articles of incorporation defines the purpose of FTL, Inc. as: ". . . own and lease motor vehicles and to transport personal property by motor vehicle for hire." The business commenced on September 22 as a commercial zone carrier. In that capacity it is limited to delivery of freight within an area not to exceed 20 or 25 miles from the corporate limits of St. Louis and East St. Louis.

FTL does not own any tractors, trailers, straight trucks, or computer equipment. Its Hazelwood headquarters consist of an office and a parking lot, where the five tractors are parked when not in use. It does not have or need a loading dock or truck terminal, since the tractors are only used to pick up and deliver trailers at other locations.

Shortly after its inception, FTL entered into a series of leases with FTS. Three of the leases were dated September 5, for three tractors, and bore the signatures of Calvin Ford as FTL's authorized lessor signature. The fourth and fifth leases were for a spotter tractor and a standard tractor, dated September 19 and 29, respectively. Doris Tempia signed the last two leases. The leases were standard printed forms used by FTS whenever it leases its equipment to anyone including owner-operators. The leases were for 1 year and required the lessor:

> [t]o keep said vehicle and equipment in good operating condition during the term of this lease and to pay for all maintenance and general upkeep of said vehicle and equipment including the replacement of and repair of all tires and tubes, all motor repairs, all mechanical, electrical repairs, oil changes, added oil, lubrication and washing, fuel and fuel taxes, toll charges on roads, bridges, and tunnels, to pay for all license tags on vehicles and equipment herein leased and taxes except as might be otherwise provided.

When these trucks are not in use, they sit idle and FTS is not allowed to use them. The rental fee was $8 per hour. Frank Tempia, Sr., based on his life-long experience in the trucking industry, testified that this amount was a fair and reasonable fee. He stated:

> Considering that we rent ourselves from other people and we rent to other people tractor and driver with all services for $20.00 an hour, in this particular case $8.00 an hour for a tractor and they furnish the driver and they furnish the fuel and the oil and the p.m., it is a fair price.

In addition to the tractor leases, FTL also leased from FTS on September 15 "priority" computer usage time "of ten (10) hours per week in which the Lessee shall have sole-use of the Lessor's complete computer system for programming or operational purposes" for $150 per month and "for the useage of the Lessor's 2nd floor office space and equipment . . . (for) $100.00 per month." The computer and office space is located at FTS' O'Fallon, Illinois, headquarters. FTL has made payments in accordance with the provisions of these seven leases. It does not lease tractors or computer time from anyone other than FTS. FTL also rented office equipment such as desks, chairs, and office furniture from FTS, which is used by FTL at its Hazelwood facility. More recently FTL purchased the equipment. Both the rental and purchase were handled on an informal basis and were not covered by written documents.

The office staff of FTL consists of Frank N., Steven, and Calvin Ford. Both brothers perform duties which are similar to their former responsibilities when employed by FTS. Frank N. handles the customers and accounting. He contacts customers by telephone and in person. None of their customers ever go to FTS' O'Fallon office to conduct business with FTL. To handle the accounting work, it is necessary for Frank N. to go to the computer at the FTS headquarters. The computer is utilized for payroll, as well as freight bills and billing statements. When he works with the computer it is for the exclusive benefit of FTL and he no longer performs computer service for FTS. Steven is in charge of personnel and insurance claims. Since this business is new and their staff is limited, both brothers also perform whatever task that may arise. Calvin Ford is the former dispatcher for FTS and Freeburg Truck Service. He now performs the same duties for FTL.

At the inception of its business, FTL advertised in St. Louis' two daily newspapers, the Globe Democrat and St. Louis Post-Dispatch. Approximately 50 drivers appeared at the Hazelwood office in response to the advertisement. The FTL drivers, Don Wolff, John Vickery, Sam Godat, Olan DeLap, Bruce Kuck, and Dennis Hatches, are not represented by a labor organization and are paid $8 per hour, with the exception of Hatches who is paid $9.16 per hour as a spotter driver. None of the drivers were former employees of FTS, although Don Wolff and Dennis Hatches had worked for Frank Tempia Leasing. Both Charles Riley, a mechanic for FTS, and Dean Uebel, a former FTS driver and occasional owner-operator, may have worked a shift for FTL but neither remained beyond a day.

FTL's primary customer is the Venture Stores.[10] The brothers solicited this business from John Nahm, assistant traffic manager for Venture Stores. They had previously known him when they represented FTS in its dealings with Venture Stores. Approximately 80 percent of their work is with Venture. They also service Schermer, Schnucks Grocery, Welsh Industries, McCulloch, Star Bedding, and International. They have unsuccessfully sought the accounts of Famous Barr, Street Industries, Benjamin Ansehl, Grand Prix, Pyramid, Schlueter, and C & R Metals. In servicing these customers, FTL is not allowed to go beyond the commercial zone.

3. Pre-August meetings

All of the drivers who testified agreed that there had been a series of meetings in 1980 dealing with the financial conditions of FTS. Although the record is unclear as to the number and dates of these meetings, there was very little difference in the recollection of the witnesses concerning the general subject matters that were discussed. Generally the meetings dealt with FTS' deteriorating financial condition. On one occasion when Frank L. Tempia returned from Chicago he called the employees together and told them he was trying to set up an operation with Venture Stores. He explained they all must work together to save the Company, which was going down hill. In May or June, he informed the assembled drivers that the Company had lost several accounts. FTS had previously carried six tractor drivers and four straight truck drivers. Due to the decline in business, the drivers were reduced to five tractor drivers and two straight truck drivers. With the exception of Ronald Renner, all the drivers who testified agreed that business had decreased before the August meeting. However, Ronald Renner admitted that he was only able to work 1 month in the previous 5 months. Ronald Harris testified, "Well, it had been general knowledge that the company was in financial trouble for quite some time."

[10] Venture Stores consists of a large chain of discount stores owned by Famous Barr. Due to the size of Venture, FTL is only one of many trucking firms that handle Venture's freight.

4. August meeting

Frank L. Tempia gathered his employees for a meeting at the O'Fallon, Illinois, office of FTS on an evening in August. The employees who attended were Dennis Renner, Marlin Fix,[11] Gerald Fix, Frank Gabriel, Ron Harris, Ron Renner, Steve Stovey, Tom Smith, Dean Uebel,[12] Bill Overbey, and Anthony Tempia.[13] Neither Frank N. nor Steven Tempia attended this meeting.

Frank L. Tempia began the meeting by explaining the Company had made vigorous efforts to cut their cost in every area. The had tried various money saving ideas, such as buying a truckload of tires for a greater discount, as opposed to buying them one at a time. None of their efforts were of sufficient impact to offset their business losses. The Company was in serious financial difficulties since it was unable to compete with nonunion trucking companies. Dennis Renner testified that the announcement did not come as a surprise to anyone. He was personally aware that FTS had been underbid by other companies. Both National Distributor and Ken's Express Service had taken substantial portions of FTS' local business. Ken's Express Service had secured the Colonel Days account, a division of Venture, with stores located on the Venture parking lot.

Tempia then suggested he would like the drivers to take a $2-an-hour cut in wage and possibly have the employees pay half of their health and welfare expenses. His comments precipitated bickering between the various employees. Someone suggested that if the Company was actually destitute Tempia should go to the Union and allow it to inspect the books. If in fact the Company was in serious trouble, the Union might be willing to work something out so that FTS could stay in business. Tempia responded that nobody was going to look into his books. Frank Gabriel preferred to drop out of the Union before he would take a $2 cut, because he had a large family to support. Tempia responded that he could not get away with dropping the Union since he had a contract.[14] Bill Overbey remarked that he did not care what happened, but he would refuse to give up his union card since he was approaching retirement and could not risk losing his health and welfare and pension. Dennis Renner said he would not want to drive nonunion but suggested that perhaps they should at least look into insurance with a private company. He recommended an insurance salesman with Equitable Life, from whom he had purchased a life insurance policy. Ron Harris then turned on Dennis Renner and said, "You like it so much why don't you take out a policy!"

Through all this bickering, Marlin Fix, the union shop steward, remained silent. Then his brother Gerald Fix looked over at Marlin and stated, "Just sit there, number one man and don't say nothing." This heated comment was an apparent reference to the fact that Marlin was a senior driver and therefore was safe from potential layoff. Marlin remained silent. In fact, there was no evidence offered that he negotiated with Tempia, nor did he inform his Union of this meeting.

There existed a collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and FTS, which provided a wage scale. However, FTS did not notify the Union that it was conducting meetings with union members concerning changes in wages and benefits.

The meeting ended with Tempia requesting the men to discuss his suggestions and then he warned them that he may start another company in order to survive or make other arrangements to have freight delivered. Gabriel testified that he had been employed by FTS for 7 years. When he was hired he was told the Company was unable to pay union scale wages, but it would as soon as its financial status improved. During those 7 years, FTS never paid scale and Tempia repeatedly told Gabriel, that he would open another company under an assumed name if the O'Fallon facility closed.

Apparently, the general consensus of the drivers was that they had already conceded too much to Respondent FTS and therefore they did not agree to the $2 hourly pay cut nor a change in the payment of their health and welfare. FTS did not cut the hourly wage nor did it require the employees to pay a share of their welfare.

5. John Edward Gonzales

John Edward Gonzales became the business representative for the Union as of December 15, 1976. In that capacity he was assigned the duty to represent the Union in its dealings with FTS. He had previously worked as a shop steward for 8 years.

Gonzales explained that a shop steward is not elected by his fellow workers but selected by and with the approval of the Union. When Gonzales discovered that

---

[11] Dennis Renner had been the elected shop steward, until at some unknown time he announced he no longer wished to serve. Thereafter, Marlin Fix assumed the duties of shop steward. There was no election and he was not appointed by the Union. However, during the August meeting he was recognized by his fellow workers as their shop steward.

[12] Dean Uebel was the only nonunion driver who attended the August meeting.

[13] Anthony Tempia is the son of Frank L. Tempia. He is employed by FTS as a mechanic and does not represent management.

[14] Gabriel testified that Tempia did not comment after he offered to drop his union membership.

Marlin Fix was acting as the steward, he notified FTS in a letter dated September 22 that Ronald Harris was the new steward. Fix had never been appointed by the Union.

Gonzales testified he had never been notified by FTS that it was conducting a series of meetings directly with union members, which dealt with wage and benefits. He also explained that even if Marlin Fix had been the legitimate steward, his presence would not change the character of the August meetings, since neither a steward nor business representatives have the authority to negotiate a change in the wage scale of an existing collective-bargaining agreement.

On August 14, Steve Stovey filed a grievance, complaining that employees with less seniority were being worked and he had been laid off. The first meeting in regard to this grievance was held at the Belleville Teamsters office where Frank L. Tempia, Steve Stovey, Ron Harris, and Gonzales were present. During the conference it was determined that both Ron Harris and Stovey had taken the drivers' test and were licensed to drive tractor-trailers. It was Tempia's position that neither of them was qualified, regardless of the license. He stated that, in the event that he was required to pay these grievances, he would have no alternative but to open another company and use nonunion drivers, as other trucking companies were doing in Missouri. At the next meeting, September 9, the grievance was settled by Harris accepting 1 day of pay instead of 2 and Stovey accepting 10 days instead of 20.

6. Wages and layoff

Although Respondent FTS provided its payroll records for inspection and Frank L. Tempia answered extensive cross-examination, neither the records nor Tempia shed any appreciable light on the hourly rate each truckdriver received. The Company simply did not maintain records which would show the number of hours each driver worked. The records provide only a gross and net wage figure. Therefore, it was impossible to determine the hourly wage by inspecting the company records. Tempia stated they paid scale, but was unable to state what was the wage rate. In contrast, all of the drivers said that for years they had worked below scale in an attempt to save the Company. The Union was never informed of this fact.

In April 1979, Ron Harris attended a meeting with Respondent FTS, where an agreement was reached concerning wages. A new contract had come into effect April 1, and the drivers wanted to discuss the effect the new wage rate would have on them. They were below scale. Frank L. Tempia agreed to provide employees with the increase provided in the collective-bargaining agreement, plus 25 cents, in an effort to raise the wage rate to within $1 of the actual scale called for in the contract upon its expiration in April 1982. The testimony of those who were laid off reveals that they received $10.22 per hour, instead of the contract rate of $11.97 per hour.

In September, FTS began to lay off its drivers. Steve Stovey was laid off on September 5; Ronald Harris, Thomas Smith, Ronald Renner, and Gerald Fix were laid off on September 19; Frank Gabriel and Dennis Renner were laid off on September 22. The Union was not informed of these layoffs.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

1. Wages under the collective-bargaining agreement

Although Frank L. Tempia testified that FTS paid whatever was the agreed scale wages for drivers, the record fails to substantiate his assertions. In fact, all of the drivers testified that when they were laid off they were receiving $10.22 an hour rather than $11.97, which was the amount called for in the current collective-bargaining agreement.

In order to resolve this disputed fact, it is necessary to determine the credibility of the various witnesses. I do not credit Tempia's assertion that FTS paid scale wages. In this area of his testimony he was very evasive. Initially he could not remember what the Company paid the drivers. Then he finally answered in general terms that it paid scale. Perhaps, it is understandable, that any officer of a corporation may have difficulty in remembering the exact hourly wage paid to various workers. However, in the instant case, the crucial question is not the exact amount paid but whether the wage complied with the collective-bargaining agreement. The credible record is overwhelming that the wage was less than scale. Indeed, the Company had a long history of paying less than union scale. For many years, Tempia had circumvented the Union by dealing directly with the drivers. Year after year the drivers were told they must accept less than the contract wage in order to save the Company. Gabriel recalled in a very clear, concise, and credible manner an incident which occurred when he was hired in 1973. At that time he was informed by the Company that they were unable to pay scale, but they would comply with the collective-bargaining agreement as soon as it became financially feasible. This theme was played over and over during Gabriel's 7 years of employment. In view of the testimony of the drivers and the history of FTS, I find it absolutely impossible to accept Tempia's statement, that it paid scale. In fact, the record is replete with credible evidence, proving he was a prime participant in the perpetration of this particular unfair labor practice.

The General Counsel argues and I agree that Respondent FTS violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by paying its drivers less than the collective-bargaining wage scale without having afforded the employees' collective-bargaining representative prior notice and an opportunity to negotiate and bargain with respect to wages. In essence, such conduct represents a repudiation of the collective-bargaining agreement. Western Pacific Roofing Corporation, 244 NLRB 501 (1979); Yates Industries, Inc., 238 NLRB 167 (1978); Fairfield Nursing Homes, 228 NLRB 1208 (1977).

2. Circumventing employees' collective-bargaining representative

The fact that Frank L. Tempia called a meeting of FTS employees, where he suggested they should consider a $2 an hour pay reduction and a sharing of the cost of health and welfare benefits, is not in dispute. Tempia was not even questioned on direct or cross-examination concerning this meeting. Although FTS was a party to a collective-bargaining agreement, which set wages, it never notified the Union of its desire to modify the contract. During this August meeting, the drivers were not represented by a union official with the authority to negotiate such changes. At one point, a driver suggested to Tempia that if FTS was in such serious financial difficulty then he should allow the Union to inspect the books. If his fears were substantiated, then the Union might agree to amend the contract. This offer was summarily rejected. It is obvious that Tempia preferred dealing directly with the men. This direct confrontation had the added advantage of dividing the workers and playing upon their individual fears. The August meeting quickly descended into bickering chaos. Each worker sought a solution which would resolve his individual problem. One was willing to forsake the Union if he could save the $2 for his large and needy family. Another worker, who was approaching retirement, was willing to accept the pay cut to save his union pension.

The evidence was unquestioned that Gonzales, the union business agent, was never informed of this meeting and therefore was not given an opportunity to represent the interest of the Union's members. I reject the argument that the drivers were represented by their steward, Marlin Fix. As was explained by Gonzales, Marlin Fix was not properly selected and therefore not a steward. Even if one assumed Marlin Fix was the steward, he would not have possessed the authority to negotiate wage and welfare benefits. It is also interesting to note that Marlin remained mute during the entire meeting and did not even notify the Union of what had occurred.

It is clear that by the above unilateral conduct, Respondent FTS dealt with employees in contravention of its duty to bargain and negotiate with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees. Such conduct is a well-recognized violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Chester Valley, Inc., 251 NLRB 1455 (1980); Pacific Intercom Co., 255 NLRB 184 (1981).

3. Laying off union drivers

The General Counsel has accurately summarized the events following the August meeting. The drivers refused to accept Respondent FTS' proposals to reduce wages and to create an employee-funded health and welfare plan. One month later Steven Stovey, Ronald Harris, Thomas Smith, Frank Gabriel, Ronald Renner, Gerald Fix, and Dennis Renner were laid off. It is the position of the General Counsel that these layoffs were in direct response to the drivers' refusal to accept the company proposals and also reflect a long history of disdain for its collective-bargaining obligations. In contrast, Respondent FTS defends the layoffs by arguing that they were based on sound business judgment. Its share of the commercial zone traffic had declined substantially and therefore it had no choice in the matter. It is true that FTS commercial zone work had declined prior to the inception of FTL. Several of the union drivers testified that prior to the August meeting they were aware that two rival St. Louis nonunion freight companies had won a substantial portion of FTS' business. Thus the question is raised whether Respondent FTS was motivated to layoff its drivers by decline in business or because of the drivers' refusal to acquiesce to the Employer's proposal to lower wages and create an employee-funded health plan. Was the decline in business simply a pretext to free the Company of its collective-bargaining obligations?

In Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), the Board has provided a clear explanation as to the distinction that must be maintained between "pretext" and "dual motive." It is pretextual when the evidence reveals that what the employer had advanced as a legitimate business reason for its action is in fact a sham, in that the purported rule or circumstances advanced by the employer did not exist or was not in fact relied upon. As previously indicated, Respondent contends the layoffs were based on sound business judgment, namely, a decline in business. If in fact, the Company, in good faith, considered the decline in business, such reliance is not pretextual. However, Respondent may still be guilty of unfair labor practices, if its actions fall within the purview of the dual motive, as defined in Wright Line, supra.

Obviously, Respondent FTS, through its president, Frank L. Tempia, preferred to deal directly with its union drivers and ignore its obligations under the collective-bargaining agreement. Tempia stated in no uncertain terms that the Company could not survive if the men refused to accept a pay cut. He perceived only two possible choices to the Company's financial quagmire.

If the cost were not reduced through the pay cut then the operation would cease. The fact that the employees recognized the threats to their Union and their own personal security was graphically illustrated by their emotional outburst that accompanied Tempia's proposals. Within a month after their refusal to accept the wage reduction and change in benefits, the men were laid off. Clearly this sequence of events was not coincidental and when considered collectively it supports the proposition that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the Respondent's decision to lay off the drivers. Once this is established, the burden shifts to the Respondent to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct. Respondent FTS has failed to meet this burden.

Although both Tempia and the drivers expressed their opinion that the commercial zone work had decreased, not a scintilla of evidence was offered to prove the extent of the decline. Surely, an analysis of past and present corporate account receivables, billing sheets, customer contracts, and tax records would reveal the extent of the Company's losses. Without some proof, I am left to speculate whether sound business judgment justified the abrupt layoff of seven men. The economic condition of FTS may well have justified the above layoffs. However, the record is void of probative evidence which would firmly support such a premise.

Even if one assumes that the layoffs were based on sound business judgment, the burden would still shift to Respondent to prove that the layoffs would have taken place even in the absence of the drivers' exercise of protected conduct. FTS has not met this burden.

FTS' flagrant disregard for the protected rights of its workers and its obligation under the collective-bargaining agreement is confirmed by an examination of Frank L. Tempia's past conduct. For years he was able to impose his will on his drivers. In a perfunctory manner he would periodically bind FTS to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and then ignore its provisions. Without providing the Union with an opportunity to represent its members over wage and benefit changes, Tempia would go directly to the drivers. In a coercive manner, he played upon the fears of his employees that their jobs would cease if they did not accept below scale wages. Finally, the workers reached a point where they felt they could no longer retreat. It was in that atmosphere, following their refusal to accept the $2-per-hour wage cut, that the layoffs began. So long as the drivers were willing to submit to the demands of the Company and ignore their rights under the collective-bargaining agreement, labor harmony flourished.

Having considered the foregoing, I find that although Respondent FTS may have taken into account the decline in business in arriving at its decision to layoff the drivers, I am not convinced that it would have reached the same decision absent the protected conduct. The drivers' refusal to accept a lower wage and a change in benefits was the "motivating factor" in the Company's decision to layoff the drivers.

4. Alter ego

a. Applicable principles

As originally stated in L. E. Davis d/b/a Sakrete of Northern California, Inc., 137 NLRB 1220 (1962), and reaffirmed in Holiday Inn of Benton, 237 NLRB 1042, 1044 (1978), the Board looks to four principal factors in determining whether two arguably separate employers will be treated as a joint employer. These factors are: (1) interrelation of operations, (2) centralized control of labor relations, (3) common management, and (4) common ownership or financial control. While no individual factor has been held to be controlling, emphasis is placed on the first three factors, particularly centralized control of labor relations. Stoll Industries, Inc., 223 NLRB 51, 53–54 (1976), enfd. 551 F.2d 301 (2d Cir. 1977); Gerace Construction, Inc. and Helger Construction Company, Inc., 193 NLRB 645 (1971). Alter ego status will generally be found where the two enterprises have "substantially identical management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision as well as ownership." Crawford Door Sales Company, Inc. and Cordes Door Company, Inc., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976).

b. Common ownership—financial control

Frank N. Tempia and Steven J. Tempia are equal and sole owners of FTL, Inc. They have never owned or had financial control of FTS. FTS is owned by Frank L. Tempia, Pearl Skaer, and Doris Tempia. It should also be noted that even before Frank N. Tempia and Steven Tempia resigned their positions with FTS, neither of them owned any portion or exercised any financial control over FTS.

It is true that Frank L. Tempia personally lent $5,000 to his sons' new corporation. This loan was secured by a series of promissory notes which will mature in September 1983. The record is void of any indication that this transaction was not conducted in an "arm's length" atmosphere. To say this loan provided Frank L. Tempia with financial control over his sons' enterprise would require rank speculation.

The only other financial connections between the two corporations are a series of leases. The record substantiates the assertions, by Respondents, that all of the leases were negotiated through an "arm's length" transaction. Indeed, the record is totally void of any evidence which would challenge their assertions. It was a common practice for FTS to lease their tractors to anyone. The standard rental fee for a driver and a fully fueled and maintained tractor was $20 per hour. Since FTL leased the tractor for $8 per hour, paid their own drivers $8 per hour, and was required to furnish the fuel, I find the leases on the tractors were reasonable and legitimate. Similarly, the leases for the rental of computer time and the second floor of the FTS headquarters were introduced without an indication that the agreed amounts were lower than the true market value. In addition, FTL has fully paid the amounts required by the leases. Therefore, I am compelled to conclude that all of the leases were negotiated and administered in an "arm's length" manner. The agreed amounts were reasonable and do not represent a method by which FTS could funnel funds to FTL by providing below market rentals, nor in any manner provide FTS with a method of financially controlling FTL.

In the present case, I do not find probative evidence which would reveal common ownership or financial control by FTS. The General Counsel has relied on Sakrete of Northern California, Inc., supra, and other cases, which are readily distinguishable, ". . . as they involved situations where both enterprises were either wholly owned by members of the same family or nearly totally owned by the same individuals . . . ." Clinton Foods, Inc., d/b/a Morton's I.G.A. Foodliner; and its alter ego or joint employer Sam & Ed's Inc., 240 NLRB 1246, fn. 2 (1979). Although in the instant case both companies are owned by members of the same family, the ownership of the two enterprises is not identical. However, I am mindful that identical corporate ownership is not the sine qua non of alter ego status. Crawford Door Sales Company, Inc. and Cordes Door Company, Inc., supra.

c. Common management

As in the case of ownership, management in these two corporations is totally distinct. After their resignation on August 15 as officers and directors, the Tempia brothers never again participated in the management of FTS. Their attention was turned to their own company. Likewise Frank L. Tempia his wife, and mother continued to devote their energies to FTS and never participated in the running of FTL.

d. Interrelation of operations and centralized control of labor management

It is undisputed that the articles of incorporation of each company set out nearly identical business purposes. In general, the articles provide for the transporting of personal property. Although their stated purpose is nearly the same, in reality there are significant variances. FTL, a Missouri corporation with headquarters in Hazelwood, Missouri, was founded in 1980. Its ability to haul freight is limited by the geographical boundaries of the commercial zone. As a result, it cannot carry freight beyond 20 or 25 miles from the corporate limits of St. Louis and East St. Louis. In contrast, FTS, an old established Illinois corporation, cannot only haul freight within the commercial zone but also as a common and contract carrier throughout Missouri and Illinois, as well as parts of Kansas and Indiana.

It is also true that Venture Stores is the primary customer of both corporations. However, there is no evidence to show that FTS shifted its Venture business to FTL. Indeed, the record is clear that FTS began losing substantial portions of the Venture business to other freight companies before FTL was formed. Of course, the balance of FTS' business was not in competition with FTL since it dealt with freight hauling beyond the common carrier zone.

As previously stated, FTL leased all of its tractors from FTS. These tractors were for the exclusive use of FTL. With the exception of the computer, the two companies did not share any equipment. The use of the computer was not interrelated. Frank N. Tempia operated the computer, in keeping with the lease, for business matters pertaining only to FTS, while Doris Tempia utilized the computer for FTS and the Leasing Company.

After reviewing the surrounding circumstances, I find that, although these two companies had nearly identical business purposes, they were maintained as two totally independent corporations in regard to their operations. This separation of management is equally true in regard to the control of labor management. At all times Frank L. Tempia controlled labor management of FTS. This was true even when his sons were officers, directors, and employees of FTS. When the sons formed their own company, Steven Tempia was in charge of personnel. Other than the brothers, Calvin Ford was the only worker who had previously been an employee of FTS. The control of labor management of these two freight companies was never in the hands of the same individuals.

I credit the recollection of Gonzales and the drivers that on several occasions Frank L. Tempia threatened to establish a nonunion freight company if the drivers failed to accept his proposals or if he was forced to comply with a grievance. However, I do not accept the argument that these blustering statements represent proof that Tempia established FTL or that the former is the alter ego of FTS. To arrive at such a conclusion would unjustifiably bind the Tempia brothers to statements by a third party not within their control. At the very most, Tempia's statements may raise an inference to be considered along with all of the evidence.

On the basis of the above, I find that FTS and FTL are two separate and independent corporations. FTL is not the alter ego of FTS and therefore I shall recommend that all complaints filed against FTL be dismissed in their entireties.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent FTS, as set forth above, occurring in connection with its described operations, have a close, intimate, and substantial relation to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States, and tend to lead, and have led, to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents Friederich Truck Services, Inc., and FTL, Inc., are employers within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce and in businesses affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 50, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent FTL, Inc., did not violate the Act and is not the alter ego of Respondent Friederich Truck Service, Inc.

4. By laying off and refusing to reinstate Stephen Stovey, Ronald Harris, Thomas Smith, Ronald Renner, Gerald Fix, Frank Gabriel, and Dennis Renner, for their refusal to acquiesce in the proposed unilateral changes in the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent FTS violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. The unit appropriate for collective bargaining is:

> All truckdrivers, warehousemen, helpers, dockmen, checkers, power-lift operators, hoisters, and such other employees engaged in the local pick-up, delivery, and assembling of freight within the area located within the jurisdiction of the Local Union, not to exceed a radius of 25 miles.

6. At all times material, the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

7. By bypassing the Union and directly dealing with employees by (a) paying them less than the contractual wage scale required by the collective-bargaining agreement, and further (b) proposing in a company meeting to the union employees that they accept additional wage cuts and participate in an employee-funded health and welfare plan, in contravention of the existing collective-bargaining agreement and without obtaining the Union's consent to those changes and modifications, Respondent FTS has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

9. FTS has not violated the Act in any other manner than as specified above.

THE REMEDY

Having found that FTS has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and that certain affirmative action be taken by it to effectuate the policies of the Act. I shall recommend that FTS be ordered to restore the wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment to the levels required by its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, and to make whole its employees for any losses suffered, since March 30, 1980, as a result of its unlawfully paying less than the hourly wage provided in the collective-bargaining agreement,[15] with interest on the amounts owing, to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977); see also Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980). In addition, Respondent FTS shall restore Stephen Stovey, Ronald Harris, Thomas Smith, Frank Gabriel, Dennis Renner, Ronald Renner, and Gerald Fix to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make each of them whole for any loss of pay, including loss of fringe benefits, they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them. Backpay shall be computed on a quarterly basis, making deductions for interim earnings, F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be paid on the amounts owing and to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, supra; see generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 139 NLRB 716 (1962), enforcement denied on different grounds 322 F.2d 913 (9th Cir. 1963).

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[16]

The Respondent, Friederich Truck Service, Inc., O'Fallon, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Failing and refusing to abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 50, effective by the terms of said agreement from April 1, 1979, through March 31, 1982, by directly dealing with employees and by entering into a private agreement with employees to pay them at a wage scale less than the contractual wage rate required by the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(b) Laying off, suspending, discharging, or otherwise discriminating against employees with regard to wages, hire or tenure of employment, or any term or condition of employment for engaging in activities on behalf of a labor organization or for engaging in activity protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(c) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of any right guaranteed them by the National Labor Relations Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Comply with the terms and conditions of the above-described collective-bargaining agreement and make the drivers whole for any wage losses they have suffered after March 30, 1980, as a result of FTS paying below the wage scale rates found in the said collective-bargaining agreement, in the manner set forth above in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Offer Stephen Stovey, Ronald Harris, Thomas Smith, Frank Gabriel, Dennis Renner, Ronald Renner, and Gerald Fix immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if their jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth above in the section entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Upon request, bargain collectively with the Union with respect to wages, hours, and conditions of employment of Respondent's drivers who are represented by the Union and are covered by the aforesaid collective-bargaining agreement, and who constitute an appropriate bargaining unit under the Act.

(d) Preserve and make available to the Board or its agents all payroll and other records necessary to compute the backpay and reinstatement rights set forth in the section entitled "The Remedy."

(e) Post at its O'Fallon, Illinois, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[17] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being duly signed by its authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[15] The record reveals that for many years FTS has paid less than the hourly wage called for in the successive collective-bargaining agreements. Although it is difficult to pinpoint when this practice began, Gabriel testified that FTS told him when he was hired in November 1973 that they could not pay full scale. In the instant case, there is no evidence that Respondent fraudulently concealed from the Union that it paid hourly wages below the rate set by the collective-bargaining agreement.

Therefore, the remedial order for a retroactive date is limited by Sec. 10(b). Don Burgess Construction Corporation d/b/a Burgess Construction and Don Burgess and Verlon Hendrix d/b/a V & B Builders, 227 NLRB 765 (1977), enfd. 596 F.2d 378 (9th Cir. 1979).

[16] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[17] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(f) Notify the Regional Director for Region 14, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 50, as exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the following appropriate unit with regard to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment:

All truck drivers, warehousemen, helpers, dockmen, checkers, power-lift operators, hoisters, and such other employees engaged in the local pickup, delivery, and assembling of freight within the area located within the jurisdiction of the Local Union, not to exceed a radius of 25 miles.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement with the International Brotherhood of Teamstes, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 50, effective by the terms of said agreement from April 1, 1979, through March 31, 1982, by directly dealing with employees and by entering into a private agreement with employees to pay them at a wage scale less than the contractual wage rate required by the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

WE WILL NOT lay off, suspend, discharge or otherwise discriminate against employees with regard to wages, hire or tenure of employment, or any term or condition of employment for engaging in activities on behalf of a labor organization or for engaging in activity protected by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL NOT offer to bargain or bargain directly with employees in the above-described bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of any right guaranteed them by the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL comply with the terms and conditions of the above-described collective-bargaining agreement and make the drivers whole for any wage losses they have suffered after March 30, 1980, as a result of FTS paying below the wage scale rates found in the said collective-bargaining agreement, with interest.

WE WILL offer Stephen Stovey, Ronald Harris, Thomas Smith, Frank Gabriel, Dennis Renner, Ronald Renner, and Gerald Fix immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if their jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, with interest.

FRIEDERICH TRUCK SERVICE, INC.

Detroit Plastics Products Company and International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW and its Local 236, UAW. Case 7-CA-19801

January 29, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on September 14, 1981, by International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW and its Local 236, UAW, herein called the Union, and duly served on Detroit Plastics Products Company, herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 7, issued a complaint on October 6, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that on June 18, 1981, following a Board election in Case 7-RC-16138, the Union was duly certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate;[1] and that at all material times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative, although the Union has requested and is requesting it to do so. On October 26, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint, and raising as affirmative defenses that the results of the election were invalid inasmuch as the Union had engaged in improper preelection conduct.

On November 9, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on November 17, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed an opposition to counsel for the General Counsel's motion.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer to the complaint and response to the Notice To Show Cause, Respondent admits its refusal to bargain but attacks the Union's certification on the basis that Respondent's objections in the underlying representation case were improperly overruled. Counsel for the General Counsel argues that there are no matters warranting a hearing as the issues concerning the Union's certification were litigated and determined in the underlying representation case. We agree with counsel for the General Counsel.

A review of the record, including the record in Case 7-RC-16138, indicates that pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election a secret-ballot election was held on January 30, 1981, in the unit found appropriate. The Union won the election. Thereafter, Respondent filed timely objections to the election alleging that the Union had engaged in improper preelection conduct. Specifically, Respondent alleged that prior to the election the Union (1) informed employees that it would know how each person voted, and (2) distributed a leaflet to employees which allegedly indicated that only employees signing authorization cards before the election would be eligible for a waiver of initiation fees.[2] After investigation, the Regional Director, on March 6, 1981, issued a notice of hearing on objections, in which he concluded that substantial and material issues of fact existed with respect to Respondent's objections, and that these issues could best be resolved after a hearing. A hearing was held on March 20, 1981. On April 3, 1981, the Hearing Officer issued his Report on Objections recommending that Respondent's objections be overruled in their entirety. On April 13, 1981, Respondent filed exceptions and a brief in support thereof to the Hearing Officer's recommendations contending, inter alia, that the Hearing Officer erred as to his credibility findings, and reiterating

[1] Official notice is taken of the record in the representation proceeding, Case 7-RC-16138, as the term "record" is defined in Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended. See LTV Electrosystems, Inc., 166 NLRB 938 (1967), enfd. 388 F.2d 683 (4th Cir. 1968); Golden Age Beverage Co., 167 NLRB 151 (1967), enfd. 415 F.2d 26 (5th Cir. 1969); Intertype Co. v. Penello, 269 F.Supp. 573 (D.C.Va. 1967); Follett Corp., 164 NLRB 378 (1967), enfd. 397 F.2d 91 (7th Cir. 1968); Sec. 9(d) of the NLRA, as amended.

[2] The Union's leaflet to the employees stated, inter alia, that "Members of the UAW pay two hours' pay a month or 1.1% of their monthy salary and we have waived the initiation fee for all eligible employees." Respondent contended that the word "eligible" in the Union's leaflet is ambiguous and susceptible to misinterpretation by the employees.

its argument that the Union's initiation fee waiver was ambiguous and violated the rule set forth in N.L.R.B. v. Savair Manufacturing Co., 414 U.S. 270 (1973). On June 18, 1981, the Board issued its Decision and Certification of Representative (not reported in volumes of Board Decisions) wherein the Board, having reviewed the record in light of the exceptions, found that Respondent's exceptions raised no material issues of law or fact, adopted the Hearing Officer's findings and recommendations, and certified the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[3]

All issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, a Michigan corporation, is engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of automobile parts. During the year ending December 31, 1980, a period representative of Respondent's operations, Respondent received goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Michigan.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

III. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW and its Local 236, UAW, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees, including material handlers and shop janitors, employed by the Employer at its facility located at 35135 Groesbeck Highway, Mt. Clemens, Michigan; but excluding truck drivers, machine repair employees, the office janitor, inspectors, the label maker, the tool crib attendant, die setters, shipping and receiving employees, casual employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. The certification

On January 30, 1981, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 7, designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on June 18, 1981, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on or about August 13, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit. Commencing on or about August 13, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit.[4]

[3] See Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. N.L.R.B., 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941); Rules and Regulations of the Board, Secs. 102.67(f) and 102.69(c).

[4] Respondent admits that it has refused to bargain with the Union in response to the Union's requests for bargaining commencing on August 13, 1981. Further, on October 1, 1981, Respondent, by letter of that date, informed the Union that it would not engage in collective bargaining because it believed the certification of the Union was improper.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since August 13, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817; Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Detroit Plastics Products Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW and its Local 236, UAW, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees, including material handlers and shop janitors, employed by Respondent at its facility located at 35135 Groesbeck Highway, Mt. Clemens, Michigan, but excluding truckdrivers, machine repair employees, the office janitor, inspectors, the labelmaker, the toolcrib attendant, diesetters, shipping and receiving employees, casual employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since June 18, 1981, the above-named labor organization has been and now is the certified and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing on or about August 13, 1981, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of Respondent in the appropriate unit, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Detroit Plastics Products Company, Mt. Clemens, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW and its Local 236, UAW, as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees, including material handlers and shop janitors, employed by the Employer at its facility located at 35135 Groesbeck Highway, Mt. Clemens, Michigan; but excluding truck drivers, machine repair employees, the office janitor, inspectors, the label maker, the tool crib attendant, die setters, shipping and receiving employees, casual employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its 35135 Groesbeck Highway, Mt. Clemens, Michigan, place of business copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 7, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW and its Local 236, UAW, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with the above-named Union, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees, including material handlers and shop janitors, employed by the Employer at its facility located at 35135 Groesbeck Highway, Mt. Clemens, Michigan; but excluding truck drivers, machine repair employees, the office janitor, inspectors, the label maker, the tool crib attendant, die setters, shipping and receiving employees, casual employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Denver Post of the National Society of the Volunteers of America and United Nurses, Professionals, and Health Care Employees, Division of United Food and Commercial Workers, Local No. 7, AFL-CIO, CLC. Case 27-CA-7361

January 29, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on June 16, 1981, by the United Nurses, Professionals, and Health Care Employees, Division of United Food and Commercial Workers, Local No. 7, AFL-CIO, CLC, herein called the Union, and duly served on Denver Post of the National Society of the Volunteers of America, herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 27, issued a complaint on June 26, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and the complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that on April 16, 1981, following a Board election in Case 27-RC-6168, the Union was duly certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate;[1] and that, commencing on or about May 21, 1981, and at all times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative, although the Union has requested and is requesting it to do so. On July 8, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint.

Thereafter, on or about September 21, 1981, the Respondent and the Union entered into an amended stipulation for an entry of Order requesting the Board to find that Respondent has refused to bargain with the Union. The parties stipulated, inter alia, that Respondent has refused to bargain for the sole purpose of having the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit determine whether the Board properly asserted jurisdiction over Respondent in Case 27-RC-6168, that the Respondent and the Union had full opportunity to introduce any and all evidence that either party desired in the representation proceeding, and that the Board considered all of the evidence and concluded that the weight of the evidence supported the assertion of jurisdiction. The Respondent waived any further consideration by the Board of the issues presented herein. The Respondent and the Union requested that an Order be entered "without the necessity of any further procedural action."

On September 24, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a "Motion for Issuance of Decision and Order" requesting the Board to transfer this proceeding directly to the Board and to issue a Decision and Order forthwith without any further actions by or notice to the parties.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the amended stipulation and the entire record in this proceeding.

It is hereby ordered that this proceeding be, and it hereby is, transferred to the Board for issuance of a Decision and Order, pursuant to which the Board hereby makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent has at all times material herein been an unincorporated nonprofit religious association organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the State of Colorado with its principal office and place of business located in Denver, Colorado. At all times material herein, Respondent has provided social services at its Brandon, Columbine, Victim Assistance, Triad, Bannock, and Fillmore facilities, located in various locations within the city of Denver.

In the course and conduct of its operations, Respondent annually receives goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points and places located outside the State of Colorado, and has a gross volume of business in excess of $250,000.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.[2]

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

United Nurses, Professionals, and Health Care Employees, Division of United Food and Commercial Workers, Local No. 7, AFL-CIO, CLC, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time counselors of the Employer at its Brandon, Columbine, Victim Assistance, Triad, Bannock, and Fillmore facilities, but excluding all office/clerical employees, volunteers, program attorney, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

2. The certification

On April 8, 1981, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 27, designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective-bargaining with Respondent.[3]

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on April 16, 1981, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on or about May 20, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit. Commencing on or about May 20, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested that Respondent furnish information relevant and necessary to the collective-bargaining process, including names, job classifications, and starting dates of bargaining unit employees, wages and hours of work, overtime wages, incentives, and various benefits and payments concerning said unit employees. Commencing on or about May 21, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective-bargaining of all employees in said unit and has refused, and continues to refuse, to supply the aforesaid information relevant and necessary to collective bargaining.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since May 21, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent, set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. In addition, having found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to provide the Union with information relevant for collective bargaining, we shall require Respondent to furnish the Union with such information.

---

[2] Respondent contended in the underlying representation proceeding, Case 27-RC-6168, that it is exempt from the Board's jurisdiction on the grounds that it is a religious organization engaged in a religious mission and on the basis of pervasive contacts with the city of Denver and the Federal Government. On March 9, 1981, following a hearing before a hearing officer of the Board, the Regional Director for Region 27 issued a Decision and Direction of Election rejecting these contentions and finding that Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Sec. 2(2) of the Act. Thereafter, Respondent filed with the Board a timely request for review of the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election. The request for review was denied by the Board on April 8, 1981. Respondent has raised no issues in the instant proceeding which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. Rather, Respondent has requested that the Board enter an order finding that Respondent refused to bargain. Respondent states in the amended stipulation that it has requested the Board to do so in order to expedite the resolution of the jurisdictional issue herein on appeal to the United States Court of Appeals. We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any jurisdictional issues which are properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding, and find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[3] The tally of ballots showed that 24 votes were cast for and 4 votes against the Union, with 2 challenged ballots.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817; Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Denver Post of the National Society of the Volunteers of America is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. United Nurses, Professionals, and Health Care Employees, Division of United Food and Commercial Workers, Local No. 7, AFL-CIO, CLC, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time counselors of the Employer at its Brandon, Columbine, Victim Assistance, Triad, Bannock, and Fillmore facilities, but excluding all office/clerical employees, volunteers, program attorney, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees, constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since April 16, 1981, the above-named labor organization has been and now is the certified and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing on or about May 21, 1981, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of Respondent in the appropriate unit, and, by refusing to provide information relevant and necessary for collective bargaining, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By the aforesaid refusals to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, Denver Post of the National Society of the Volunteers of America, Denver, Colorado, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with United Nurses, Professionals, and Health Care Employees, Division of United Food and Commercial Workers, Local No. 7, AFL-CIO, CLC, as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time counselors of the Employer at its Brandon, Columbine, Victim Assistance, Triad, Bannock, and Fillmore facilities, but excluding office/clerical employees, volunteers, program attorney, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

(b) Refusing to provide to the aforesaid labor organization information relevant and necessary for collective bargaining, including names, job classifications, starting dates, wages and hours of work, overtime wages, incentives, and benefits and payments concerning unit employees.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement, and provide to said labor organization requested information necessary and relevant to collective bargaining.

(b) Post at its Brandon, Columbine, Victim Assistance, Triad, Bannock, and Fillmore facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 27, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 27, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

J & L Refrigerated Trucking, Inc. and Michael F. Lordell. Case 17-CA-10330

February 1, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JENKINS, ZIMMERMAN, AND HUNTER

Upon a charge filed on April 30, 1981, by Michael F. Lobdell, an individual, herein called employee Lobdell, and duly served on J & L Refrigerated Trucking, Inc., herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 17, issued a complaint on May 28, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

The charge was filed on April 30, 1981, by employee Lobdell, and duly served on Respondent by certified mail on or about the same day. On May 28, 1981, the Regional Director issued a complaint and notice of hearing, which was duly served on Respondent by certified mail on or about the same day. When no answer was filed, counsel for the General Counsel on July 15, 1981, sent, by ordinary mail, a letter advising Respondent that it had failed to timely file an answer to the complaint, as required, and requesting Respondent to file an answer by July 22, 1981. When no answer was filed thereafter, counsel for the General Counsel on August 14, 1981, sent, by certified mail, another letter advising Respondent that it had failed to file an answer to the complaint as required by the Board's Rules and Regulations and informing Respondent of the consequences of its failure to timely file an answer thereto; namely, that such would have the effect of admitting all of the allegations in the complaint. The letter further advised Respondent that consideration would be given to filing to the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment if no answer were filed by August 24, 1981. The foregoing letter was received by Respondent on August 15, 1981. On September 4, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel sent, by certified mail, another letter to Respondent advising it that no answer to the complaint had been received, that if no answer were filed the allegations would be deemed admitted, and further informing Respondent that consideration would be given to filing to the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment if no answer were filed by September 18, 1981. The foregoing letter was received by Respondent on September 5, 1981. Respondent did not, thereafter, file an answer.

On October 15, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a motion for judgment on the pleadings. Subsequently, on October 22, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's motion should not be granted. Respondent has not filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the National Labor Relations Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended, provides, inter alia:

> All allegations in the complaint, if no answer is filed . . . shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board . . . .

As set forth above, Respondent has not filed an answer to the complaint; the time within which to file having passed, we find all allegations in the complaint to be true. There being no issues in dispute, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

At all times material herein, Respondent, a corporation, with a place of business in Lee's Summit, Missouri, has been engaged in the business of interstate transportation of goods and materials. Respondent, in the course and conduct of furnishing transportation of goods and materials in interstate commerce, annually derives gross revenues in excess of $50,000.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

On or about April 6, 1981, Respondent discharged employee Lobdell and, since that date, has failed and refused, and continues to fail and refuse, to reinstate him to his former position of employment. Respondent engaged in the acts and conduct described above because employee Lobdell concertedly complained to Respondent regarding the wages, hours, and working conditions of Respondent's employees, and in order to discourage employees from engaging in such activities or other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

On the basis of the foregoing, we find that Respondent has interfered with, restrained, or coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, or coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and Respondent thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section II, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall order that Respondent offer Michael F. Lobdell immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if his job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed. Moreover, we shall order that Respondent make him whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a consequence of the action taken against him by payment to him of a sum equal to what he would have earned, less net earnings, to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950). Interest on the backpay shall be computed as set forth in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[1]

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent, by discharging Michael F. Lobdell and by failing and refusing to reinstate him to his former position of employment, has interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, J & L Refrigerated Trucking, Inc., Lee's Summit, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Discharging or otherwise interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer Michael F. Lobdell immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if his position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the action taken against him in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its facility in Lee's Summit, Missouri, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[2]

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE AND ORDER QUASHING NOTICE OF HEARING

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

This is a proceeding under Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, following charges filed by Mechanical Systems, Inc. (the Employer), alleging that International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO-CLC (the International Brotherhood), and International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO, Lodge No. 60 of Peoria and Central Illinois (Lodge 60), had violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act by engaging in certain proscribed activity with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign certain work to employees represented by Lodge 60 rather than to employees represented by International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local Union 111, affiliated with AFL-CIO (Local 111).

Pursuant to notice, a hearing was held on March 19, 1981,[1] before Hearing Officer Ronald J. Symkowiak and on March 23, before Hearing Officer Stephen S. Shostrom. All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to adduce evidence bearing on the issues. Thereafter, each party filed a brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the rulings made at the hearings by the Hearing Officers and finds that they are free from prejudicial error. They are hereby affirmed.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following findings:

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER

The Employer, a Delaware corporation with an office and place of business in Rockford, Illinois, is engaged in the construction of mechanical systems for various manufacturing establishments located inside and outside the State of Illinois. During the past year, the Employer has had a gross volume of business in excess of $500,000, and during the same period, has purchased and received goods valued in excess of $50,000 from points located directly outside the State of Illinois. Accordingly, we find that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

The parties stipulated, and we find, that the International Brotherhood, Lodge 60, and Local 111 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of the Dispute

In May 1980, the Employer contracted with Blount Brothers, a construction management firm, to perform work at the John Deere Foundry located in Silvis, Illinois. The task was to improve the ventilation and air pollution control system of the foundry by modifying and expanding the facility's ventilation system. This ventilation system is basically comprised of hoods, ducts, and baghouses which are also known as dust collectors. The project involves four baghouses. Of the three existing baghouses, two were to be modified and updated, and the third was to be disconnected from the system. A fourth baghouse, known as a reverse air system baghouse because of its reverse air cleaning system, was to be errected.

The Employer schedules the performance of work pursuant to what it calls the "critical path method." Essentially this means that work needs to be performed and completed at each phase before the next phase can be initiated. On this project, the time sequence is extremely critical because certain work (e.g., replacing ducts) can only be performed when the foundry is shut down. The annual shutdown period begins the third week of July and ends the first week in August. During the 1980 shutdown, the Employer began work on the project which involved dismantling certain existing ducting and installing new ducting. This work was performed exclusively by employees represented by Local 111 pursuant to the terms of an agreement (called the National Maintenance Agreement) entered into in April 1980 between the Employer and the International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL-CIO (the International Association). The work was successfully completed within the allotted time period.

[1] All dates herein refer to 1981 unless otherwise specified.

Sometime after the summer shutdown work was completed, Dick Johns, executive secretary of the Building Trades Council, requested that the Employer hold a conference with all the local craft unions. The first meeting was held at the Employer's offices in Silvis, Illinois, in October 1980. The craft unions present were the Iron Workers (Local 111), the Boilermakers (Lodge 60), the Millwrights, the Sheet Metal Workers, the Plumbers, and the Electricians. In response to the question of whether an assignment had been made, the Employer's general manager, Stephen J. Teeple, informed the representatives that Local 111 represented employees had performed all the shutdown work and that he saw no reason why they could not continue and finish. Teeple also informed the group that the work was being performed pursuant to the National Maintenance Agreement. At the end of this meeting, and at two subsequent meetings held in January, Gerald Goodwin, president of Lodge 60, made a plea for assignment of part of the work on the new baghouse and ductwork to the Boilermakers. During one of the subsequent meetings, Goodwin delivered to representatives of the Employer and Local 111 what appeared to be an agreement between the Iron Workers and the Boilermakers. Goodwin suggested that the work be divided consistent with this agreement. At each of the January meetings, Leroy Russell, business agent for Local 111, claimed all the work for the Iron Workers.

Thereafter, through efforts of Lodge 60, both the International Brotherhood and the International Association became involved in an effort to resolve this local jurisdictional dispute. Although there appeared to be a tentative agreement that the Employer would comply with any compromise reached between Local 111 and Lodge 60 through their respective Internationals, the Employer by telegram dated February 11 informed all parties that the work was assigned exclusively to Local 111. That same day, Robert Cunningham, the representative for the International Brotherhood who had been assigned to resolve the instant dispute, telephoned Teeple about a site change for the next scheduled meeting (the first involving International representatives). In the conversation, Teeple informed Cunningham that an assignment had already been made to Local 111. After a brief heated discussion wherein Cunningham complained that the assignment made all his efforts to reach an agreement an exercise in futility, Cunningham, according to Teeple, concluded by stating, "I will have to do what I will have to do" and that he "supposed all the other crafts will do the same." Cunningham testified that he told Teeple, "I guess I will just have to do what I will have to do and suppose all the other crafts will do the same, that they will be filing jurisdictional disputes, the Electricians, the Millwrights, and whatever." Later that evening, Goodwin called Teeple at home to discuss the assignment, stating that he believed Lodge 60 would be assigned the work pursuant to the "agreement." However, Teeple reiterated that he preferred having to deal with only one craft, and, in this case, it would be ironworkers. Goodwin ended the conversation by stating, "I've got to do what I've got to do, because that is my work and I'm going to get it."

The following morning, February 12, Teeple received a telephone call from Norm Gittleson, job foreman, informing Teeple that there was a picket line outside the main entrance of the project. There were between 10 to 15 Lodge 60 pickets carrying signs reading:

INFORMATIONAL
Mechanical Systems Unfair
Baghouse Assignment

One of the pickets was Goodwin. The pickets remained at the entrance most of that day. The following day, approximately the same number of pickets were at the entrance carrying signs reading:

ALL WE WANT IS OUR WORK

However, the pickets left near mid-day and have not since reappeared. It was later determined that Goodwin removed the pickets after receiving instructions from International Brotherhood Representative Joseph C. Meredith to do so. On February 12, the Employer filed charges alleging that the International Brotherhood and Lodge 60 had each violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act by the actions taken to secure work for Lodge 60.

B. The Work in Dispute

The work in dispute involves a portion of the construction of a nonpressurized reverse air baghouse by the Employer at the John Deere Foundry in Silvis, Illinois. The Employer has subcontracted certain work involving cranes and the installation of electrical systems and these tasks are not in dispute here.

C. The Contentions of the Parties

The Employer contends that both the International Brotherhood and Lodge 60 violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act through oral threats by their representatives and by engaging in unlawful picketing at the John Deere Foundry jobsite. The Employer argues that there is no agreed-upon method of settling the dispute. On the merits of the dispute, the Employer contends that the disputed work should be awarded to employees represented by Local 111 because these employees have the requisite skills, and because such an award will result in greater efficiency and economy, and will comport with the Employer's preference and practice and with its collective-bargaining agreements with the International Association and Local 111.

Local 111 contends that Lodge 60, through oral threats and subsequent picketing, has violated Section 8(b)(4)(D). It takes no position regarding the International Brotherhood. It argues that there is no agreed-upon method for resolving the dispute. Regarding the merits of the dispute, it contends that the disputed work should be awarded to it because employees represented by it have the requisite skills to perform the work required, the Employer prefers working ironworkers exclusively, there exists collective-bargaining agreements between the Employer and both the International Association and Local 111 covering the disputed work, and considerations of efficiency and economy favor an award to it.

Lodge 60 does not dispute that there is reasonable cause to believe that it has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act, but it does not admit to having violated the Act. It contends, however, that there is no reasonable cause to believe that the International Brotherhood has violated the statute and that the notice to the International Brotherhood should be quashed. Regarding the dispute, it contends that there exists an International agreement to which both it and Local 111 are bound and that an assignment should be made consistent with the agreement. On the merits of the dispute, it contends that the historical distribution of this kind of work and existing International agreements favor an assignment of the disputed work to it. Further, it contends that industry and area practice plus the skills of its members favor such an assignment.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with the determination of a dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that (1) Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act has been violated, and (2) there is no agreed-upon method binding on all parties for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute. All parties agree, and we find, that there is no such agreed-upon method[2] although Lodge 60 relies heavily on an agreement between the Unions, which is described below, and contends that the Board should make an award in accord with that agreement.

With regard to the reasonable cause issue, the record establishes that on February 11 Goodwin informed Teeple that he intended to get the disputed work for Lodge 60 and on the following 2 days Lodge 60 members participated in picketing to secure that work. In these circumstances, we find that there is reasonable cause to believe that Lodge 60 has violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act.

With respect to the International Brotherhood, the only evidence presented at the hearing concerning a possible violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) is the testimony of Teeple and Cunningham regarding their telephone conversation on February 11. Cunningham did not deny telling Teeple that he would do what he had to do in an attempt to get the assigned work. However, Cunningham further stated that he coupled this statement with a reference to the filing of a jurisdictional dispute. Furthermore, the evidence establishes that the International Brotherhood neither participated in nor sanctioned the picketing. In fact, the pickets were subsequently removed based on direct orders from Joseph C. Meredith, assistant director of the Construction Division of the International Brotherhood. In these circumstances, we find that, without more, Cunningham's statement, as testified to by Teeple, is ambiguous and, standing alone, is insufficient to establish a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D).[3] Therefore, we find that there is insufficient evidence to conclude there exists reasonable cause to believe that the International Brotherhood engaged in any conduct violative of Section 8(b)(4)(D). Accordingly, the notice of hearing issued against the International Brotherhood in this proceeding will be quashed.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) of the Act requires the Board to make an affirmative award of the disputed work after giving due consideration to various factors.[4]

---

[2] We also find that the evidence in the record is insufficient to warrant the conclusion that all parties reached an actual agreement governing the assignment of the disputed work.

[3] Cf. United Mine Workers of America, Local Union 1368 (Bethlehem Mines Corporation), 227 NLRB 819, 820–821 (1977).

[4] N.L.R.B. v. Radio & Television Broadcast Engineers Union, Local 1212, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO [Columbia Broadcasting System], 364 U.S. 573 (1961).

The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on commonsense and experience reached by balancing those factors involved in a particular case.[5] The following factors are relevant in making the determination of the dispute before us:

1. Collective-bargaining agreements and certifications

There are no certifications of the Board awarding jurisdiction of the work in dispute to employees represented by either of the Unions involved in the present proceeding. However, the Employer is a party to collective-bargaining agreements with the International Association and with Local 111. The Employer has been a party to the National Maintenance Agreement since April 1980 and a party to the Local 111 agreement since December 11, 1980. There is no issue that the disputed work is covered by these agreements. At no relevant time has the Employer been a party to a collective-bargaining agreement with either the International Brotherhood or Lodge 60. Thus, this factor favors an award to the employees represented by Local 111.

2. International agreements

Lodge 60 submitted a "letter of understanding," dated February 8, 1972, to which the International Brotherhood and the International Association are parties, and argues that the work in dispute should be assigned in accord with that agreement.[6] This letter of understanding was the result of a jurisdictional dispute involving the erection of a nonpressurized baghouse at a Valley Consolidated Industries jobsite in 1972. Although the record contains evidence that this letter of understanding has been used to resolve jurisdictional disputes in the industry, it is not binding on the parties, but has been used as a tool to attempt to settle disputes between the parties. While Lodge 60 asserts here that the work should be assigned in conformity with the agreement, Lodge 60 is presently engaged in the erection of several baghouses in the area[7] and the division of work set out in the letter has not been followed on those projects. In any event, the Employer is not a party to this understanding and therefore cannot be bound. Thus, we find that this letter of understanding does not constitute a material factor in the resolution of the instant jurisdictional dispute, and we do not rely on it in making our determination as to which group of employees should be awarded the work.

3. Industry practice

Lodge 60 submitted documentary evidence it received from sister locals indicating that the 1972 letter of understanding had been used throughout the industry to resolve jurisdictional disputes. However, as noted above, Lodge 60 is not maintaining any consistent practice of dividing work on baghouses with employees represented by other craft unions and, in certain instances, has awarded itself all work on baghouses. Furthermore, the testimony of Teeple establishes that, while the Employer has little experience in the construction of baghouses, his previous employer, Great Lakes Crane, Inc., used ironworkers exclusively when performing baghouse work. We find that there is insufficient evidence to establish an industry practice with respect to the division of work on baghouses, and, accordingly, this factor favors neither group of employees.[8]

4. Skills

The record reveals that there are no unusual or highly specialized skills required for the erection of the baghouse or to perform other disputed work. The bulk of the work involves the assembly of components which are fabricated elsewhere and transported to the project. Employees represented by Local 111, while lacking experience in the construction of baghouses, receive substantial training through its apprentice program. Additionally, certain of the work has already been performed by employees represented by Local 111 to the satisfaction of the Employer. Employees represented by Lodge 60, on the other hand, are experienced in the construction of baghouses and are, in fact, presently constructing five in the area. As conceded by the parties, employees in either craft can, if called upon, completely erect a baghouse. Therefore, this factor does not favor an assignment to one group of employees as opposed to the other.

5. Efficiency and economy

The Employer contends that factors of efficiency and economy favored its assignment to Local 111 represented employees. First, the use of one craft would allow it to shift employees readily from one task to another, an extremely important consideration because the "critical path method" requires this flexibility. Second, assigning the work to one craft eliminates potential layoffs when what would normally be considered other craft work is completed. Third, sustaining its assignment would avoid changing the supervisory structure by eliminating the need to hire additional foremen to handle the other crafts. Finally, Local 111 represented employees are also already familiar with the site from their prior work on it. We find that efficiency and economy favor the Employer's assignment of the disputed work to employees represented by Local 111.

---

[5] International Association of Machinists, Lodge No. 1743, AFL–CIO (J. A. Jones Construction Company), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

[6] The 1972 letter of understanding divides the construction or erection of nonpressurized baghouses between three crafts: Boilermakers, Ironworkers, and Millwrights. The Boilermakers in this proceeding is claiming only that work assigned to it under the letter of understanding.

[7] One baghouse is being constructed in Oglesby, Illinois, while four others are being constructed at the Rock Island Arsenal in Rock Island, Illinois.

[8] In light of this finding, we make no ruling on the Employer's and Local 111's contention that Lodge 60's evidence on this factor is in any event hearsay.

6. The Employer's past practice and preference

There is evidence establishing that the Employer has had extensive experience working with ironworkers and that on other projects throughout the country it has entered into local agreements in conjunction with the National Maintenance Agreement. Here, consistent with its practice, it signed an agreement with Local 111 after employee-members had performed work for the Employer during the 1980 summer shutdown of the John Deere Foundry. The Employer asserts that work performed by Local 111 represented employees during that period was performed in a timely and competent manner; and it continues to be satisfied with work performed by these employees. We therefore find that these factors favor an award of the work in dispute to employees represented by Local 111.

Conclusion

Upon the record as a whole, and after full consideration of all relevant factors, we conclude that the employees represented by Local 111 are entitled to perform the work in dispute. In reaching this conclusion, we have relied on the collective-bargaining agreements between the Employer and Local 111 and its International, factors of efficiency and economy, and the Employer's past practice and preference. In making this determination, we are awarding the work in dispute to the employees of the Employer who are represented by Local 111, but not to that Union or its members. The present determination is limited to the particular controversy which gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

Pursuant to Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and upon the basis of the foregoing findings and the entire record in this proceeding, the National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute:

1. Employees of Mechanical Systems, Inc., who are represented by International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local Union 111, affiliated with AFL-CIO, are entitled to perform work for Mechanical Systems, Inc., at the John Deere Foundry in Silvis, Illinois, involving a portion of the construction of a nonpressurized reverse air baghouse.

2. International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers AFL-CIO, Lodge No. 60 of Peoria and Central Illinois, is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force or require Mechanical Systems, Inc., to assign the work in dispute to its members.

3. Within 10 days from the date of this Decision and Determination of Dispute, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO, Lodge No. 60 Peoria and Central Illinois, shall notify the Regional Director for Region 33, in writing, whether or not it will refrain from forcing or requiring the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act, to assign the work in dispute in a manner inconsistent with the above determination.

ORDER

It is hereby ordered that the notice of hearing issued in Case 33-CD-240 against the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO-CLC, be, and it hereby is, quashed.

United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers & Allied Workers, Local 189 and Northwest Foam Systems, Inc. and Carpenters Local No. 286, United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners of America, AFL-CIO. Case 19-CD-393

February 12, 1982

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN VAN DE WATER AND MEMBERS JENKINS AND HUNTER

This is a proceeding under Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, following a charge filed by Northwest Foam Systems, Inc., herein called the Employer, alleging that United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers & Allied Workers, Local 189, herein called Roofers, had violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act by engaging in certain proscribed activity with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign certain work to employees represented by Roofers rather than to employees represented by Carpenters Local No. 286, United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, herein called Carpenters.

Pursuant to notice, a hearing was held on August 26, 1981, before Hearing Officer Melvin R. Kang. The Roofers did not appear for the hearing and the hearing went forward without it. The Employer and Carpenters appeared and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to adduce evidence bearing on the issues. No briefs were filed by the parties.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the Hearing Officer's rulings made at the hearing and finds that they are free from prejudicial error. They are hereby affirmed.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following findings:

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER

The parties present stipulated, and we find, that the Employer is a State of Montana corporation with an office and place of business in Great Falls, Montana, where it is engaged in the business of applying urethane insulation on buildings and roofs. It was further stipulated, and we find, that based on the period from May to August 1981 the Employer will realize projected gross revenue in excess of $500,000 and that during the past 3 months it purchased goods valued in excess of $50,000 from suppliers located outside the State of Montana. On the basis of the foregoing, we find that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

259 NLRB No. 171

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

The parties present stipulated, and we find, that the Roofers and Carpenters are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of the Dispute

Early in 1981, the Employer contracted with the Cascade County government to perform construction work at the Cascade County Convalescent Hospital and Cascade County Courthouse Annex. James H. Rohlk, the Employer's owner and president, testified that this building construction does not allow for internal application of insulation. Thus, the specifications written by the county required that the insulation would "be applied exterior . . ." and coated with an ultraviolet protection over the urethane foam that was applied.

On or about May 1, 1981, the Employer and the Carpenters entered into a collective-bargaining agreement covering the Employer's employees. The recognition clause of the agreement states:

> Section 1. The Employer recognizes the Union as the sole and exclusive bargaining agent for all employees performing bargaining unit work historically covered by this Agreement and covered by occupational and geographical jurisdiction of this Union. The coverage of this Agreement shall be all bargaining unit work historically covered by this Agreement and normally performed by insulators over which the Employer has control. . . .

At or about the same time the Employer assigned all urethane insulating foam application tasks to employees who are members of and represented by the Carpenters.

On or about May 4, 1981, an agent of the Roofers demanded that such work be assigned to employees who are members of that labor organization rather than to those represented by the Carpenters. On or about July 28, 1981, the Roofers picketed the Employer at its jobsites at the Cascade County Convalescent Hospital and at the Cascade County Courthouse Annex. The picket signs bore the following legend:

Jurisdictional Dispute with Carpenters Local No. 286 Roofers Local 189

B. The Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the assignment of all tasks associated with the application of urethane insulating foam at the Employer's jobsites at the Cascade County Convalescent Hospital and the Cascade County Courthouse Annex.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer and the Carpenters, at the hearing, basically took the same position.[1] Thus, they contend that the Employer has assigned the disputed work in accordance with their contract. In addition, they contend that the disputed work is essentially the application of insulating materials and that this work has traditionally been within the jurisdiction of the Carpenters. Finally, they contend that other employers in the area performing the same work also have contracts with the Carpenters.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed upon a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

The record reveals that on or about May 4, 1981, the Roofers agents and representatives demanded that the work in dispute be assigned to employees who are represented by the Roofers rather than employees who are represented by the Carpenters. On or about July 28, 1981, the Roofers picketed the Employer at its jobsites at the Cascade County Convalescent Hospital and the Cascade County Courthouse Annex with signs stating the existence of a jurisdictional dispute between Carpenters Local No. 286 and Roofers Local 189. At the hearing, the Carpenters representative stated that it would continue to claim the disputed work. The record contains no evidence that the Roofers will not also continue to claim the disputed work. The record does, however, contain evidence that employees of other employers expressed reluctance to cross the picket line and that the picketing caused a delay in the expected performance date or completion date of the contract between the Employer and the county government. On the basis of the foregoing, we find there is reasonable cause to believe that the picketing by the Roofers violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act. Further, the parties present at the hearing stipulated that there does not exist any agreed-upon method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination under Section 10(k) of the Act.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) of the Act requires that the Board make an affirmative award of disputed work after giving due consideration to various factors.[2] The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on commonsense and experience reached by balancing those factors involved in a particular case.[3]

The following factors are relevant in the determination of the dispute before us.

1. Collective-bargaining agreement

The Employer and the Carpenters are signatories to a contract which contains a provision which covers the work in dispute. The Employer has no collective-bargaining agreement with the Roofers. We therefore find that this factor favors awarding the disputed work to the employees represented by the Carpenters.

2. Company practice

James H. Rohlk, the Employer's owner and president, conceded that the type of insulation involved in this case is novel and unique and, at the time of the hearing, had been in the area for a brief period of time. Accordingly, we find that there is insufficient evidence in the record to favor an award of the disputed work to either group of employees on the basis of the Employer's past practice.

3. Relative skills

The evidence in the record regarding skills does not favor an award to either group of employees.

4. Employer preference

Since on or about May 1, 1981, the Employer has used employees represented by the Carpenters to perform the disputed work. It is satisfied with the results of its assignment and prefers that employees represented by the Carpenters continue to do this work. Thus, the Employer's preference favors an assignment of the disputed work to the employees represented by the Carpenters.

---

[1] As noted previously, neither party filed a brief.

[2] N.L.R.B. v. Radio & Television Broadcast Engineers Union, Local 1212, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO [Columbia Broadcasting System], 364 U.S. 573 (1961).

5. Area practice

Although it was contended that the area employers generally use carpenters to perform insulation work, the Employer's president also stated that the type of insulation herein is novel and unique to the area. Accordingly, as the record does not reveal a clear area practice, we find that area practice is not a factor favoring either group of employees.

Conclusion

While the record as a whole does not contain evidence of many of the factors we deem relevant in awarding disputed work, it does contain evidence that the Employer assigned the disputed work to the employees represented by the Carpenters on the basis of its collective-bargaining agreement with that labor organization. Further, the record reveals that the Employer is satisfied with the performance of the carpenters and prefers that they continue to perform the work in dispute. On the basis of the foregoing, we conclude that the employees who are represented by the Carpenters are entitled to perform the work in dispute and we shall therefore award the work in dispute to them. In making this determination, we are awarding the disputed work to employees who are represented by the Carpenters, but not to that Union or its members. Additionally, the scope of our award is limited to the controversy which gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

Pursuant to Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and upon the basis of the foregoing findings and the entire record in this proceeding, the National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute:

1. Employees of Northwest Foam Systems, Inc., who are represented by Carpenters Local No. 286, United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, are entitled to perform all tasks associated with the application of urethane insulating foam at the Employer's jobsites at the Cascade County Convalescent Hospital and the Cascade County Courthouse Annex.

2. United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers & Allied Workers, Local 189, is not entitled, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act, to force or require Northwest Foam Systems, Inc., to assign the disputed work to employees represented by that labor organization.

3. Within 10 days from the date of this Decision and Determination of Dispute, United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers & Allied Workers, Local 189, shall notify the Regional Director for Region 19, in writing, whether or not it will refrain from forcing or requiring the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act, to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with the above determination.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On September 24, 1979, Administrative Law Judge Marvin Roth issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge only to the extent consistent herewith.

As more fully described by the Administrative Law Judge, the record shows that, from approximately December 1974 until December 15, 1977, Denzil S. Alkire (Alkire) operated a trucking business as an individual proprietorship hauling coal, rock, and other materials in the Buckhannon, West Virginia, area. Alkire's business consisted of hauling materials under nonunion conditions until 1975, when Alkire began hauling coal for the Badger Coal Company (Badger). This work for Badger soon accounted for 90 percent of Alkire's operations. Alkire's drivers became union members and were covered by the terms of Badger's contract with the United Mine Workers (UMW) when they hauled coal from union mines. Alkire's mechanics and other shop employees were not covered by the union contract.

On September 15, 1977, the same day that a grievance by Alkire's employees alleging that they were not receiving union scale was adjusted, Alkire formed Upshur as a corporation. Following the commencement of a strike by Alkire's employees on December 6, 1977,[1] and Alkire's announced dissolution of "D. S. Alkire Trucking" and termination of Alkire's employees on December 15, 1977, the Upshur corporate entity became involved in operating the trucking business on approximately January 1, 1978.

It was on this same date, approximately January 1, 1978, that Dennett Houdteshell verbally agreed to take over the trucking business from Alkire. However, it was not until February 8, 1978, that Mountaineer (formed by Owner-President Houdteshell) was incorporated or until March 27, 1978, that an agreement of sale was executed by Alkire with Houdteshell for Mountaineer. This written agreement was conditioned upon Houdteshell's obtaining a loan for the purchase price from the Small Business Administration and private banks. Pending the consummation of the sale, Houdteshell leased the business from Alkire.

The complaint allegations to which the General Counsel's exceptions are directed involved certain actions taken by Respondents because the employees engaged in a strike. Specifically, these allegations are that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by requiring the employees to file new employment applications as a condition of employment and by failing to recall certain employees, and delaying the recall of other employees, who were economic strikers and who had made unconditional offers to return to work. The alleged requirement to file new employment applications occurred on February 8, 1978, and the failures or delays in reinstatement occurred after the strike ended on March 27, 1978.

The Administrative Law Judge found that in December 1977 Alkire terminated his employees for a nondiscriminatory and lawful reason; namely, because he was going out of business. He went on to point out that an employer has an absolute right to go out of business regardless of the motivation and found that the evidence fails even to demonstrate a discriminatory motive. In addition he found that, as Alkire lawfully terminated his employees in December 1977, Upshur and Mountaineer could lawfully require former employees of Alkire to file new job applications as a condition of employment. In view of those findings, the Administrative Law Judge found that it becomes immaterial whether Mountaineer was a successor employer because, since Alkire did not commit any unfair labor practices for which Mountaineer could be held liable, Mountaineer owed no greater legal obligation to Alkire's former employees than it did to any other prospective job applicants. Hence, the Administrative Law Judge found that the remaining questions for consideration were—and limited his discussion to—whether Straight, acting on behalf of Mountaineer, failed or refused to hire any of the alleged discriminatees because of their union or concerted activities and, if so, whether Alkire and/or Upshur were also responsible for such conduct.

[1] On December 6, 1977, the National Bituminous Coal Agreement of 1974 expired by its terms, and the United Mine Workers engaged in an industrywide strike which lasted until approximately March 27, 1978, when a new contract was negotiated. In early April there was a wildcat strike at Badger, and as a result Badger did not resume full operations until middle or late April 1978. The events involving Respondent's employees essentially paralleled these dates.

For reasons discussed below, we find that the Administrative Law Judge failed to analyze properly the complaint allegations. Central to these allegations is whether an alter ego relationship existed among Alkire, Upshur, and Mountaineer. While the Administrative Law Judge paid lip service to the General Counsel's alter ego contentions,[2] he failed to examine fully the relationship among the Respondents during the critical period from January 1, 1978, until August 1, 1978. Thus, he found that "Upshur and Mountaineer were joint employers, and therefore that both were responsible for any personnel actions which were taken during this period." But he failed to examine fully the complaint allegation that Upshur was a successor and alter ego of Alkire, or that Mountaineer was a successor and alter ego of Alkire and Upshur.

The legal principles to be applied in determining whether two factually separate employers are in fact alter egos are well settled. Although each case must turn on its own facts, we generally have found alter ego status where the two enterprises have "substantially identical" management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision, as well as ownership.[3] There is no room for disagreement on this record regarding the substantially identical business purpose, operation, equipment, and customers of Alkire, Upshur, and Mountaineer. Thus we shall concentrate our discussion on the management, supervision, and ownership of these three named Respondents.

Denzil Alkire operated his trucking business as a sole proprietorship until December 15, 1977. Beginning in January 1978, Upshur, which Denzil Alkire formed in September 1977, became involved in the operation of the trucking business.[4] At all times material here, Denzil Alkire and his family owned and controlled Upshur. Thus, it is plain that control of the trucking business did not change in January 1978 and that Upshur was a successor and alter ego of Alkire.[5]

Although the relationship between Alkire-Upshur and Mountaineer is more complex, the economic realities of the relationship demonstrate that Houdteshell and Straight were essentially the managers of, and Mountaineer was the alter ego of Alkire-Upshur with respect to, the trucking business during the times material here. In reaching this conclusion, we have relied on the following record evidence.

The record shows that Mountaineer was able to "lease" Alkire's business for 6 months without ever investing any of its own capital or acquiring a real financial interest in the business assets. Thus, Mountaineer made no downpayment or deposit on the business equipment and facilities.[6] Mountaineer was not required to invest any of its own capital in rental payments. Mountaineer was not required to pay other business expenses such as license fees, property taxes, truck insurance, and maintenance costs. Other expenses were deducted from business receipts before the profits were remitted to Alkire. In contrast to Mountaineer's noninvestment of financial resources in the business, Alkire "loaned" Mountaineer $12,000 to cover the first payroll, purchased new equipment in the name of Upshur, and co-signed for 10 new trucks purchased in Mountaineer's name.

Nor did Mountaineer reap any of the benefits associated with business ownership. Instead, Houdteshell, Mountaineer's owner and president, received a $400 a week salary which was deducted from the receipts as an operating expense. In effect, Houdteshell received a guaranteed salary without regard to having any profits to draw on.[7] By contrast, Alkire received the same salary as Houdteshell and the lease provided tnat Alkire would receive 100 percent of the net profits.

Although there are no written provisions in the lease agreement governing the manner in which Alkire's trucking business was to be operated by Mountaineer, the record reveals that Alkire continued to play a substantial role in the actual operation of the business during the period when the alleged discrimination against Alkire's employees took place. Thus, Alkire computed or helped compute job bids. Alkire purchased supplies. Alkire sought and obtained financing and permits from the State of West Virginia to operate the trucks remaining in Alkire's name. Although Straight handled labor relations matters for Mountaineer, the record shows that Alkire recommended that at least one employee be hired and he was consulted before another employee was placed on the payroll. In short, Alkire continued to have influence and played a substantial role in the operation of the trucking business from his position as salaried consultant during the time that Upshur and Mountaineer were operating the trucking business.

[2] The Administrative Law Judge found that "as the General Counsel correctly points out in his brief, in order to determine the status of the alleged discriminatees, it is first necessary to examine the relationships among the three Respondents during the critical period from mid-December, when Alkire sent the termination letters to his employees, until July 22, when H & A purchased the business."

[4] The management and supervision of Upshur rested in the hands of Denzil Alkire, Houdteshell, and Straight. Houdteshell had been a driver for Alkire prior to December 1977 and was in charge of the business while Alkire was in Florida in January 1978. Straight had been Alkire's dispatcher with some supervisory responsibilities. It will be recalled that, during the first quarter of 1978, the hauling business consisted of nonunion jobs until the strike was settled.

[5] Associated Transport Company of Texas, Inc., and Transamerica Transport, Inc., 194 NLRB 62, 63 (1971).

[6] By contrast Alkire's sale to H & A included a $50,000 downpayment and specified monthly payments against a deed of trust held by Alkire.

[7] Compare Big Bear Supermarkets, 239 NLRB at 182 (Holmes' "Draw on Anticipated Profits").

Alkire testified that Houdteshell was to receive "a fair salary and not an excessive amount because I didn't want to delete [sic] any of the assets of the company."

On the record as whole, we find that Houdteshell's position was essentially that of a manager of the trucking operations, that Alkire-Upshur and Mountaineer were joined in a single integrated business, and that Mountaineer was Alkire's alter ego at least during the period the lease was in effect. In so finding we rely on the substantially identical business purpose, operation, equipment, and customers of Respondents, Alkire's role in the actual operations of Mountaineer, and, particularly, the economic realities of the lease agreement whereby Mountaineer invested no capital and Alkire retained all the financial risks and received all the profits which demonstrated that Mountaineer was directly or indirectly subject to the economic power of Alkire.[8]

It is plain from the foregoing findings and the record as a whole that this is not a case involving, simply, an employer's right to go out of business. Thus, Alkire did not sell his trucking business until July 1978 and then he sold not to Mountaineer but to H & A. Until that time, Alkire continued to own all the assets and received all the profits from the business. Although Alkire made an oral agreement to sell the business to Houdteshell in January 1978, the business continued to operate under the Upshur name, Alkire's alter ego, at least until March 27, 1978. Thus, the Administrative Law Judge found, properly, that "during the period from February 8 to March 27, when the business as being operated and managed by Houdteshell and David Straight, in the name of Upshur, that Upshur and Mountaineer were joint employers, and therefore were both responsible for any personnel actions which were taken during this period."

The alleged unlawful conduct involving the requirement that Alkire's employees file new job applications as a condition of employment with Mountaineer occurred in this period, during which, as the Administrative Law Judge properly found, Upshur and Mountaineer were joint employers. Despite his finding that Upshur and Mountaineer were "both responsible for any personnel actions taken during this period," the Administrative Law Judge failed to consider that Upshur was an alter ego of Alkire, and consequently failed to analyze the effect of Alkire's involvement in the personnel action of the joint employers.

It is well established that an alter ego has the same obligation to employees as the original employer. We have found that the record evidence here establishes that Upshur was a successor and alter ego of Alkire and that Mountaineer was a successor and alter ego of Alkire and Upshur. Thus, regardless of whether Alkire's layoff or termination of his striking employees in December 1977 violated the Act,[9] it is plain that Upshur and Mountaineer violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by requiring in February 1978 the striking Alkire employees to file new job applications as a condition of employment.[10]

Finally, we turn to the complaint allegation that Mountaineer violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by failing to recall certain Alkire employees who were economic strikers and who made unconditional offers to return to work. The record shows that, within a short time after the strike ended on March 27, Mountaineer switched 12 drivers who had been working nonunion jobs to the union jobs of hauling Badger coal. Of these 12 employees 9 were strikers who had applied for reinstatement. The other three employees were new hires who had not worked for Alkire at the time of the strike.

The record also shows that 18 of the 26 union drivers employed by Alkire prior to the strike had submitted formal written applications for employment with Mountaineer. Such applications were equivalent to unconditional offers to return to work.[11] In addition, UMW Representative Gary Jordan asked Straight if he intended to employ two other employees who had not submitted applications. Such remarks in the circumstances here indicated that these two employees were interested in returning to work and satisfied the requirement of unconditional offers to return.[12]

The Administrative Law Judge found that Denzil Alkire consistently acted in the manner of a person who wished to get out of business as soon as possible and whose continuing involvement in the business was for the purpose of preserving a saleable asset until the sale could be consummated. However, the gravamen is, as Alkire acknowledged in his testimony, that Alkire maintained control of the business. Absent an arm's-lengths transaction, Alkire and its alter ego effectively remained a single employer for the purposes of this proceeding.

[9] No exceptions were filed to the Administrative Law Judge's dismissal of the complaint allegations that Alkire violated the Act by discriminatorily laying off his employees on or about December 6, 1977.

As an alter ego of Alkire-Upshur, Mountaineer had the same obligation to reinstate economic strikers as Alkire.[13] Thus, any economic striker who made an unconditional offer to return to work must be reinstated to his former position, unless he has been permanently replaced or some other legitimate business reason for the refusal to reinstate exists.[14] The burden of proving the permanent replacement or other business justification is on Respondents here.[15]

The General Counsel established a prima facie case by showing that: (1) the alleged discriminatees participated in a lawful economic strike, and (2) upon the employees' unconditional offer to return, Respondents refused to offer certain of them reinstatement to their former positions, or their substantial equivalents. At this point the burden shifted to Respondents to prove that they had legitimate and substantial business justification for failing to reinstate the employees.

Respondents did not contend, as an affirmative defense, or present evidence to show, that the employees named in the complaint were not reinstated because they had been permanently replaced.[16] Nor have Respondents presented evidence as to why they failed to resume work at pre-strike levels with a full employee complement.[17] Accordingly, we find on the record before us that Respondents have failed to satisfy their burden of providing evidence that they had legitimate and substantial business justification for failing to reinstate the employees named in the complaint.[18]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Denzil S. Alkire, a sole proprietorship, and its alter ego Upshur Enterprises, Inc., as well as Upshur Enterprises Inc., and its alter ego Mountaineer Hauling & Rigging, Inc., constitute a single employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Mountaineer Hauling & Rigging, Inc., is the alter ego of Upshur Enterprises, Inc., in the operation of Respondents' trucking operations in the Buckhannon, West Virginia, area.

3. United Mine Workers of America, District 31, Local No. 2028, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. By conditioning reinstatement of striking employees upon their submitting a new application form, Respondents engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. By unlawfully refusing to reinstate certain employees, and by delaying the reinstatement of certain other employees, named below, Respondents engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

7. Respondents did not violate the Act by any conduct not found herein to constitute an unfair labor practice.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order them to cease and desist therefrom and to take affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

[13] The Administrative Law Judge's discussion of Respondent's treatment of the Alkire employees for the purpose of recall and reinstatement following the conclusion of the strike on March 27 is misplaced. The Administrative Law Judge delved into whether Mountaineer refused to hire Alkire employees discriminatorily. Finding no discrimination, he found it unnecessary to determine whether Alkire was a joint employer with Mountaineer.

The first issue the Administrative Law Judge should have considered was the relationship of Mountaineer to Alkire-Upshur. Thus, since the record shows that Mountaineer was an alter ego of Upshur, Mountaineer had the same obligation to the striking employees as Alkire. The Bell Company, Inc., etc., 225 NLRB 474 (1976); Helrose Bindery, Inc. and Graphic Arts Finishing, Inc., 204 NLRB 499 (1973); and Loren Service, Inc., Draber Press, Inc., Bernard Dramen and Harold Berman, 208 NLRB 763 (1974).

[15] N.L.R.B. v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., supra at 378, where the Supreme Court described the principles controlling reinstatement rights of unreplaced economic strikers as follows:

> Section 2(3) of the Act . . . provides that an individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of a labor dispute continues to be an employee if he has not obtained regular and substantially equivalent employment. If, after conclusion of the strike, the employer refuses to reinstate striking employees, the effect is to discourage employees from exercising their rights to organize and to strike guaranteed by Secs. 7 and 13 of the Act . . . . Under Section 8(a)(1) and (3) . . . it is an unfair labor practice to interfere with the exercise of these rights. Accordingly, unless the employer who refuses to reinstate strikers can show that his action was due to "legitimate and substantial business justifications," he is guilty of an unfair labor practice. N.L.R.B. v. Great Dan Trailers, 388 U.S. 26, 34 (1967). The burden of proving justification is on the employer. [Emphasis supplied.]

[16] As described above, Mountaineer moved 12 employees from nonunion jobs to union jobs after March 27, 1978, when the strike ended and union work resumed. Among these 12 employees were 3 employees who had not worked for Alkire. It is apparent that these three new employees were not hired as permanent replacements for union jobs, which resumed after March 27, prior to the unconditional offers to return to work on February 1978 by the employees named in the complaint.

[17] The Administrative Law Judge described in detail the various reasons offered by Respondents for refusing to reinstate the employees named in the complaint. Such reasons ranged from lack of education or poor driving record to failure to file a job application or simply forgetting the employee. But such reasons had no bearing on economic decision to eliminate certain strikers' jobs. See Pillows of California, 207 NLRB 369 (1973). See also fn. 18, infra.

[18] Houdteshell testified that Mountaineer did not have any duty to rehire any of the Alkire employees. Although Houdteshell's misplaced view of Mountaineer's obligation to Alkire's employees offers some explanation, it offers no excuse for Respondents' failure to present evidence of legitimate and substantial business justification for failing to reinstate the employees named in the complaint.

Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by unlawfully failing and refusing to recall John Courtney, Larry Courtney, Ogden Bragg, William Davis, Harvey Lattea, Bob Small, Larry Lantz, and James Detamore and by delaying the recall of John McNeely from March 27, 1978, to May 19, 1978. The General Counsel concedes that Alkire's sale of the trucking business to H & A, an event which terminated backpay, was an arm's-length transaction and he requests backpay only until August 1, 1978.[19] Accordingly, we shall order Respondents to make whole the named employees for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of Respondents' discrimination against them. The loss of earnings shall be computed as set forth in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[20] See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). We shall also order that Respondents mail a copy of the attached notice to each employee who was on their payroll as of August, 1978, as well as to the named discriminatees, at their last known mailing address as shown in Respondents' records.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondents, Denzil S. Alkire, a sole proprietorship; Upshur Enterprises, Inc.; and Mountaineer Hauling & Rigging, Inc., Buckhannon, West Virginia, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Unilaterally requiring striking employees to execute new job application forms as a condition of employment.

(b) Discouraging membership in any labor organization by unlawful discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action:

(a) Make whole the following employees for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of Respondents' discrimination against them, in the manner set forth as described in "The Remedy" section of this Decision and Order:

John Courtney
Larry Courtney
Ogden Bragg
William Davis
Harvey Lattea
Bob Small
Larry Lantz
James Detamore
John McNeely

(b) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Mail to all employees who were employed by Respondents as of August 1, 1978, at their last known mailing address copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being duly signed by Respondents' representative, shall be mailed by Respondents immediately upon receipt thereof.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 6, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondents have taken to comply herewith.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act other than those found in this Decision and Order.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

Following a hearing in which all parties had the opportunity to participate and offer evidence, it has been found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. We have been ordered to post this notice and to abide by what we say in this notice.

WE WILL NOT require striking employees to execute new job application forms as a condition of employment.

WE WILL NOT discourage membership in any labor organization by discriminating in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any terms or conditions of employment.

---

[19] The precise date that Alkire's sale to H & A became effective is not clear from the record, and shall be resolved in compliance proceedings.

[20] Member Jenkins would compute interest on backpay in accordance with his partial dissent in Olympic Medical Corporation, 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

[21] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole the following employees for any loss of pay they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, plus interest:

John Courtney
Larry Courtney
Ogden Bragg
William Davis
Harvey Lattea
Bob Small
Larry Lantz
James Detamore
John McNeely

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Marvin Roth, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard at Buckhannon, West Virginia, on December 21 and 22, 1978. The charge and amended charge were filed, respectively, on April 24 and July 3, 1978, by United Mine Workers of America, District 31, Local No. 2028 (herein the Union). The complaint, which issued on July 6, 1978, and was amended on November 3, 1978, alleges that Denzil S. Alkire, a sole proprietorship, Upshur Enterprises, Inc., and Mountaineer Hauling & Rigging, Inc. (herein respectively Alkire, Upshur, and Mountaineer and collectively Respondents). violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. The gravamen of the complaint is that Upshur and Mountaineer were and are successors to and/or alter egos of Alkire, that Alkire laid off and purported to terminate employees John Courtney, John McNeely, Larry Courtney, Larry Lantz, James Detamore, Harvey Lattea, Ogden Bragg, William Davis, and Robert Small, because of their union and concerted activities, that Alkire and Mountaineer discriminatorily required them to file new employment applications as a condition of employment, and that Respondents discriminatorily delayed in recalling from layoff and reinstating John McNeely and John Courtney, and discriminatorily failed and refused to recall or reinstate the other alleged discriminatees. Respondents by their respective answers deny alter ego or successor status, and deny the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to participate, to present relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Upon the entire record in this case[1] and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the briefs submitted by the parties, I make the following:

Findings of Fact

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENTS

From about December 1, 1974, until about December 15, 1977, Denzil S. (Chub) Alkire operated at his office and place of business in Buckhannon, West Virginia, a trucking business as an individual proprietorship hauling coal, rock, and other materials by truck in and around Buckhannon, for customers including Badger Coal Company (herein Badger). Upshur, a West Virginia corporation, was formed in September 1977 and at all times material was wholly owned by the Alkire family. The nature of its activities will be discussed, infra. Mountaineer, also a West Virginia corporation, was incorporated on February 8, 1978, and until October 2, 1978, was wholly owned by Dennett (Slim) Houdteshell, who was its president. In 1978 Mountaineer was engaged at Buckhannon in the business of hauling coal, rock, and other materials by truck for enterprises including Badger. During 1977, Alkire, in the course and conduct of its business operation, provided services to Badger, from which Alkire derived gross income in excess of $50,000. During 1978, Mountaineer in the course and conduct of its business operation provided services to Badger, from which services Mountaineer derived gross income of $50,000. During 1977 and 1978 respectively, Badger purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of West Virginia for use within West Virginia. During the same period of time, Badger sold, shipped, and delivered goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 to enterprises located outside West Virginia from its facilities located within West Virginia. I find that, at times material to this case, Alkire and Mountaineer were employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it would effectuate the purposes of the Act for the Board to assert its jurisdiction in this case.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The evidence adduced in this case indicates that the Union is an organization in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, and conditions of work. I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Developments up to December 6, 1977

Prior to 1975, Alkire engaged in hauling on a relatively small scale, and his business substantially consisted of hauling material under nonunion conditions. However, in 1975 Alkire began hauling coal for Badger. Badger's employees were covered by the United Mine Workers (UMW) National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement of

[1] The official transcript of proceedings is hereby corrected.

1974. Therefore, as Alkire's driver employees were hauling coal from union mines, they became covered by the terms of that agreement when they performed such work. Alkire either was or became a signatory to the UMW agreement. Badger coal hauling soon accounted for more than 90 percent of Alkire's operations. Alkire's drivers became union members, and the Union functioned as their collective-bargaining representative. Alkire's mechanics and other shop employees were deemed by the Union as being engaged in work at a nonunion location, and therefore were not covered by the UMW agreement. Alkire also utilized the services of owner-operators who were covered by the agreement when hauling Badger coal.

Alkire soon ran into a serious problem. In order to obtain a contract to haul Badger coal, he agreed to a price which precluded him from paying the UMW agreement wage scale without operating at a loss.[2] Alkire's drivers repeatedly complained that they were not receiving union scale. Alkire raised their hourly wage from time to time, in response to their complaints, but their pay scale remained below the union rate. On September 12, 1977,[3] 10 of Alkire's drivers filed a written grievance, alleging that they were not receiving union scale, and wished to be made whole. At the time, Alkire had about 26 driver and equipment operator employees who were covered by the UMW contract. The grievance was signed by six of the alleged discriminatees in this case (Robert Small, John Courtney, Larry Courtney, Jim Detamore, John McNeely, and Larry Lantz) and four employees who are not alleged as discriminatees (Bruce Davis, John Helmick, George Jack, and Kenny Lee). The grievance was signed and endorsed by the Union's mine committee, which consisted of employees Ogden Bragg, Don Parks, and Don Oldaker. Of these, only Bragg is alleged as a discriminatee. Employees William Davis and Harvey Lattea are also alleged as discriminatees, although their names do not appear on the grievance.

In response to the grievance, Alkire admitted that he was paying below union scale, but asserted that his drivers had agreed to accept subscale wages. He insisted that he could not pay union scale and still afford to remain in business. The employees met with Alkire, and also met among themselves and with UMW District 31 Representative Garry Jordon. The employees voted unanimously to demand union scale. Indeed, they indicated their sentiments to Alkire. When Alkire told the assembled employees that he could not afford to operate under union scale, they responded with applause. Jordon was evidently understanding of Alkire's plight, but in view of the employees' position, he indicated to Alkire that he had no alternative but to insist upon union scale. On paper, the grievance was informally resolved by Alkire's agreement to abide by the UMW contract. In fact, Alkire gave his employees a 50-cent-per-hour increase, which still left them below union scale. Some of the employees expressed willingness to go along with this arrangement until a new rate could be negotiated, while others were outspokenly dissatisfied. Alkire's dispatcher, David Straight, who even then performed some functions of a supervisory nature, was aware that such differences existed. However, with only a few exceptions, which will be discussed, the record does not indicate which employees expressed such views. The evidence also does not indicate that any employee quit, went on strike, filed a grievance, or took any other action in protest of the continuing ad hoc arrangement.[4]

On September 15, the same day that the grievance was adjusted, Alkire formed Upshur as a corporation. However, Alkire continued to run his trucking business as an individual proprietorship until he shut down operations in December. The Upshur corporate entity did not become involved in the trucking business until January 1. William Davis, who was a committeeman in 1976 and early 1977, testified that in June 1977 Alkire told him that he was going to form a corporation to get rid of the troublemakers. Alkire testified that he may have told Davis that he was forming a new corporation, but that the purpose was to handle other, nontrucking operations. I am not persuaded that either testimony reflects the real reason why Alkire formed Upshur. As will be discussed, I have not found Davis to be a credible witness as to the reason why he did not file a job application with Mountaineer in the spring of 1978. If in June 1977 Alkire referred to a corporation such as Upshur, then it is difficult to see how Alkire could have expected to get rid of "troublemakers" that way, since the corporation would have been owned, operated, and controlled by Alkire. It is unlikely that Alkire would have referred to a corporation such as Mountaineer; i.e., a corporation owned by other persons. The evidence fails to indicate that, in June 1977, Alkire contemplated selling his trucking business, or that he reasonably could have foreseen the developments which led to his transaction with Dennett Houdteshell and the formation of Mountaineer. The timing of Alkire's action indicates that, in fact, Alkire formed

[2] Evidence adduced at the hearing indicates that this is not an unusual situation in the coal hauling business. As will be discussed, when Houdteshell failed to obtain a loan with which to purchase Alkire's business, Alkire sold the business to H & A Coal Hauling, Inc., which temporarily hauled coal for Badger. However, Badger refused to award a contract to H & A because H & A's bid was too high. Thereafter, the coal was hauled by owner-operators.

[3] All dates herein refer to the period from September 1, 1977, through August 31, 1978, unless otherwise indicated.

[4] Alkire and Upshur contend that, in determining whether Respondents unlawfully terminated or refused to recall or reinstate the alleged discriminatees, I cannot consider the events concerning the September grievance, e.g., on such questions as motive, animus, and knowledge of union or concerted activity, because the events occurred more than 6 months prior to filing of the instant charges. The difficulty with this argument is that the General Counsel's case is not "inescapably grounded" on evidence concerning the grievance or other matters predating the limitation period. Local Lodge No. 1424, International Association of Machinists [Bryan Manufacturing Co.], 362 U.S. 411, 422 1960). Here, the General Counsel contends that discriminatory motive is also shown by evidence within the limitation period, e.g., alleged pretextual reasons for refusing to recall the alleged discriminatees, and statements made during that period, and that, apart from motive, the alleged discriminatees were denied their recall rights as economic strikers. Therefore, events predating the limitations period may, if relevant, be fully considered as evidence on the merits of the complaint. Paramount Cap Manufacturing Co., 119 NLRB 785 (1957), enfd. 260 F.2d 109, 112–113 (8th Cir. 1958); see also N.L.R.B. v. Carpenters District Council of Kansas City and Vicinity, AFL–CIO [J. E. Dunn Construction Co.], 383 F.2d 89, 95–96 (8th Cir. 1967).

Upshur as a means of protecting himself from personal liability in the event that his business was forced by legal action or otherwise to pay the UMW contract wage rate. Indeed, Alkire anticipated that such action would cause him to operate the business at a loss. As will be discussed, when the business was temporarily operated in the Upshur name, it was done for a similar reason; namely, to protect Alkire from personal liability at a time when Alkire was no longer actively involved in running the business.

On December 6, the National Bituminous Coal Agreement of 1974 expired by its terms, and United Mine Workers engaged in an industrywide strike which lasted until on or about March 27, when a new contract was negotiated. In early April there was a wildcat strike at Badger, and as a result Badger did not resume full operations until mid- or late April. The complaint alleges that, on or about December 6, Alkire laid off the alleged discriminatees, that they commenced a strike, and that Alkire took such action in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Alkire and Upshur, in their answer, admit that the employees went on strike, but deny that they were laid off. No evidence was presented as to the circumstances under which the employees ceased working for Alkire on December 6. Consequently, the pertinent allegations of the complaint can be sustained only to the extent admitted by Alkire. I find that, as of December 6, Alkire's employees were engaged in an economic strike over the terms of a new UMW contract. The allegation that Alkire discriminatorily laid off his employees on December 6 is both misleading and incomprehensible. It is evident that, even if Alkire's employees did not go on strike, Alkire would have been forced to lay them off because of the shutdown of Badger's mines, which accounted for nearly all of his business. Therefore, I am recommending that the allegation that Alkire discriminatorily laid off his employees on or about December 6 be dismissed.

B. Developments After December 6, 1977

In mid-December, Alkire sent a letter to each of the union-represented employees, informing them that "as of December 15, 1977, D.S. Alkire Trucking has been dissolved and gone out of business." Alkire added that he was negotiating with a corporation which was interested in leasing or purchasing some of his equipment, and that the corporation might be interested in hiring people to operate the equipment. Alkire testified that, when the strike began, he decided to go out of the hauling business because he was unable to make a profit. Alkire testified that he promptly set about looking for a purchaser. He contacted several prospective purchasers, but decided against an outright sale of the equipment because this would result in a permanent loss of jobs in the community. Alkire then turned to Dennett Houdteshell, one of his drivers. Houdteshell had about 15 years' experience in handling trucks and heavy equipment, both as an owner and as an employee.He had recently fallen on evil days, having served a prison term for receiving and selling stolen goods. Alkire and Houdteshell discussed, negotiated, and arrived at the terms of an agreement. Alkire agreed to sell his trucking business to Houdteshell for $250,000. Houdteshell then applied for a Small Business Administration rehabilitation loan in order to finance the purchase. It is uncontradicted that the Small Business Administration approved the loan in January 1978, but effective as of July 1978, when Houdteshell's parole period would end. In the meantime, Houdteshell unsuccessfully tried to arrange earlier financing through the sale of land owned by his father-in-law. It is also uncontradicted that, in July 1978, the Small Business Administration unexpectedly refused to grant the loan, because of the present pending unfair labor practice litigation. The General Counsel, in his brief, expresses skepticism that Alkire ever seriously expected to sell his business to a person such as Houdteshell. The General Counsel's position is based more on suspicion than hard evidence. It is evident from the record that coal hauling in and around Buckhannon has typically not been a business for conglomerates or well-established firms. Apart from his unfortunate brush with the law, Houdteshell's experience and qualifications to engage in the coal hauling business were not significantly different from those of Denzil Alkire, who preceded him, or James Lee, who followed him.[5] The General Counsel also attaches significance to the fact that, in July 1978, Alkire had no apparent difficulty in finding a financially able purchaser for the business, i.e., Lee, after SBA disapproved the loan to Houdteshell. However, in July 1978, the business was more marketable than in December 1977. In July 1978 the business was fully operative, whereas, in December 1977, the business was virtually moribound as a result of an industrywide strike which had just begun. From mid-December 1977, until the time of this hearing, more than a year later, Denzil Alkire consistently acted in the manner of a person who wished to get out of the hauling business as soon as possible, and whose continuing involvement in the business was for the purpose of preserving a saleable asset (i.e., the business) until a sale could be consummated. The General Counsel does not contend that the sale of the business to the Lee family corprorationn, H & A Coal Hauling, Inc. (herein H & A), in July 1978 was anything other than a bona fide arm's-length transaction between Denzil Alkire and James Lee. As of the time of this hearing, Alkire was completely out of the hauling business, and was actively engaged in a different business. However, this is not the end of the inquiry. Rather, as the General Counsel correctly points out in his brief, in order to determine the status of the alleged discriminatees, it is first necessary to examine the relationships among the three Respondents during the critical period from mid-December, when Alkire sent termination letters to his employees, until July 22, when H & A purchased the business.

About January 1, Houdteshell verbally agreed to take over the business from Alkire. However, no contract was executed until March 27. On that date Alkire and Houdteshell (the latter as president of Mountaineer) entered into a written agreement of sale and lease whereby

[5] Indeed, after the loan fell through, Houdteshell sold the Mountaineer name to Lee and went into a different hauling business. Three of the alleged discriminatees (John McNeely, John Courtney, and Larry Courtney) worked for Houdteshell for a time.

Mountaineer agreed to purchase the trucking business from Alkire for $250,000. The parties further agreed that, pending the sale, Alkire would lease the entire business to Mountaineer. The agreement was conditioned upon Mountaineer obtaining a loan for the purchase price from SBA and private banks. Alkire verbally agreed that Houdteshell would have until July 31 to obtain the money. The business included trucks and other equipment which were subject to a total indebtedness of about $700,000. Alkire agreed to make all payments on the outstanding indebtedness, and to pay all license fees, taxes, insurance, and maintenance expenses on vehicles and other equipment, and could claim depreciation. Mountaineer was to pay all operating expenses, including wages. As rent, Mountaineer agreed to pay Alkire 100 percent of the net profit after expenses, which included Houdteshell's salary. The parties orally agreed that Houdteshell would receive a salary of $400 per week. In sum, pending the sale the parties agreed that Houdteshell would receive only a salary from the business. Moreover, Houdteshell was, in substance, although not in form, guaranteed his salary. When the profits of the business were insufficient to meet Houdteshell's salary, Alkire's corporation, Upshur, loaned him money to make up the difference. Houdteshell also withdrew nearly $9,000 from the business, although he did so without Alkire's approval, and Alkire expressed the view that Houdteshell had no right to do this. One accountant maintained the books for both corporations, and she apportioned costs and expenses in accordance with her understanding of the agreement between Alkire and Houdteshell. The agreement further provided that the parties would agree upon an employment contract for Alkire for a period of at least 1 year following consummation of the sale. During the period of the lease Alkire was nominally retained by Mountaineer as a management consultant at a salary of $400 per week, which he received in addition to the net profit of the business, as provided in the agreement.

Until January 1, 1978, the business continued to be maintained in Alkire's name. Alkire retained only his clerical help, and no trucking work was performed during the latter part of December. On January 3, Alkire left for Florida, leaving Houdteshell in charge of the business. Except for a brief trip, Alkire did not return to West Virginia until early February. In the meantime, Houdteshell functioned as a watchman, although he used this dormant period to familiarize himself with the business. Trucking operations did not resume, even on a limited scale, until at least February 8, and during this period Houdteshell and the office personnel were the only functioning employees. From January 1 until the agreement of sale and lease was executed on March 27, the business was conducted in the name of Upshur, and Houdteshell was retained on Upshur's payroll. Alkire testified that he made this arrangement for tax purposes. As indicated, I find that Alkire made this arrangement to protect himself from personal liability at a time when he was no longer actively involved in running the business.

Mountaineer was incorporated on February 8. Houdteshell was its president and David Straight was vice president and general manager. As indicated, Straight had been Alkire's dispatcher. Under Alkire, Straight had some supervisory responsibilities. He directed work and disciplined employees. However, Alkire normally handled hiring and firing of personnel. Straight worked for Alkire until Alkire sent out the termination notices in mid-December. Thereafter, Straight went on the Upshur payroll until February 10, when he began working, at least, nominally, for Mountaineer. Houdteshell placed Straight in complete charge of personnel and dispatching matters, including hiring and firing of employees, while Houdteshell devoted himself primarily to obtaining work for the business. On or about February 10, Straight notified prospective employees of Mountaineer, including the former Alkire employees, that Mountaineer was taking job applications. Straight testified that he did not consider any individual for employment unless the individual filled out a written application. During the period from February 8 until March 27, when the business functioned in the name of Upshur, Straight hired 7 employees for nonunion work (6 garage personnel and 1 driver) and 12 employees for union work; 5 of the 6 nonunion employees and 9 of the 12 union employees were former Alkire employees. None of the 10 employees who initially signed the September grievance were hired during this period. However, Straight hired two of the three committeemen who endorsed the grievance. Donald Parks was hired as a union operator on February 13, and Donald Oldaker as a union driver on March 27. The complaint does not allege that Respondents or any of them unlawfully refused to recall or reinstate the alleged discriminatees prior to March 27. Rather, the complaint alleges, in sum, that on or about December 15 Alkire unlawfully purported to terminate his employees, that on or about February 8 Alkire and Mountaineer unlawfully required them to file new employment applications as a condition of employment, and that since on or about March 27 Respondents have unlawfully failed and refused to recall or reinstate the alleged discriminatees. After March 27 Mountaineer (in whose name the business was thereafter conducted) did not hire any employees for union work. In April and May Mountaineer hired 11 employees for nonunion work, of whom 1, John McNeely, one of the alleged discriminatees, transferred to union work. Also in May, Donald Oldaker transferred from union work to nonunion work. As Badger did not resume full operations until mid- or late April, and Badger comprised most or all of Mountaineer's union work, it is evident that there was not much union work available until at least that time.

I find that in December Alkire terminated his employees for a nondiscriminatory and lawful reason; namely, because he was going out of business. An employer has an absolute right, under the Act, to go out of business regardless of the motivation. Textile Workers Union of America v. Darlington Manufacturing Co., 380 U.S. 263, 268 (1965). In the present case, the evidence fails even to demonstrate a discriminatory motive. The fact that Alkire's employees were then engaged in an economic strike did not immunize them against such permissible conduct. I further find that, during the period from February 8 to March 27, when the business was being operated and managed by Houdteshell and David Straight, but in the name of Upshur, that Upshur and Mountaineer were joint employers, and therefore that both were responsible for any personnel actions which were taken during this period. Springfield Retirement Residence, a Division of Episcopal Community Services, Inc. and Whelan Food Services, Inc., 235 NLRB 884 (1978). As Alkire lawfully terminated his employees in December, Upshur and Mountaineer could lawfully require former employees of Alkire to file new job applications as a condition of employment. Therefore, I find that Alkire did not violate the Act by terminating his employees, and that Upshur and Mountaineer did not violate the Act by requiring those employees to file job applications as a condition of employment.

In view of the foregoing findings, it becomes immaterial whether Mountaineer was a successor employer. As Alkire did not commit any unfair labor practice for which Mountaineer could be held liable, Mountaineer owed no greater legal obligation to Alkire's former employees than it did to any other prospective job applicants. In sum, Mountaineer's sole obligation was to refrain from failing or refusing to hire them for discriminatory reasons. N.L.R.B. v. Burns International Security Services, Inc., 406 U.S. 272, 280, fn. 5 (1972). Therefore the remaining questions for consideration are, in sum, whether Straight, acting on behalf of Mountaineer, failed or refused to hire any of the alleged discriminatees because of their union or concerted activities and, if so, whether Alkire and/or Upshur was also responsible for such conduct.

David Straight testified that, in hiring employees for Mountaineer, he considered former Alkire employees. Indeed, most of those hired were former Alkire personnel. Straight testified that, of the three applicants hired for union work who were not former Alkire employees, Houdteshell told him to hire one (Lloyd Burgess), who was Houdteshell's brother-in-law, one (James Davis) was recommended by Alkire, and the third (Kenny Moore) was personally known to Straight. Straight further testified that he did not follow seniority insofar as he hired former Alkire employees. In fact, he was not obligated to do so. No pertinent collective-bargaining agreement was in effect until May, when Mountaineer signed a contract with the Union, and the General Counsel does not contend that Respondents or any of them violated a contractual obligation by failing to follow seniority. As the alleged discriminatees did not enjoy the status of economic strikers after they were lawfully terminated, it follows that the allegations of the complaint must be dismissed as to one of them. Harvey Lattea did not sign the September grievance. He did not begin performing union work until September 1977. Straight testified, without contradiction, that he decided not to hire Lattea because of Lattea's poor driving and performance record. I credit Straight. The General Counsel's case with respect to Lattea rests solely on the contention that Lattea enjoyed the status of an economic striker, and therefore was entitled to be recalled to work ahead of any applicants who were not former Alkire employees. As this contention is without merit in the circumstances of this case, it follows that there was no discrimination with respect to Lattea.

As indicated, William Davis was a former committeeman. However, in September 1977, he was working as a mechanic; i.e., performing nonunion work. He was no longer on the committee and did not sign the grievance. Straight testified that he did not hire Davis because Davis never submitted a written application. Davis, in his testimony, admitted that he did not fill out an application. He testified that he declined to do so because the application form improperly called for financial statements, and the Union agreed. I do not credit this explanation. Union Representative Jordon testified that he advised the former Alkire employees to file applications with Mountaineer, and that he did not tell Davis that the form was illegal. Davis also testified that his son advised him not to sign the application because it called for financial statements. However, Davis' son applied himself for a job with Mountaineer, and was hired. The job application form contains an authorization for Mountaineer to make an investigation of the applicant's financial and credit record. However, a proviso permits the applicant to refuse to complete any portion of the form which the applicant believes to be unlawful. The form itself was based on a form used by Badger. The General Counsel does not contend that Davis was privileged to refuse to file an application because the form contained unlawful inquiries. Rather, the General Counsel's position is based on the contention, which I have rejected, that Davis did not have to file an application because he was already an employee of Mountaineer. I find that Davis declined to file an application because he did not wish to go to work for Mountaineer as a new employee. I also do not regard a conversation between Jordon and Straight in February, and a followup conversation in April, as constituting an application for jobs by Davis and other alleged discriminatees. Jordon testified that in February he spoke to Davis, Ogden Bragg, Larry and John Courtney, Larry Lantz, and three or four other former Alkire employees, who asked if they could be reemployed. Jordon then spoke to Straight. According to Jordon, he asserted that "the contract" had a succession clause, and asked if Bragg, Davis, and the Courtneys had jobs. Straight said they did not. They also discussed whether seniority was followed in a successorship situation. Jordon's testimony concerning the conversation was substantially uncontroverted. It is evident that Jordon was suggesting, without flatly asserting, that the former Alkire employees were entitled to be rehired, and that Straight disagreed with the suggestion that they were laid-off or striking employees of Upshur or Mountaineer who enjoyed rights of recall or reinstatement. As Jordon admittedly advised the former Alkire employees to file applications with Mountaineer, it is evident that Jordon did not press this position. I am also not persuaded that Straight used Davis' failure to file an application as a pretext for not hiring. No evidence was presented, other than hearsay, that Straight hired employees who did not submit applications. Straight wished to make his own decisions as to whom to hire and whom not to hire, and he could reasonably infer that any individual who did not file an application with Mountaineer was not interested in a job.[6] I find that there was no discrimination with respect to Davis.

Ogden Bragg took an application form from Straight but never returned it. Straight testified that he also would not have hired Bragg because of his disciplinary record. When they worked for Alkire, Straight gave Bragg a suspension because Bragg walked off a job in the middle of the day. Bragg was not presented as a witness, and Straight's testimony concerning the incident is uncontroverted. If Straight were discriminatorily motivated, then it is difficult to see why he would have refused to hire Bragg while hiring the other two committeemen who endorsed the September grievance.[7] I find that there was no discrimination with respect to Bragg.

John McNeely filed a job application with Mountaineer. David Straight testified, in sum, that he initially did not hire McNeely because he tended to be lazy, and there were better driver applicants available. However, by May Mountaineer needed more drivers, and by then McNeely was one of the better applicants available. McNeely was hired on May 15 as a nonunion driver, but on May 19 he was switched to union work. McNeely testified that Houdteshell and Straight told him that they needed more trucks to haul union coal, asked him if he wanted to do union work, said that they were paying $7 per hour, which was $1.87 below the UMW contract rate, and added that if there was any more trouble from the union men, they would be taken out of the Union and made nonunion. Houdteshell testified that he never discussed the Union with McNeely or said that he would get rid of the union people if they caused trouble. However, Straight testified that Houdtshell called a meeting of the drivers and asked them if they were willing to agree to a rate of $7 per hour. Straight testified that the drivers agreed to accept the $7 rate and that, when McNeely transferred to union work, he also agreed to accept the $7-per-hour rate. I credit McNeely to the extent that I find that, whatever words were used by Houdteshell and Straight, they indicated that they would not pay the UMW contract rate for union work, and that any driver who insisted on receiving the contract rate would be transferred to nonunion work. However, this is not the thrust of the complaint. The complaint does not allege that Respondents or any of them violated the Act by conditioning assignment of the employees to union work on a wage rate less than union scale. In fact, the evidence indicates that throughout the operations in the Buckhannon area the Union consistently tolerated payment of subscale wages for hauling union coal, while giving only lip service to the contract rate. Thus, in late May, after Mountaineer made clear that it would pay only $7 per hour to its union drivers, the Union agreed to permit Mountaineer to become a signatory to its contract, thereby permitting Mountaineer to haul coal for Badger. Rather, the thrust of the complaint is that Respondents refused to hire (or recall or reinstate) the former Alkire employees, or delayed doing so, because of their past activities in protesting Alkire's failure to pay the contract rate. I am not persuaded that the evidence so indicates with respect to McNeely. Straight and Houdteshell hired McNeely before they knew whether or not he would accept less than the contract rate. Indeed, they hired McNeely at a crucial time, when Badger was resuming full operations and the Union had not yet agreed to sign a contract with Mountaineer. If Mountaineer was concerned that McNeely would insist on the contract rate, and discriminatorily sought to head off that possibility, then it is more probable that McNeely would not have been hired at all.[8] However, as has been and will be discussed, Mountaineer hired a number of former employees who signed the September grievance. I find that Mountaineer did not discriminatorily refuse to hire McNeely.

David Straight testified that, among the September grievants, John Courtney wanted an immediate increase, while Larry Courtney leaned toward a temporary accommodation with Alkire. Both filed applications with Mountaineer. Both were hired, not immediately, but eventually. Straight testified that he did not hire John Courtney because he felt that he would not make a good employee, that he had a bad driving record and a poor attitude. In late May John Courtney had a chance encounter with Denzil Alkire. Courtney asked what the chances were of working for Mountaineer. Alkire said that they did not need any union drivers. Courtney asked about nonunion work, and Alkire said he would see what could be worked out. At Alkire's suggestion, Courtney went to Straight and Houdteshell. Straight was still unwilling to hire Courtney, but he was overruled by Houdteshell, who instructed him to hire Courtney. Houdteshell testified that he considered Courtney to be a very good driver. Courtney testified that while driving for Alkire he received only one traffic ticket (for overloading) and was never reprimanded for poor driving. However, Courtney was involved in an accident in September in which his truck was demolished. But for the developments in May, the evidence might suggest that Straight was advancing pretextual reasons for refusing to hire Courtney, and might warrant an inference that Straight was refusing to hire Courtney because of Courtney's previous insistence on the contract rate. However, if Straight were following a policy of refusing to hire grievants or adamant grievants, it is unlikely that he would have done so without the concurrence and approval of Houdteshell. Houdteshell's action indicates that Mountaineer did not have such a policy. Rather, the circumstances indicate that Straight and Houdteshell differed in their appraisal of Courtney's record. I find that the evidence fails to indicate that Mountaineer discriminated against John Courtney for reasons prohibited by the Act.

[6] The cases cited by the General Counsel on this point in his brief are distinguishable. In Macomb Block and Supply, Inc., 223 NLRB 1285, 1286 (1976), reversed 570 F.2d 1304 (6th Cir. 1978), the Board held, in sum, that an employer cannot refuse to hire prospective employees on the ground that they did not file formal applications, if the evidence indicates that the application requirement was part of a discriminatory scheme to deny them employment. This rule was applied in Mason City Dressed Beef, Inc., and Packing House and Industrial Services, Inc., 231 NLRB 735, 748 (1977), enfd. in pertinent part 590 F.2d 688, 695–696 (8th Cir. 1978). The General Counsel's reliance on these cases begs the question. Absent evidence of an unlawful motivation, Mountaineer could lawfully require prospective employees to file individual job applications.

[7] Bragg strongly supported the grievance, while Donald Parks had some reservations. However, all three committeemen signed and endorsed the grievance.

[8] The General Counsel presents inconsistent arguments in this regard. On the one hand, the General Counsel contends that Mountaineer discriminated against some former Alkire employees by hiring them for nonunion work. On the other hand, the General Counsel argues that Mountaineer discriminated against William Davis, who was performing nonunion mechanic work for Alkire in December, by refusing to hire him for any job. This is a case of "damned if you do and damned if you don't." In order to accept the General Counsel's position, I would have to find that Mountaineer acted discriminatorily by failing to hire grievants to 7 of the 12 available union jobs (or 8, if Davis were included), although the alleged discriminatees comprised only a minority of Alkire's union employees, and an even smaller minority of Mountaineer's job applicants.

Straight testified that he did not initially hire Larry Courtney because Courtney applied for work as an equipment operator, and he needed only one employee to work exclusively in that category. Straight testified that Phillip Kelley and Donald Parks (both former Alkire employees, and the latter a committeeman) made similar applications, and that he hired Parks because he was the best qualified, and Kelley because he was also willing to work as a driver. Straight testified that Courtney later reapplied to work as a driver, and was hired in that category. A document introduced in evidence as a list of Mountaineer's employees does not contain Courtney's name, although it does indicate that Parks was the only employee who worked exclusively as an operator. The General Counsel argues in his brief that the Mountaineer application form does not contain an entry for job preference, and that an adverse inference should be drawn against Respondents because they failed to present Courtney's application in evidence. The General Counsel is attempting to shift the burden of proof. The General Counsel failed to produce Larry Courtney as a witness, and did not demand production of his application at the hearing. In light of the failure of the General Counsel to present Courtney as a witness, I credit Straight, and find that Mountaineer did not discriminate against Larry Courtney.

Larry Lantz, Robert Small, and Jim Detamore applied for work with Mountaineer, but were not hired. None was presented as a witness in this case. David Straight testified that he regarded Lantz as an average to below average driver. Straight testified that Lantz had a poor attitude, and that on one occasion when working for Alkire he refused to perform a minor repair on his truck, which he was able to perform, preferring to wait for a mechanic. According to Straight, Dennett Houdteshell felt that Lantz crossed railroad tracks at too fast a rate of speed. Straight testified Small also had a poor attitude, in that he verbally abused Badger supervisors. Straight further testified that he simply overlooked Detamore and that had he considered Detamore he probably would have hired him. Straight's explanation might be considered pretextual but for two significant facts. First, although Detamore signed the September grievance, he was not noticeably vocal about the matter. Rather, he was a quiet person who might easily be overlooked. Second, Straight had considerably more applications than positions to fill, and he was under no legal obligation to give preference to former Alkire drivers or to follow seniority or any other systematic method of hiring. Nevertheless, he informed all of the former Alkire employees that he was taking applications. Judged by objective standards, Straight may have been erroneous or even arbitrary in his selections, but it does not follow from such evidence that Mountaineer was systematically refusing to hire employees who signed the September grievance. Moreover, the evidence does not suggest such a pattern. Of the 13 employees who signed the September grievance, 1 (Kenny Lee) was no longer working for Alkire in December, 4 (John Helmick, Bruce Davis, George Jack, and Ogden Bragg) did not file applications, or otherwise indicated that they did not wish to work for Mountaineer, 5 (Don Parks, Don Oldaker, John Courtney, Larry Courtney, and John McNeely) were hired, and 3 (Robert Small, Jim Detamore, and Larry Lantz) were not hired. The General Counsel also tends to exaggerate the significance of the names which appeared on the grievance. After the grievance was filed, it was approved by all of the union-represented employees, and David Straight was aware of that fact. Nevertheless, union employees who did not sign the grievance but who subsequently approved it were hired by Mountaineer to perform both union and nonunion work. As indicated, I also do not regard as significant the fact that some grievants were not hired earlier than May. Prior to May, there was little union work available, whereas, by May, Badger had resumed full operations, and that time was a crucial one for determining the wage rate. Indeed, the evidence fails to indicate that, prior to May, Straight had any assurance that any person hired to do union work, whether or not formerly employed by Alkire, would not demand the contract rate.

In sum, I find that Mountaineer did not discriminatorily refuse to hire any of the former Alkire employees. Therefore, it is unnecessary to determine whether, by reason of his continuing involvement with the business, Alkire was a joint employer with Mountaineer during the period from February 8 to July 22.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. At various times material, Respondents were employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondents have not engaged in the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint.

O'Hare Knightsbridge d/b/a Sheraton O'Hare Hotel and International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 399, AFL-CIO. Case 13-CA-21470

February 3, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

Upon a charge filed on August 27, 1981, by International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 399, AFL-CIO, herein called the Union, and duly served on O'Hare Knightsbridge d/b/a Sheraton O'Hare Hotel, herein called Respondent, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 13, issued a complaint on September 8, 1981, against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

With respect to the unfair labor practices, the complaint alleges in substance that on July 27, 1981, following a Board election in Case 13-RC-15594, the Union was duly certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate;[1] and that, commencing on or about August 25, 1981, and at all times thereafter, Respondent has refused, and continues to date to refuse, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative, although the Union has requested and is requesting it to do so. On September 17, 1981, Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part, and denying in part, the allegations in the complaint.

On September 28, 1981, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment. Subsequently, on October 1, 1981, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Respondent thereafter filed a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following:

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer to the complaint and response to the Notice To Show Cause, Respondent attacks the validity of the election and certification and the validity of the Hearing Officer's Report on Objections on the ground that Respondent's exceptions to the Hearing Officer's Report on Objections should have been sustained and that the Board's adoption of the Hearing Officer's findings was improper. Specifically, Respondent contends that the Hearing Officer's crediting of the Union's organizer was erroneous; that even if such witness is credited, his admitted electioneering by the polling area violated the Board's rule against electioneering; and that Respondent's due process right to a fair hearing was violated by the Hearing Officer's limitation of Respondent's right to elicit relevant testimony from the Board agent. The General Counsel, on the other hand, argues that Respondent is merely attempting to relitigate those issues which were litigated in the underlying representation proceeding in Case 13-RC-15594, which may not be relitigated herein. We agree with the General Counsel.

Our review of the record herein reflects that, pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election, an election was conducted on December 5, 1980. The tally of ballots showed that of approximately 11 eligible voters 10 cast ballots, of which 9 were for, and 3 were against, the Union; 1 was challenged. Respondent filed objections to the conduct of the election.[2] After investigating the issues raised by the objections, the Acting Regional Director issued his Report on Objections in which he recommended that a hearing be held to resolve the credibility issues raised in the investigation of the objections. The hearing was held before Hearing Officer William V. Killoran, Jr., on January 19 and February 12, 1981.

[1] Official notice is taken of the record in the representation proceeding, Case 13-RC-15594, as the term "record" is defined in Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended. See LTV Electrosystems, Inc., 166 NLRB 938 (1967), enfd. 388 F.2d 683 (4th Cir. 1968); Golden Age Beverage Co., 167 NLRB 151 (1967), enfd. 415 F.2d 26 (5th Cir. 1969); Intertype Co. v. Penello, 269 F.Supp. 573 (D.C.Va. 1967); Follett Corp., 164 NLRB 378 (1967), enfd. 397 F.2d 91 (7th Cir. 1968); Sec. 9(d) of the NLRA, as amended.

[2] Respondent's objections asserted that the election was held in split sessions; a nonemployee representative engaged in electioneering with employees waiting to cast votes; electioneering took place within 40 to 60 feet of the polling place and all voters had to pass through an area where a union representative was stationed in order to gain access to the polling place; that under the rule in Milchem, Inc., 170 NLRB 362 (1968), the actions of the union representative constitute objectionable conduct; and, by such conduct, the Union destroyed the laboratory conditions necessary for a fair election.

During the hearing, Respondent asked for and received the Board's consent to permit Board Agent Ramon Martinez to testify pursuant to a subpena issued on the same date. On January 21, 1981, Respondent made a motion to admit documents and continue hearing until the disposition of the subpena Respondent served on Board Agent Ramon Martinez. On February 5, 1981, the General Counsel, by telegram, granted Respondent's request to permit Board Agent Martinez to testify solely with respect to what conversations, if any, he had with the parties to the election concerning the scope of the permissible electioneering. On February 9, 1981, the Hearing Officer issued his order reopening the hearing, receiving documents into evidence, and rescheduling the hearing. On March 18, 1981, the Hearing Officer issued his Report on Objections in which he recommended that Respondent's objections be overruled and that a certification of representative issue. Thereafter, Respondent filed exceptions to the Hearing Officer's Report on Objections, and the Union filed a response to Respondent's exceptions.

On July 27, 1981, the Board issued its Decision and Certification of Representative in which, after consideration of the Hearing Officer's report and Respondent's exceptions and brief, it adopted the Hearing Officer's findings and recommendations overruling Respondent's objections with respect to alleged electioneering and comments concerning electioneering by Board Agent Ramon Martinez. The Board also noted in footnote 1 of its Decision that the parties had agreed to which particular individuals would be eligible to vote through the use of a Norris-Thermador Corp. list.[3] Moreover, the Board indicated in footnote 2 that there was insufficient basis for disturbing the Hearing Officer's credibility resolutions in the case.

On August 11, 1981, the Union, by letter to Respondent's counsel, requested that it be advised as to whether or not Respondent was prepared to commence negotiations or wished to pursue its objections by refusing to bargain. By letter dated August 25, 1981, Respondent stated in pertinent part, ". . . I must inform you that we respectfully decline your offer to bargain inasmuch as we believe, for the reasons stated in our objections to certification, that the N.L.R.B. improperly certified Local 399. Accordingly, O'Hare Knightsbridge declines your offer to bargain until such time as the Board's Order is judicially enforced." Thereafter, on August 27, 1981, the Union filed the instant unfair labor practice charge.

We find no merit to Respondent's contentions inasmuch as it appears that Repondent is merely reiterating the issues previously raised and considered in the underlying representation case. We still find, and thereby reaffirm our previous determination, that Respondent's allegations, which deal primarily with credibility issues, constitute an insufficient basis for disturbing the Hearing Officer's credibility resolutions in this case.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues which were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[4]

All issues raised by Respondent in this proceeding were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding, and Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege that any special circumstances exist herein which would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding.[5] We therefore find that Respondent has not raised any issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following:

Findings of Fact

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, an Illinois partnership, is engaged in the hotel accommodation business and has maintained a facility located at 6810 Mannheim Road, Rosemont, Illinois. During the past fiscal or calendar year, a representative period, Respondent in the course and conduct of its operations had gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and, during the same period, it purchased and received at its facility goods and materials valued in excess of $5,000 directly from points located outside the State of Illinois.

We find, on the basis of the foregoing, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

[5] Moreover, as previously noted, Respondent's response to the Union's bargaining demand indicated that the Board improperly certified the Union and that Respondent declined to bargain until such time as the Board's Order is judicially enforced.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 399, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Representation Proceeding

1. The unit

The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All maintenance employees employed at the Employer's facility presently located at 6810 Mannheim Road, Rosemont, Illinois but excluding all other employees, including guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. The certification

On December 5, 1980, a majority of the employees of Respondent in said unit, in a secret-ballot election conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director for Region 13 designated the Union as their representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with Respondent.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit on July 27, 1981, and the Union continues to be such exclusive representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Request To Bargain and Respondent's Refusal

Commencing on or about August 11, 1981, and at all times thereafter, the Union has requested Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit. Commencing on or about August 25, 1981, and continuing at all times thereafter to date, Respondent has refused, and continues to refuse, to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative for collective bargaining of all employees in said unit.

Accordingly, we find that Respondent has, since August 25, 1981, and at all times thereafter, refused to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and that, by such refusal, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and, upon request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

In order to insure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of certification as beginning on the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Company, Inc., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Commerce Company d/b/a Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817; Burnett Construction Company, 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

The Board, upon the basis of the foregoing facts and the entire record, makes the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. O'Hare Knightsbridge d/b/a Sheraton O'Hare Hotel is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 399, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All maintenance employees employed at the Employer's facility presently located at 6810 Mannheim Road, Rosemont, Illinois, but excluding all other employees, including guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since July 27, 1981, the above-named labor organization has been and now is the certified and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing on or about August 25, 1981, and at all times thereafter, to bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of Respondent in the appropriate unit, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, O'Hare Knightsbridge d/b/a Sheraton O'Hare Hotel, Rosemont, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 399, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All maintenance employees employed at the Employer's facility presently located at 6810 Mannheim Road, Rosemont, Illinois but excluding all other employees, including guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its Rosemont, Illinois, facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 13, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 399, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with the above-named Union, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All maintenance employees employed at the Employer's facility presently located at 6810 Mannheim Road, Rosemont, Illinois but excluding all other employees, including guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On March 6, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Linton issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record[1] and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs, and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified below.

In agreement with the General Counsel, and in order to fully remedy the unfair labor practices committed herein, we shall order that the Respondent notify employees Arnold, Sanders, Stamper, Crowder, Grant, Broden, and Hall, in writing, that it has removed and expunged the unlawful written warnings, unexcused absences, adverse personnel actions, and references thereto from their personnel files. We further agree with the General Counsel that a broad cease-and-desist order is warranted in this case. This is not the first case involving unfair labor practices committed by the Respondent in connection with the Charging Party's organizational campaign[3] and the nature of the unfair labor practices committed herein demonstrates not only the Respondent's proclivity to violate the Act, but its general disregard for its employees' fundamental statutory rights.[4]

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Riley-Beaird, Inc., Shreveport, Louisiana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, take the action set forth in said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(l):

"(l) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, to form, join, or assist International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, to act together for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any or all such activities."

2. Insert the following as paragraph 2(d), relettering subsequent paragraphs accordingly:

"(d) Notify employees Lynn A. Arnold, Willie D. Broden, Willie D. Crowder, J. R. Grant, Willie Hall, Jr., Cecil M. Sanders, and Thomas B. Stamper, in writing, that it has taken the action required by paragraph 2(c)."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

---

[1] The General Counsel's motion to correct the record, which was unopposed, is granted.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

In regard to violations where the Administrative Law Judge rejected the Respondent's asserted justifications as pretextual, Member Jenkins does not rely on Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). In his view, Wright Line and its progeny concern identifying the cause of discharge where a genuine lawful and a genuine unlawful reason exist. Where the asserted lawful reason is found to be a pretext, only one genuine reason remains—the unlawful one. Thus, the Wright Line analysis is not pertinent to cases of pretext.

259 NLRB No. 180

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

We will not unlawfully ask you about your activities or the activities of other employees on behalf of International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization.

We will not unlawfully ask you about unfair labor practice charges you file against us with the National Labor Relations Board.

We will not create the impression that we have under surveillance your activities on behalf of International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization, by telling you that a supervisor has been instructed to observe such activities.

We will not unlawfully threaten to file charges against you because you make and keep notes concerning your work and events at work.

We will not illegally threaten to discharge you because you make and keep notes concerning your work and events at work.

We will not unlawfully charge you with unexcused absences to penalize you for being absent from work in order to give testimony at a proceeding of the National Labor Relations Board.

We will not assign you to harder and less desirable work, subject you to stricter supervision, require you to follow plant rules more closely, restrict you in communicating with your fellow employees, or warn, suspend, or discharge you because you support International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization, or because you file charges or give testimony under the National Labor Relations Act.

We will not in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in your exercise of the rights guaranteed you under Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

We will remove from our records and destroy all copies of and references to certain warnings issued in 1980 to Lynn A. Arnold, Willie Broden, Willie D. Crowder, J. R. Grant, Willie Hall, Jr., Cecil M. Sanders, and Thomas B. Stamper; and we will notify each of them, in writing, that we have done so.

We will offer Lynn A. Arnold, Willie Hall, Jr., Cecil M. Sanders, and Thomas B. Stamper immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions of employment or, if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and we will make Lynn A. Arnold, Willie D. Crowder, and Willie Hall, Jr., whole, with interest, for any loss of pay they may have suffered as a result of their suspensions or discharge in 1980.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Richard J. Linton, Administrative Law Judge: These consolidated cases were heard before me in Shreveport, Louisiana, during August 4-8 and 27-29, 1980,[1] pursuant to an initial complaint, dated March 14, two subsequent consolidated complaints, and various amendments thereto,[2] issued by General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Regional Director for Region 15. The consolidated complaints, as amended, are based on charges filed by International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO[3] (the Union), against Riley-Beaird, Inc. (Respondent).

In the consolidated complaints, as amended, General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act by, among other conduct, reprimanding and transferring certain employees; by suspending employees Lynn A. Arnold, Willie L. Crowder, and Willie Hall, Jr.; and by discharging Willie Hall, Jr.

By its answers, as amended, Respondent admits certain allegations, but denies that it has violated the Act in any manner.

Upon the entire record,[4] including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by each of the parties, I make the following:

[1] Unless otherwise indicated, all dates involved herein occurred in 1980.

[2] Aside from minor amendments made at, or shortly before, the hearing, the preferred practice is that subsequent cases and allegations be incorporated into a single consolidated complaint when the case submitted at the hearing is spread over numerous documents. The parties, and particularly the Administrative Law Judge, frequently are distracted by having to flip through the several complaints and amendments in order to locate relevant allegations.

[3] Sua sponte, I have corrected the name of the Union (separating "Ship" and "Builders" and spelling "and") so as to conform to the spelling appearing in the charges and in the Union's brief.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Delaware corporation headquartered in Shreveport, Louisiana, fabricates various heavy steel products, including pressure vessels, at its Shreveport, Louisiana, facility.[5] During the past 12 months, Respondent purchased and received, at Shreveport, Louisiana, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Louisiana. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

1. UAW's 1977 campaign

Although the record discloses only sketchy information on the subject, it appears that in the summer of 1977 the International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), conducted an organizing campaign among Respondent's employees. The extent and duration of the UAW's efforts are facts not available, but apparently the campaign did not proceed to a Board-conducted election. The principal relevance of this campaign relates to the case of dischargee Willie Hall, Jr.

In July and August 1977, UAW filed charges on behalf of Hall alleging that on June 6, 1977, Respondent transferred Hall from the midnight shift to the first shift and thereafter reprimanded him because of his activities on behalf of UAW. The Region dismissed the charges, and UAW's appeal to General Counsel was denied in October 1977 (G.C. Exh. 20). Respondent apparently returned Hall to the midnight shift on August 15, 1977.

In the instant case, the subject of the 1977 charges was mentioned in a significant meeting Hall attended with, and at the summons of, several of Respondent's officials. Such meeting is discussed below in the treatment of Hall's case.

2. Boilermakers' 1977–80 campaign

Al Washington, Jr., an International representative of the Union, testified that the Union began an organizational campaign among Respondent's employees in 1977. An election petition was filed in Case 15–RC–6501, apparently about late August 1979, and a Board-conducted election was held on October 4, 1979. As reflected by the tally of ballots served on the parties, out of a unit of approximately 896 employees, the Union fell some 16 votes short of securing a majority,[6] the Union filed timely objections alleging that Respondent's conduct improperly affected the election results. It also filed an unfair labor practice charge, Case 15–CA–7436, alleging parallel violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by such conduct of Respondent. Complaint issued November 27, 1979, on certain allegations, and Cases 15–CA–7436 and 15–RC–6501 were consolidated for a hearing.

3. Riley-Beaird, Inc., 253 NLRB 660 (1980)

The foregoing 8(a)(1) allegations and election objections came before Administrative Law Judge David L. Evans on February 4 and 5, 1980, in Shreveport, Louisiana. Administrative Law Judge Evans issued his Decision (G.C. Exh. 31) on August 13, 1980, and on December 10, 1980, the Board, finding an additional 8(a)(1) violation involving Supervisor M. O. Green, adopted Administrative Law Judge Evans' Decision. (235 NLRB 660 (1980)). I take administrative notice of such Decision, findings, and conclusions therein. In that Decision, Respondent is found to have violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by impliedly threatening plant closure and reduction of benefits if employees selected the Union as their representative. Additionally, Supervisor Green is found to have unlawfully solicited and remedied grievances regarding Cecil M. Sanders. The Board also granted the Union's request to withdraw its election objections in Case 15–RC–6501.

What makes the Decision of significant relevance is that of the seven alleged discriminatees herein, five[7] testified on behalf of General Counsel before Administrative Law Judge Evans. Therefore, the asserted incidents of discrimination against these five are alleged herein as violations of Section 8(a)(4) as well as Section 8(a)(3). It appears from the Decision that Vernon Huffaker is the only other employee who testified on behalf of General Counsel at the February hearing.

4. Contentions of the parties

General Counsel and the Union contend that Respondent, angered by the testimony against it by Arnold and the other employees at the February hearing before Administrative Law Judge Evans, retaliated against the alleged discriminatees herein by discharging Hall, and generally making life as miserable as possible for the others. This had a twofold purpose, they argue. First, the retaliation punished the ones (except Huffaker, who is not an alleged discriminatee) who testified, and secondly, it also serves as a constant and vivid warning to all other employees concerning what they can expect if they incur Respondent's enmity by assisting the government as well as supporting the Union.

Respondent denies any wrongdoing or unlawful purpose. At the hearing, it offered numerous and detailed exhibits, in addition to testimonial evidence, in support of its position that the transfers of Arnold and others were for economic reasons only, and that the discipline imposed on Arnold, Hall, and the other alleged discriminatees was consistent with past practice and justified by their work mistakes.

[7] Lynn A. Arnold, Willie D. Crowder, Willie Hall, Jr., Cecil M. Sanders, and Thomas B. Stamper.

B. Independent 8(a)(1) Allegations

There are four allegations of independent 8(a)(1) violations. Two appear as paragraphs 15 and 16 in the second complaint (a consolidated complaint dated April 28, 1980) concerning an alleged interrogation and threat on March 31. Willie Hall, Jr., testified concerning that event.

Willie D. Broden testified in support of the remaining two allegations which appear in the July 1, 1980, "Amendments" to the third complaint (the consolidated complaint of June 25, 1980). The July 1 "Amendments" adds paragraph 11A, with subparagraphs 11A(a) alleging an impression of surveillance on May 10 and 11A(b) alleging an interrogation on such date.

C. Allegations of 8(a)(3) and (4) Violations

1. Introduction

In their briefs, General Counsel and the Union contend that shortly after the February hearing Respondent launched its campaign of retaliation against General Counsel's witnesses by reassignments and transfers to more onerous and less desirable jobs as well as by disciplining them for fabricated reasons and for mistakes of a kind previously tolerated.

Countering with its own evidence, Respondent asserts that the reassignments and transfers were for the purpose of reducing "x-ray rejects,"[8] and that the discipline, as previously noted, was consistent with past practice and otherwise justified.

William M. Bradshaw, Respondent's vice president of manufacturing, testified that in June 1979, following an expression of concern about quality and excessive cost by Company President Bill Adams, he began a drive to improve quality. As a result, production departments, or welding bays, adopted goals. The goal for X-ray rejects was an overall maximum of 3 percent. The same goal was reset in July 1980. Reduction of spoilage (caused by improper welds) was another goal. Both goals, of course, are designed to cut costs through improved quality and work proficiency. Bradshaw testified that Respondent began tightening up in these areas in June 1976. The Company's fiscal year ends on each June 30, and according to Bradshaw, the X-ray reject rate was 4.7 percent for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1979.

Bradshaw testified that progress toward achieving the goals was lagging. He therefore wrote a memo (Resp. Exh. 10), dated December 14, 1979, to Tank and Structural Superintendent E. C. Greene on the subject of weld rejects in bay 5, reading as follows:

> Look at the record for the last year on Bay 5 weld rejects. We are around 9% average in this Bay, all other Bays have made improvements in this area and are meeting their goals. Our plant average is good at the present time. If you need to move supervisors, welders, etc. do whatever is necessary to make improvement.
> You are charged with the responsibility to take whatever action is necessary. Keep me posted on your progress.

Greene testified that, on receipt of the memo, he called in Bay 5 General Foreman Rupert Sepulvado[9] and gave him 30 to 45 days to show an improvement regarding the reject percentage. Should no progress be made in the allotted time, Greene told Sepulvado that "[W]e are going to change personnel in that area, and supervision, if necessary. If we got to put a completely new crew of men in that department, then that is what we are going to do. But, we are going to get the X-rays down where they should be."

Greene further testified that at the end of January the reject rate was still around 8 to 9 percent (in Bay 5), so in the first week of February he and his general foreman began discussing moving employees from bay 5.[10] Greene initially asked several general foremen if they had any "good" individuals they would volunteer to send to bay 5 on a man-to-man swap by qualification (i.e., a first-class welder for a first-class welder). Naturally, as Greene testified, none wanted to give up qualified employees who were doing a "good job."

Receiving no volunteers, Greene testified that he stated he would have to take people. He told Sepulvado to select (apparently a certain number of employees) for transfer from bay 5, and Greene would obtain from other general foremen employees whom they had selected for transfer from their bays.[11] Thus, while the general foreman selected the transferees, Greene decided which selectee would be transferred to which bay. On cross-examination, he testified that the decision regarding the selections and transfers was finalized on Friday, February 8, and that the implementation began the following week.

2. Preview of conclusions

As appears below, I find and conclude that General Counsel has established a prima facie case of unlawful conduct, and that Respondent has failed to carry its Wright Line[12] burden of rebutting such prima facie case.

---

[8] A term which refers to the quality control procedure in which welding mistakes discovered in the routine X-ray procedure are rejected and returned for repair and correction.

[9] Sepulvado testified that he has been general foreman over bays 5, 6, and 13 at least since January 1979.

[10] A general foreman often is in charge of more than one bay. Under the general foreman is a bay foreman and under the foreman are several leadmen. All are admitted statutory supervisors.

[11] Quite obviously, this procedure would result in bay 5 receiving welders who were considered as something less than the best by the selecting general foremen. While it is true that a first-class welder, for example, might be traded for another person possessing the same first-class welding certification, common experience would recognize that while all high school graduates get the same kind of diploma, some graduates are "A" students, some are "B," and some are "C." Common experience shows that some people are more proficient than others in the same classification. Greene admitted this when he testified that he asked his general foreman to volunteer "good" men to be swapped within the same classification.

For example, in relation to consideration of General Counsel's contention that timing (i.e., the alleged discriminatory acts following almost immediately after the February hearing) serves here as an indicium of unlawful motivation, I have considered, among other evidence, Respondent's Exhibit 44. This 12-page exhibit[13] is a list of employees who were issued written warnings for the years 1976 through July 1980. A statistical analysis of the exhibit reveals the fact that the number of warnings for 1980 increased by an astonishing 86 percent over the previous 4-year average.[14] Thus:

Projected number for 1980 at 16.142 per month (113 plus 80.7 divided by 12)—193.71

Approximate 1980 increase over 4-year average—86 percent[15]

Furthermore, in this case, I find the demeanor of the witnesses to be an important factor. As appears below, based largely on the factor of demeanor, I credit General Counsel's witnesses over those of Respondent. At this point I shall note that some of Respondent's witnesses, particularly Greene and General Foreman Frank Booker, appeared quite hostile during their questioning by General Counsel. General Foreman Sepulvado was evasive at times. In contrast, the alleged discriminatees, despite the adverse, as I find, nature of the job conditions they have been subjected to, exhibited an appearance of a sincere effort to cooperate in the questioning by all parties.

3. The discrimination against Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper

a. Sanders' unexcused absences

When his supervisor, Harvey Reynolds, gave Cecil M. Sanders his paycheck the evening of January 31, Sanders told Reynolds that he had a subpena to appear in court on February 4. Reynolds respondend that this would be "okay." James W. Johnston, who was present during this conversation corroborated Sanders completely.

Sanders testified on February 4 and was still present at the hearing pursuant to Board subpena on February 5. He was seen at the hearing on February 5 by M. O. Greene, admitted supervisors/managers William Bradshaw, Hillman Deaton, M.O. Greene, and B. T. Walsworth. Sanders was paid 2 days' witness fees.

Upon returning to work on February 6, Sanders heard that his absences had been unexcused, and he questioned Reynolds about this. Reynolds told Sanders he did not remember his January 31 conversation with Sanders wherein Sanders notified him of his upcoming court appearance, although he did not deny that Sanders so informed him. Sanders then went to General Foreman Rupert Sepulvado the following day and told him that Johnston was present during the January 31 conversation with Reynolds. Sepulvado said he would check it out with Johnston. The following day Sanders asked Sepulvado if he had confirmed his story with Johnston, to which Sepulvado told him "No" and then walked away. Johnston testified that no supervisors had attempted to verify with him whether Sanders told Reynolds about his subpena.

Although testifying in an evasive and confusing fashion on cross-examination, General Foreman Sepulvado appears to have conceded that Foreman Reynolds told him one employee (presumably Sanders) would be testifying at the February hearing. Reynolds did not testify.

Respondent relies upon its Exhibit 45, which reflects that Sanders' absences on both February 4 and 5 were treated and cited as unexcused absences in violation of rule 34. Other names are listed of those who did not call in, and also were cited. However, I credit the testimony of Sanders and Johnston that Sanders did give notice to Foreman Reynolds. Finally, Sepulvado's clear disinterest in checking with Johnston evidences Respondent's unlawful motive in citing Sanders.[16] That Respondent did not cite the witnesses who did call in is not determinative. Thus, Personnel Manager Dillard conceded that if a supervisor excuses an employee, then he is excused. I find the citation to Sanders a violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, as alleged in paragraph 7 of the March 14 complaint.[17] I shall recommend that Respond-

[13] Not treated by either General Counsel or the Union in their briefs.

[14] Figured by projecting the 7-month average of 16.14 throughout the remainder of 1980.

[15] I further note that only six warnings issued in January 1980, and that the first written warning in February did not issue until after the hearing before Administrative Law Judge Evans. Then the flood gates opened with 19 issuing in February (over three times the number of February 1979). An all-time monthly high (at least since January 1, 1976) of 29 issued in May—more than four times as many as were handed out in May 1979.

[16] In view of Sanders' description in the February hearing of his union activities, I find that Respondent was motivated here not only to retaliate for his testimony, but also because of such union activities.

[17] In any event, I find that citing an employee who is present at a Board proceeding pursuant to a Board subpena with an unexcused absence is inherently destructive of his Sec. 7 rights and thereby violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (4). Such a conclusion must be reached particularly where, as here, top officials of Respondent knew of Sanders' February 4 and 5 appearance in court, and where Respondent failed to show that if ent expunge the record of unexcused absences from Sanders' personnel records.

b. Sanders' February 6 job reassignment

As noted previously, Cecil M. Sanders testified at the February hearing. He was present on both February 4 and 5. A first-class code welder at Respondent's plant for 12 years, Sanders testified that prior to the February hearing he had done automatic welding on the outside of heads (the large semi-coned shaped ends to railroad tank cars) for the past 2 or 3 years. Immediately upon Sanders' return to work on February 6 from the hearing, Leadman Paddie announced in a meeting of all bay 5 employees that Sanders was being moved from welding the outside of heads to the inside, and that employee Curly Cloud was being moved from welding the inside of heads to the outside.[18] Paddie told his bay crew that the reason for the change was that the X-ray rejects were too high and that such rejects were caused by bad welding. He did not explain how this move would bring down the reject percentage or otherwise improve the quality of work.[19]

Instead of Paddie testifying, General Foreman Sepulvado testified that he and the leadman in bay 5 (presumably Paddie) previously had discussed with Sanders the fact that he was experiencing bad welding in the nature of high-weld, undercurrents, and excessive pickups. Moreover, Sepulvado testified that Sanders was less experienced in running the outside machine, and that for these reasons Sanders was moved. Responding to the reasons why the announcement was made to the entire bay on Wednesday rather than at the Monday meeting, Sepulvado testified that it was to "let everybody in the bay know and be aware that we were going to have to move people around in order to get the X-ray percentage down. Either move people to different jobs in the bay or either a possibility of moving employees out of the bay." Contrary to the testimony of Sepulvado, Sanders testified that prior to his reassignment he had never been counseled, warned, disciplined, or in any way spoken to by any of his supervisors about his X-ray reject rate. Indeed, the last time he had been graded, several years previously, all of his marks were good to excellent.

According to the undisputed testimony of both Sanders and Arnold, Sanders' welding ability and reject rate was about equal to that of Cloud's. Of even more significance, Harlan Palmer, who welded the outside of heads on the shift opposite Sanders (that is, they rotated shifts every month) was not moved to welding the inside of heads, yet he had a high X-ray reject rate[20] and Palmer also, had many more "burn-throughs" than did Sanders.[21]

As earlier noted, Sepulvado testified in a reluctant and evasive fashion at various times during his testimony. I do not credit him. In contrast, Sanders and Arnold testified in a straightforward and believable fashion, and I credit their testimony. Accordingly, as alleged in paragraphs 9 and 11 of the first (March 14) complaint, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act by assigning Cecil M. Sanders on February 6 from welding the outside of heads in bay 5 to the more onerous and less desirable work of welding inside heads in bay 5.[22]

In making this finding, and in crediting Sanders and Arnold over Sepulvado, I have noted the timing of the assignment of Sanders immediately following his return to bay 5 from having testified at the February hearing; the fact that the announcement was made on Wednesday following the hearing rather than at the usual Monday bay meeting; the fact that the announcement was made to everyone rather than to the affected employee himself; and the fact that such assignment appears to have been the only effort to that point by General Foreman Sepulvado to lower the X-ray rejects rate in bay 5 even though the reject rate had been running between 5 and 9 percent for the last few years. I find that the assignment was done for the purpose of publicly punishing Sanders for his union activities and for testifying, and to serve as a warning to other employees that they should not incur the displeasure of Respondent.

suffered a detriment as a result of his failure to renotify his immediate supervisor by calling in the morning of the hearing. See N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 338 U.S. 26 (1967).

[18] February 6 was a Wednesday. Ordinarily, meetings are held with bay employees at the start of the shift on Mondays. Furthermore, job reassignments of this nature are ordinarily not announced to the whole complement of bay employees but rather are announced privately to the affected employees.

[19] Paddie did not testify. Moreover, Plant Superintendent E. C. Greene, when called as a witness under Fed. R. Evid. 611(c), testified that either Supervisors Truman Cloud, R. L. Paddie, or Harold Stockton would have knowledge of Sanders' February 6 reassignment, yet none of these individuals was called by Respondent to testify.

[20] The employees were able to compare X-ray reject rates of the various employees of bay 5 as a result of a series of postings on the bulletin board showing the X-ray rejects of bay 5 employees. Additionally, part of Arnold's job was to repair the X-ray rejects, and thus he had the work before him and could tell which employees were receiving the most rejects.

[21] Sanders testified that about October 1979 Palmer had 11 burn-throughs in 1 head alone, and that Palmer did not receive a warning. Indeed, Palmer had the nickname among bay 5 employees of "Burn-through Palmer." Palmer did not testify at the February hearing. The record does not reflect whether Palmer was openly for or against the Union.

[22] Based on the description by Sanders and Arnold regarding the work of welding the inside and outside of heads, or crowns for railroad tank cars, I find that the work of welding on the inside was far more onerous. Welding on the inside, as contrasted to the outside, requires the welder to squat. He had to work in a cramped location, the work often is above his head, not nearly ventilated as the outside, and he chokes on smoke generated when oil mixes with heat from the welding. Moreover, Sanders credibly testified that employees generally work up from inside welding to outside welding. Thus, it is clear that everyone considered welding the inside to be less desirable than the outside. In addition to the physical discomfort an inside welder experiences, the job is also dangerous inasmuch as the welder's head can be caught between the welding machine and stool which could result in serious injury or even death. Sanders testified that one man had his head caught, and several others had their hats caught. Also, he testified that five men who welded the inside of heads had to have back operations. Of course, while Sanders' testimony on this latter point does not establish a medical connection, I do give weight to such testimony insofar as such fact bears on the perception of employees regarding the desirability of the work.

c. The February 12 transfers of Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper

(1) Lynn A. Arnold

Lynn A. Arnold testified that as of August 1980 he had been a first-class code welder with Respondent for nearly 14 years, and that this was the classification in which he was hired. Prior to the February hearing, Arnold spent most of his time hand welding on fittings, but sometimes he repaired X-ray rejects. Arnold explained that welding of fittings is more difficult than welding on some of the other work, such as railroad tank car heads, because the former requires laying down layer after layer of welding. The head referred to is the semicone section which goes on each end of a steel railroad car.

In repairing the X-ray rejects (work which had been rejected by quality control after defects were discovered in the routine X-ray process), Arnold could tell which employee had caused the rejects. For that matter, Arnold testified that all employees have rejects. At the time, shortly before the February hearing, the X-ray rejects were running 8 to 9 percent. It is undisputed that Arnold testified at the February hearing, and returned to work on Wednesday, February 6, 1980. Prior to the February hearing, Arnold worked in bay 5.

On February 12, Arnold was summoned to General Foreman Sepulvado's office. Sepulvado stated that X-ray rejects had been "real high" in bay 5 for the last "4 or 5 years," and that the only way Sepulvado knew of reducing the high X-ray reject rate was to move people around, and therefore Arnold was being transferred to bay 8.

Arnold asked why he was being transferred since he was not doing any of the welding where the bad rejects were coming from, that the rejects were coming from the welding on the heads. Arnold testified that very few X-rays or gamma rays were taken of the fittings he welded and consequently it is very seldom that he received a reject. Nevertheless, Sepulvado told Arnold that Arnold was "not thinking x-ray," so therefore Sepulvado had to transfer him from bay 5. Sepulvado said he had no complaints about the quality or quantity of Arnold's work, that both were good, but that Arnold was not thinking X-ray. Arnold testified that subsequent to his transfer to bay 8, he had occasion to observe that the posted X-ray rejects percentage for bay 5 were 39 percent on one job, 30 percent on another, and 18 percent on another—much higher than the previous 8–9 percent average.

Arnold testified without dispute that, prior to his transfer to bay 8, he had never been warned, disciplined, or even counseled by any supervisors about the quantity or quality of his welding, and, indeed, had never received any complaints about his welding. Moreover, he further credibly testified that he had never been counseled, warned, or disciplined regarding the matter of "thinking x-ray." Finally, Arnold testified that the one time he had been graded (some 3 years previously, by Leadman Raymond Paddie) concerning his quantity, quality of work, attitude, attendance record, and safety record, that Paddie had given him a "2" out of a possible "5" (with "1" being the highest). Paddie told him that he wanted to give him a "1," but that General Foreman Sepulvado did not believe anyone should receive a "1" because no one was perfect since there was always room for improvement.

Arnold also testified that Leadman Truman Cloud, as well as Paddie, had told him that he was a good welder. Indeed, only a few days before Arnold's transfer, Paddie utilized Arnold and employee Long to perform the difficult task of welding a 6-1/2-inch thick fitting to a head. Arnold asked Paddie why he always got such jobs (in reference to the job requiring a highly skilled welder), and Paddie told him that Arnold and James Long were the only two people he would trust to put on the job.

As is discussed below, Thomas B. Stamper was also transferred from bay 5 to bay 8 at the same time that Arnold was transferred. While Arnold went to the first shift, Stamper went to the second shift. At the hearing, Superintendent Greene reluctantly admitted that at the time of the transfers of Arnold and Stamper, bay 8 had a reputation of being a "hell hole." Arnold and Stamper were placed on the job of welding blade rings which Greene, again with reluctance, admitted carried the reputation of "hottest and worst" job in the plant. Greene testified that such reputation, while proper several years ago, was no longer justified because of various job improvements. Based on the demeanor and general believability of the witnesses, I credit the testimony of Arnold and Stamper, as discussed below, that the job of welding blade rings is in fact one of the worst jobs in the plant,[23] and I discredit Greene's testimony that as of February 1980 the job had been improved to the point of being one of the "best" welding jobs in the plant, and that of Booker that it is one of the "easiest" jobs. I also find that Arnold's work of welding fittings in bay 5, a job enjoying suitable ventilation and much less heat, was a far easier and more desirable job than that of welding blade rings in bay 8.

The blade rings are heavy metal discs, in the shape of rings or donuts (i.e., with a large opening in the center). Arnold testified that they are heavy and 6 to 8 feet across. Sketches furnished by Respondent disclosed that the rings appear to weigh several hundred pounds each. They are welded 3 to a set.

The reason welding the blade rings is considered by the employees as the worst job in the plant is that the blade rings have to be preheated to between 400 and 450 degrees, and this temperature has to be maintained while the employee welds. This is accomplished with the use of three preheaters which are spaced evenly around the blade ring, and stay on the entire time the welder is welding. Thus, as described by Marable, the welder sits only 5–6 feet from the preheaters during the welding process. Because blade rings are welded with carbon dioxide gas, the job cannot be ventilated, as fans or other bursts of air would blow the carbon dioxide gas away and cause pinholes in the weld.

[23] Their testimony is confirmed by the testimony of current employees Nathan Parker, James W. Johnston, L. H. Williams, and Charlie Marable. Although Marable was recalling the work from an earlier time when the rings were not preheated, Arnold testified that the preheaters are not turned off during the welding process.

On examination by the Union's counsel, Uhlig, Arnold described welding on the rings as follows:

> A. When you are working on blade rings, you have to rig heaters on it, which is a pipe about so big and round, blaring a flame of fire out the side of the pipe. We have to keep three or four around that lade ring, keeping it 450 degrees hot before you start welding on it. Then, you get up on the stand, get a CO2 gun up there and you're humped right over the blade ring, sitting up there like this, over all the heat. The CO2 gun puts out tremendous heat and smoke. All that smoke is coming right back under your hood and the heat is hitting you on the chest. Your skin gets dried out and feel like it's just going to fall off you. Your clothes feel like they're going to flame up at any time.
> Q. Does this cause you to sweat?
>
> A. You sweat, but it dries as fast as you sweat.
> Q. Will an employee breathe that smoke in?
> A. You breathe that smoke in eight hours a day. When you go home, you feel like your chest is going to explode. I went home with my arms cherry red, my chest red from the heat, I even had clear blisters come on my feet from welding on them.

Stamper gave a similar description:

> Q. Mr. Stamper, if you know, you testified that when you worked in Bay 8 prior to 1980 on hot rings, it was routine to pull a man off after two or three days. If you know, what was the reason for pulling them off after two or three days?
> A. They usually pulled them off to give a man a break.
> Q. Why would he need a break?
> A. 450 degrees is hot enough to give anybody a break. You go so long on a hot ring and it just keeps draining out of you, day in, day out and about a week or two of it and it begins to tell on you. You feel drowsy all the time. Your chest hurts. You cough up that CO2 gas, and it's—you feel like you've got a cold all the time. Your sinuses are a mess. I have went to the bay at night and run a cold chill. That CO2 gas, it will eat you up.

Because of the extreme difficulty of the job of welding blade rings, the policy prior to the arrival of Arnold and Stamper in bay 8 was to rotate employees for 2-3 days at a time, or a week at most. As Parker credibly testified, this policy was instituted several years ago after the bay 8 employees complained about the job to Foreman Booker at a safety meeting. Parker testified that constant work on the blade rings was a safety problem because ". . . you coughed up blood. I have coughed up bloody looking stuff and I have felt tired and rundown all the time."

Notwithstanding Respondent's rotation policy,[24] once Arnold and Stamper came into bay 8, they did virtually all the welding on the blade rings, particularly on the verticle flanges (the major portion of the welding work on blade rings) that had to be done. When they were at work and the blade rings had to be welded, they were the ones to do it on their respective shifts. First-class welders Nathan Parker and R. L. Southern, for example, so testified. Thus, Arnold testified that he spent about 90 percent of his time in bay 8 welding blade rings. From February 12 to March 3, he spent all his worktime welding on blade rings. Parker confirmed that he observed Arnold had to weld on the rings for a 3- to 4-week period before receiving a respite. Then Arnold would have to resume welding on the hot rings—which had been waiting for him since Respondent assigned no one else but Arnold to the rings on the first shift.

(2) Thomas B. Stamper

For approximately 11 years prior to his testimony herein, Thomas B. Stamper has been classified at Respondent in the dual capacity of a first-class code welder and also a first-class automatic code welder. Stamper testified at the February hearing as a witness for General Counsel.

Prior to the February hearing, Stamper had worked in bay 5 for 3 to 4 years as an automatic welder on the inside of heads. He testified that about a week after his February 5 appearance before Administrative Law Judge Evans, Leadman Truman Cloud told him to report to General Foreman Sepulvado's office. Stamper testified as follows regarding the conversation in Sepulvado's office:

> (By Mr. Yudien) Q. Could you just tell what happened?
> A. Sepulvado said, "You're going to be transferred out." He said, "Our x-ray percentage has been high for three or four years and it is my job to get them down any way I can. And, so I am going to transfer you to Bay 8." And I asked him, I said, "Well, is my job, my x-rays up? You don't like the way I work, or something like that?" He said, "No, I didn't say that. As far as I'm concerned, you do good work. I can pretty well trust you, or anything like that." He said, "I just feel like transferring you to Bay 8." So, then I turned around and told him, "Sepulvado, you know why I'm going to Bay 8." And Barton was in there too. And, I turned around to [24] I do not credit General Foreman Booker's testimony that the rotation policy was dropped some years ago when the work of welding on blade rings was raised from the floor to metal frame positions stationed a few feet above the floor. Nor do I credit Booker when he testified that he assigned Arnold and Stamper to the blade rings (on the first and second shifts, respectively), when Greene transferred them to bay 8 because a new shipment of rings had just arrived and he had no other employees to assign to the job. I credit R. L. Southern who testified that he was welding on the blade rings the day Arnold came to bay 8, and that Arnold replaced him on the rings that very morning. Except where corroborated by testimony of the employees I have credited, I do not believe Booker in any respect whatsoever. Moreover, as Parker, Johnston, Southern. and L. H. Williams are current employees of Respondent, they testified subject to Respondent's displeasure. I have weighed this factor, among others, in making my credibility determinations.

---

> [sic] Barton knows why on account of the Union activity. And, Sepulvado didn't open his mouth. He shrugged his shoulders like, didn't deny it yes or no. [Emphasis supplied.]
> Q. Did either Mr. Barton or Mr. Sepulvado deny that you were being transferred due to your Union activity?
>
> A. No, sir, they didn't say nay or yay.
> Q. Now, was your work that you were doing, the type of work that was being x-rayed?
>
> A. Yes, sir.
> Q. During the time that you had worked in Bay 5, had any supervisor complain[ed] to you or disciplined you for the quality or quantity of your welding?
>
> A. No, sir, in fact, Mr. Sepulvado, around November or December, he asked me to go on graveyard, he said, "If you don't mind." He said, "We don't have but one man [sic] need one man on graveyard to kind of take the slack off." He said, "You are trustworthy, for all I know, you always done good work. Would you mind going on graveyard by yourself and work?" I said, "No sir, I don't mind at all."
> Q. Had you ever been disciplined or warned or spoken to about your x-ray rejects?
> A. No, sir.

Sepulvado confirmed that Stamper did allege that the reason for the transfer was the former's union activities, but Sepulvado testified that such had "nothing to do with" the transfer. I do not credit Sepulvado.[25]

Although Stamper's bay 5 work of welding the insides of heads had been unpleasant, Stamper testified that his work of welding blade rings in bay 8 was even worse. As the work of welding blade rings already has been described above, it will not be repeated here.

Stamper testified that a handcode welder from bay 8 named Carpenter was sent to perform the automatic welding Stamper had been doing in bay 5. Carpenter told Stamper he had never operated an automatic welder.

(3) Cecil M. Sanders

No sooner was Sanders assigned to the job of welding the insides of heads than he was transferred to bay 10, where he was assigned to the still more difficult job of welding the inside seams on tanks.[26] Sanders testified that the inside of tanks is a hotter job than welding the inside of a head because a tank is about 50 feet long, and the welder may be all the way back in the tank, whereas a head is much shorter. As it is much darker inside the tanks, a welder has more difficulty seeing what he is doing. Additionally, when the welder is welding a closing seam, the tank is sealed from both ends, leaving no air ventilation at all, making it that much hotter, smokier, and darker. Sanders further testified that if a welder were to be injured while welding the inside closing seam in a tank car, no one would see him, and it might be 2-3 hours before he would be missed by anyone.

(4) Conclusion

Bay 5 General Foreman Sepulvado testified that he selected Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper for transfer because they were "just a starting point." "There is no particular reason they were picked."

Superintendent Greene testified that he made the decision to send Arnold and Stamper to bay 8 and Sanders to bay 10 (after Sepulvado had selected them for transfer from bay 5) because Arnold and Stamper had worked in bay 8 previously and because Sanders was an automatic submerged arc welder, and he needed to replace Sanders with another welder, man for man.[27]

In support of its argument that transfers are routine at the plant, Respondent submitted its exhibit 14. It is a list of some 153 employees who were transferred from one bay to another between January 2 and June 11, 1980.[28] Clearly, transfers are not uncommon at the plant. Although General Counsel does not question the concept of transfers generally, he does attack the selection of Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper.[29] Thus, Respondent's Exhibit 14 has no controlling significance in assessing the motivation for the selections at issue here. In fact, I would accord little weight to Exhibit 14 in view of the fact that it fails to show the classifications of the employees transferred. This must be coupled with the fact that several employees' names appear several times.[30] One can only speculate as to whether the frequent temporary transfers are of first-class welders sent to resolve some temporary problem; whether they are of mere helpers sent to where their services are needed; or some other explanation.

The list begins with a wholesale transfer of 14 employees on 1 day, January 2, 1980, to 3 different bays. It seems reasonable to conclude that bay 14 sustained a curtailed need for employees generally at the end of 1979.

[25] In overruling General Counsel's objection to the leading nature of the question, I did suggest that an attempt be made to avoid leading. While leading will become necessary at some point to elicit a negative of an opponent's specific testimony, an Administrative Law Judge can attach greater weight to such negative if it comes after nonleading questions on the topic. At least once earlier in the hearing I had recommended such procedure for this very reason.

[26] Sanders testified that on February 13 Sepulvado transferred him for the purpose of reducing X-ray rejects because they had tried such transfers before with success. (However, no substantiating evidence was presented herein.) Sepulvado said he was not claiming that Sanders' welding was bad. Sanders testified that before his transfer the reject percentage had always ranged between 5 and 9 percent, and that after his transfer he observed postings in bay 5 in late February showing days for which the rates were 18 to 34 percent. Stamper also saw rates of 15 to 19 percent after his transfer, and he, like Sanders, confirmed that the pretransfer rate had ranged from 5 to 9 percent during the years that he had been in bay 5. Stamper had worked in bay 5 since 1976.

[27] Greene's statement implies that bay 10 had selected a person for transfer who had the same classification skill as Sanders.

[28] General Counsel and the Union do not discuss Resp. Exh. 14 in their briefs.

[29] The General Counsel also appears to attack the timing of Respondent's supposed need to reduce the X-ray rejects in bay 5. Thus, while the General Counsel does not take issue with the credibility of Respondent's evidence regarding the 3 percent goal, he does contend that the timing of the selection, and the selection process, reveals that the economic defense was a pretext seized on to punish the three for their protected activities.

[30] For example, R. J. Drummond on pp. 1 (twice if R. L. Drummond) and 2 (twice); R. D. Broome, pp 1 and 2 (three times); J. Brown, pp. 3; and J. R. McDearmont, pp. 4.

Yet these 14 employees are included in the list as if they had a material bearing on the transfers at issue. In short, I find the list, with its unexplained contents, to be of little assistance here.

Respondent also introduced its Exhibit 15, a list of the 12 unit employees in bay 5 on February 1. Of these 12, 4 (Arnold, Huffaker, Sanders, and Stamper) are shown as having testified at the February hearing. Of the 12, 5 (Arnold, Boston, Sanders, Stamper, and Toms) are shown to have been transferred—Boston and Toms on February 10 and Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper on February 13.[31]

Stamper testified that Boston was a fitter who assembled heads preparatory to the welding process. Thus, Boston's work, since it was not welding, had nothing to do with the X-ray reject percentage. Toms' job classification is not specified in the record. However, Sepulvado transferred Boston and Toms to bay 13 where they already had been working for some days, and no employees were transferred into bay 5 to replace them. Since Sepulvado testified that the transfer program was designed to reduce X-ray rejects by swapping people with like classifications in order to bring in people with an attitude geared toward that goal, it appears that the transfers of Boston and Toms were unassociated with the goal of reducing X-ray rejects. This leaves only Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper transferred from bay 5 for the ostensible goal of reducing the reject percentage. Stated differently, 100 percent of the transferees from bay 5 on the asserted reject reduction plan had testified in February. As earlier noted, General Counsel contends that they were transferred to more onerous and less desirable positions in order to punish them for their testimony, and to warn all other employees of the consequences which will follow similar conduct by them.[32]

Finally, Stamper's replacement at operating an automatic welding machine admitted to Stamper that he had never operated one of the machines. The X-ray reject percentages Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper thereafter observed in bay 5, from 15 to 39 percent,[33] indicate that the selection procedure was based on something other than economic considerations. That something other, I find, was the union activities of Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper, and their testimony at the February hearing.

Having found that the protected activities of Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper were a moving cause for their mid-February transfers, it must next be determined whether Respondent carried its Wright Line[34] burden of demonstrating that the transfers would have been effected regardless of such protected activities.

In light of the foregoing, and the entire record, it is clear, and I find, that the asserted economic program to reduce X-ray rejects was nothing more than a pretext seized upon to punish the three witnesses of General Counsel.[35] To be effective both as punishment of the three, and as a warning to all others, timing was critically important in order that all employees would appreciate the unmistakable message in such transfers. With a delayed action, the message would be lost on employees. The action had to be taken quickly, and it was. Accordingly, I find that Respondent failed to rebut General Counsel's prima facie case and, therefore, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act by transferring Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper[36] from their bay 5 jobs in mid-February 1980.[37]

d. Closer supervision and stricter enforcement of work rules applied to Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper[38]

General Foreman Frank Booker and Second Shift Foreman Manual Law notified Arnold and Stamper, upon their being transferred into bay 8, of bay 8's work rules. Thus, they were told that they had to be ready to work before the shift whistle blew; that they would work until the whistle sounded for break, and for lunch; that they would have 3 minutes before the final whistle to put up their tools and clean up around their area; that there would be no talking to other employees during working hours; and that they were not to talk to the employees on the opposite shift during the shift changes.

Both Arnold and Stamper credibly testified that the other bay 8 employees were not subjected to these same rules. Thus, Arnold testified that he observed other employees talking to each other during working time, washing up early, sitting by the shed outside bay 8 about 5 minutes before the whistle blew, and walking around wearing motorcycle helmets 5 minutes before quitting time. When these incidents occurred, the bay 8 supervisors were in the bay, sometimes within 10 feet of where the infraction was occurring. Similarly, Stamper testified that when the bay 8 supervisors saw other people talking during working time, they would turn away and act as though they did not see the employees talking. When Stamper was working the day shift, he saw employees Whiddon and Ramsey wash up early on a routine basis, and Supervisors Booker and Wise were only 4-5 feet away.[39] Arnold has seen employee Bass talking to nearly every other bay 8 employee during work, and sometimes Booker was as close as 4-5 feet from Bass who did not stop him from doing this.

[31] The exhibit also shows that Leadman R. L. Paddie was transferred on February 18 and Welding Technician Ward in May.

[32] Vernon Huffaker, the other February witness, already was assigned to the job of gouging (repair work). It appears that a steady basis of gouging is considered undersirable by employees generally.

[33] Although B. T. Walsworth, Respondent's manager of quality control, testified that Resp. Exh. 13, a graph of reject percentages, shows that bay 5's X-ray reject rate began a steady decline from a January 1980 high of 8.14 to 5.85 percent by the end of July 1980, I note also that he testified he did not know why the rate decreased. I credit the testimony of Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper regarding the percentages they observed in bay 8 after their transfers. In any event, even if the reject percentage did decrease, it does not control resolution of the issue of alleged improper motivation to be decided here. Increased efficiency, as an incidental benefit, does not render lawful what is otherwise unlawful.

[35] Although Vice President Bradshaw's memo to Greene, regarding the reduction of rejects, bears the date of December 14, 1979, I find that such memo does not overcome the timing of the discrimination against Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper, and the public manner in which, for example, Sanders was reassigned on February 6. Moreover, the entire record supports the conclusion I reach here.

[36] While the three do not have a statutory right to such job assignments forever, neither may Respondent transfer them for unlawful reasons.

[37] With respect to the 8(a)(3) finding, I have considered the fact that in some instances General Counsel failed to show disparity. An example is Sanders' transfer to welding inside tanks in bay 10. Presumably, there were other employees who welded inside the tanks, yet there is no evidence that Respondent was punishing union supporters by assigning only (or mostly) employees openly active for the Union to the job of welding inside tanks. Nevertheless, in light of the testimony of the discriminatees at the February hearing, and the fact that Bradshaw, Greene, and other supervisors of Respondent admitted herein their knowledge of the union sympathies of Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper, and in light of the entire record, including the discrimination found against employee Willie Hall, Jr., I am persuaded that my 8(a)(3) conclusion is compelled. The basis for the 8(a)(4) conclusion, of course, is more obvious in view of the central fact of the February hearing.

[38] Par. 10(c) of the first (March 14) complaint.

In contrast to the leniency with which the other bay 8 employees have been treated, the rules have been strictly enforced against Arnold and Stamper. On various occasions, employees Bass and Howard stopped to talk to Arnold, and Booker made them leave. Arnold and Stamper both described an occasion where Stamper was following up[40] Arnold on second shift on blade rings, and he approached Arnold to find out how the job was running. No sooner had Stamper asked Arnold this then Supervisor Law came up and told Stamper to leave, because Booker was watching. Stamper tried to explain that he was just asking about the job, and Law responded, "Booker don't know what you're talk [sic] about."[41]

In order to assure strict enforcement of the rules as to Arnold and Stamper, they were both assigned to the bay 8 blade ring positioner on opposite shifts, which Arnold and Stamper estimated as ranging anywhere from 8-14 feet from the supervisors' office. This was described by Arnold as "pretty close to the closet" position in the bay, and Stamper confirmed that this was the closest welding position in the bay, while noting that there were a few fitters at the fitup table who were also pretty close to the office.

To obtain a better view of Arnold and Stamper,[42] about 1-1/2 weeks after they transferred into the bay, a second positioner was installed, which was even closer to the office, and both of them were reassigned to work at this new positioner.

Conclusion

General Counsel argues that the issue of closer supervision and stricter enforcement of the rules cannot be viewed in isolation, but rather must be viewed in the context of Respondent's campaign "to make life miserable for the plant's strongest and most vociferous union advocates." Certainly Respondent's actions in enforcing its rules in a disparate manner and keeping a closer watch on Arnold and Stamper would tend to inhibit them in their organizational activities. Moreover, it is clear, and I find, that such discriminatory actions by Respondent were taken in retaliation of their recent testimony in the February hearing as well as for their union organizing activities. By such conduct, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act as alleged.

e. February 25 warning to Stamper

On February 25, employee Stamper received a written warning from General Foreman Booker for bad welding on a pad (G.C. Exh. 14). According to the testimony of Stamper, he welded with employee A. A. Williamson on the job for which he received the written warning. Stamper, who has been employed by Respondent as a first-class welder for about 11 years, observed both his and Williamson's welds, and he noted that Williamson's weld was no better or worse than his. Stamper's unrefuted testimony establishes that he had not been previously warned or disciplined about his welding, and that since he had been in bay 8, he had not been counseled about the quality of his welding by any bay 8 supervisors before receiving this warning. Williamson had been working in bay 8 longer than Stamper.

When Stamper received the warning from Booker, he asked Booker how he knew it was his work. Instead of answering, Booker remarked that it took most of the day to repair the mistakes. He said there were pinholes. Booker did not tell Stamper which "pad" he was supposed to have welded improperly (there are about 15 or 20 pads on an entire tank). Furthermore, Stamper testified that depending on the size of the pad it would take 20 or 30 minutes to a maximum of 2-3 hours.

When he was called under FRE 611(c) the first day of the hearing, Booker testified that he gave A. A. Williamson a verbal warning, which "is given to a man that doesn't understand or just come new to the bay."[43] Booker went on to say that he considers a man who has not been in the bay for several months to be new. Stamper, who had been in the bay for only 2 weeks, apparently would be considered new. Yet Stamper received a written warning.

Booker testified that he gave Stamper the written warning because of welding that Stamper had done which was so poor that it had to be gouged out and reworked. According to Booker, the welding was very poor as it contained overlaps, cold laps, pin holes, and had a general lack of fusion in the weld. He indicated that he gave Stamper the warning for unsatisfactory work. Booker also stated that there were three other employees who worked on the same job, J. E. Johnson, E. Johnson, and A. A. Williamson.

He identified Respondent's Exhibits 31 and 32 as written warnings which he had given to J. E. Johnson and E. Johnson for work on the same tank job. Neither testified at the February hearing. He testified that he did not give a warning to Williamson because Williamson's weld symbol was not on any of the bad work, whereas the symbol of Stamper and the two Johnsons were. Booker further testified that he did not show the poor work to Stamper because Stamper was working on second shift and the tank car had to be moved out of the bay prior to Stamper's return to work. Booker testified that neither Stamper's involvement in the February hearing nor Stamper's participation in union activities played any part in his decision to issue him the written warning.

[39] Respondent finally issued Ray Whiddon and R. L. Southern warnings for washing up early in July (Resp. Exhs. 33 and 34, respectively).

[40] The record, at p. 139, ll. 20 and 23, incorrectly uses the phrase "fouling up." I hereby correct this to "following up."

[41] Law admits to having broken up a conversation between Stamper and Arnold, but testified it was because they were talking more than 3 minutes. It is clear from the testimony of Arnold and Stamper that this conversation could not have lasted longer than a few seconds before Law silenced them. Accordingly, I do not credit Law.

[42] Stamper's testimony stands unrefuted that the bay 8 supervisors could see him "very well" through the window in their office.

[43] However, when Booker was recalled by counsel for Respondent, about 3-1/2 weeks later, Booker changed his testimony, and stated that Williamson did not receive any warning, because his stencil was not on any of the bad welding. No documentary evidence was presented to support Booker's testimony one way or the other. As seen by Resp. Exh. 49, which is Arnold's employee record, Booker does make written notations of verbal warnings to employees.

Although the two Johnsons worked on the same tank and received warnings for faulty welds, there really is no connection between their work and Stamper's other than all worked on the same tank car. It is clear that Stamper's allegedly faulty weld was on a pad, whereas the warnings to the two Johnsons simply referred to "bad welding." Moreover, they apparently worked on the first shift (Resp. Exh. 31), whereas Stamper worked on the second. I note also Stamper's undisputed testimony that Booker grinned as he told Stamper he had a warning notice for him.

Under all the circumstances, I find the warning to Stamper to be a false and contrived event. I credit Stamper, and I completely disbelieve Booker. Thus, I find that Stamper did not make any faulty weld whatsoever, and that the warning is based on a total fabrication. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act as alleged in paragraph 8 of the first (March 14) complaint, and I shall order that Respondent expunge the warning from Stamper's personnel records.

f. Arnold disciplined

(1) Introduction

After testifying in the February hearing, and following his transfer from bay 5, Lynn A. Arnold received a verbal warning, two written warnings, and a 2-day suspension. General Counsel has alleged that such discipline is unlawful.

(2) March 6 verbal warning on quantity of work

Paragraph 7 of the second (April 28) complaint is a simple allegation that Respondent, through Foreman Manuel Law, verbally warned Arnold on March 6. Respondent denied the allegation in its answer. Contrary to such denial, at the hearing General Foreman Frank Booker testified that he instructed Foreman Manuel Law to verbally warn Arnold, and Law testified that he did as instructed. Indeed, Respondent introduced as its Exhibit 47 a copy of an employee daily record form bearing a notation by Law that he had "talked to" Arnold on March 6 for insufficient welding the previous night[44] on job order no. 166071 (a tank).

Booker testified that he had instructed Law to have the tank welded on the inside, cleaned, and ready for attaching the heads (the cup-shaped ends for the tank car) the following morning. On inspecting the vessel, they determined that there were 4–6 hours of work left. On learning the following morning that the tank had not been finished, Booker testified that he gave Law a "chewing out" because the tank was a "hot" (rush) and the job had not been completed. On learning that Arnold had worked on the tank, Booker told Law to tell Arnold he had not put out enough work on the job the previous night. Booker testified that he had the job completed that day in about 1-1/2 to 2 hours.

Law confirmed the 4-6-hour estimate and that Booker wanted the job completed that night. He also testified that from time to time, during the shift, he checked to see how Arnold was progressing. Law stated that at times he observed Arnold just sitting, but he did not determine whether Arnold was slacking on the job. He never told Arnold the work was not progressing fast enough. Indeed, he never told Arnold the job was to be completed that night or that it was a "hot" order.

Arnold testified that the night of March 5 Law had come into the tank and, after inspecting the work, told Arnold that the work was good and that he had done "a night's work." On reporting for work March 6, however, Arnold learned a different story. Thus, in the bay 8 office, in the presence of Charles LaBorde,[45] Law told Arnold he was going to have to start producing more work, that he had been watching him and Arnold was not producing enough.[46] Arnold reminded him of their conversation the previous evening, but Law denied so remarking to Arnold. He said Arnold would have to produce more and he would be watching Arnold more closely.[47]

Arnold asked LaBorde if he had any complaints about his work and LaBorde replied he had none.[48] Law then said that it was Booker who had told him to call Arnold in and warn him.

Arnold testified in detail concerning the work he had done the night of March 5.[49] Thus, he describes having to reset the roll (which apparently turns the tank) more than once, haul an airhose and the welding leads to the tank, weld both outside and inside fittings, and backgouge. The welding alone took some 6-1/2 hours, and the other preparatory work consumed the balance of the shift, except some cleanup time at the end.

One explanation for the different time estimates is that the parties differ on what Arnold had to do. For example, Law initially testified that the outside welding had been done on the day shift. On cross-examination, he conceded that Arnold did have to weld one outside fitting. Law also stated that Arnold did not have to pull over any welding leads since the day crew had left them there. Arnold testified that none of the fittings in place had been welded on the outside and inside of the tank.

[44] It appears from the testimony of Law that Arnold had just that week been moved from the day shift to the second shift where Law was the foreman.

[45] LaBorde is a leadman.

[46] Arnold testified without contradiction that in his 14 years of employment with Respondent, he had never been so much as counseled regarding his work until this warning.

[47] At the hearing Law testified that the evening of March 5, although he knew Arnold had not done enough work, he did not say so. Instead, when Arnold asked him if he was satisfied, Law simply said "if you are." Law intended to discuss the matter with Booker, but Booker came to him first.

[48] LaBorde was not called as a witness by Respondent.

[49] He also testified that the tank was waiting for him the night of March 6 when he received his warning, and that it took him about 2 hours to finish the job that night.

Called in rebuttal by Respondent, Plant Superintendent Greene identified Respondent's Exhibit 47, the operation process sheet for order 166071 (ostensibly the tank in issue). According to Greene, there is no way in which Arnold could have welded all the fittings shown thereon in 8-9 hours. In reply, Arnold testified that he welded all the fittings there were to be welded at the time, and that Respondent's Exhibit 47 is not representative of the job as of March 5-6. For example, he testified that there was no manway "E" on the tank, yet such is shown on the exhibit. Whether a manway was added later, Arnold could not say. Respondent contends that Arnold has confused the job orders with the passage of time.

I attach no weight to Respondent's Exhibit 47 for several reasons. First, it is a blueprint dated December 20, 1979, and Greene conceded that it is just an estimate. Second, in view of Arnold's specific and detailed testimony, I have little confidence that the items shown in December are what faced Arnold in March. Additionally, Respondent Exhibit 47 reflects (under man-hours per unit) that bay 13 is to perform fitting, gouging, and welding. However, Greene testified that, while such work originally was scheduled for bay 13, it had been switched to bay 8, and the sheet (Resp. Exh. 47) "never changes once it is made up."[50]

In addition to all the above shortcomings of Respondent's Exhibit 47 as a reliable picture of the job to be done on March 5-6, I note that Greene conceded that Respondent's accounting department produces a computer printout showing the amount of actual work done for the job and which would reflect the work done by Arnold and, presumably, other employees. Respondent did not see fit to introduce such document,[51] and I can only conclude from such failure to introduce that the document would have been unfavorable to its contentions.

Arnold impressed me with his straightforward manner and his detailed testimony, and I credit him. In contrast, Greene and Booker, as noted earlier, exhibited an appearance of hostility during their testimony, and I do not credit Law. For example, I find it strange that Law, knowing the tank was "hot" (rush), made no mention of this to Arnold the night of March 5 when he, at times, supposedly observed Arnold sitting (and possibly preparing to work) and evidently knew after a while that Arnold would not finish the job.

In short, I find that the correct, accurate, and true version is that given by Arnold, and that Respondent's version of the job is a complete and total fabrication deliberately devised in order to build a disciplinary record on Arnold in order to punish him for his union activities and his testimony under the congressional statute. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act as alleged, and I shall order that Respondent notify Arnold that it revokes such March 6 warning.

(3) April 11 written warning on wasting gouging rods

Arnold testified that about 10:30 Friday morning, April 11, Leadman David G. Emerson called him into the office of General Foreman Frank Booker. In the office, Booker began by charging Arnold with slacking off in his work effort, and he stated that the previous day (Thursday, April 10) he had inspected Arnold's work area and allegedly found that Arnold had done very little work on the blade ring. Arnold disputed this.

Then Booker displayed a batch of gouging rods and stated he had picked them up under Arnold's work area the day before (Thursday). Arnold said they were not his rods, that he had not been at work on Thursday, April 10.[52] Booker said he was going to give Arnold a warning, not for his work but because of the gouging rods.[53] The warning notice (G.C. Exh. 9), dated April 10, reads in pertinent part:

> For violation of Rule No. 19—Insubordination—wasting company property in the form of gouging rods despite repeated instructions. Employee discarded jointable rods ranging from 4" to 11" in length. These rods should not be longer than 2".
> Photograph retained in Employee Relations Department.

The warning is signed by Emerson (who did not testify) and bears four sets of initials, one of which no doubt is Booker's.

Arnold testified convincingly that neither Booker nor Emerson had ever warned him previously on this matter, and he told Booker on April 11 that no one had ever so warned him. Booker made no response. The alleged prior warnings apparently are the basis of the "insubordination."

In testifying as a witness called by General Counsel under FRE 611(c), Superintendent Greene disclosed that another employee had worked at the same station as Arnold. Thus, it was important to learn just when the rods had been found, for they apparently could have been left by an unidentified employee who worked the evening shift on Wednesday, April 9.[54] In following up this line of inquiry when General Counsel called Booker under FRE 611(c), Booker testified as follows:

[50] Additionally, I note that on Resp. Exh. 30, a blueprint diagram of the shop dated September 3, 1969, it was ascertained in voir dire that certain measurements in issue had been added the week of the hearing. Such fact should not have been left to voir dire by General Counsel, but should have been made known at the time of the offer. Thus, if one blueprint, Resp. Exh. 30, can be added to, I am compelled to conclude that Resp. Exh. 47 could likewise have been added too even though Greene testified there have been no additions to Resp. Exh. 47.

[51] Yet Respondent had introduced such computer printout in relation to the blade rings' order (Resp. Exh. 18).

[52] Respondent's employee daily record card (Resp. Exh. 47) shows code letters "S" over "E" for the date of April 10. While this could mean "sick" and "excused," there is no explanation in the record other than Booker's statement that it meant Arnold was sick that day. When the exhibit had earlier been marked as G.C. Exh. 7, Greene testified that the entry regarding Arnold working the first shift in April was supposed to be correct. A computer printout for the job, reflects that Arnold did not work on the project on April 10 (Resp. Exh. 18 p. 2). Respondent acknowledged that its records did reflect the April 10 absence.

[53] Booker subsequently stated to Emerson, in Arnold's presence, that he may have looked on Wednesday rather than Thursday. This was after Arnold reminded them he had not been at work on Thursday, and it smacks of a convenient change in memory to fit the need.

[54] When called by Respondent, Booker testified that Arnold was the last person to work at the station. Yet Greene testified an employee had worked at the same station. He was unclear as to whether he meant a different shift.

Q. When did you find those rods?

A. When did I find them?

Q. What time of day?

A. I don't remember, off hand.

Q. Was it—do you remember what shift you found it?

A. Yes, on the day shift I found it.

Q. When did you write up that warning?

A. I don't remember the date.

Q. Did you write the warning up on the same day you found it?

A. I don't know.

Q. Well, when, if a warning is dated a particular date, is that when you write up the warning, the day you date them?

A. Ask that question again, please?

Q. Do you write up the warning on the day that they dated?

A. I write up a warning and date it the day I find the rods. I don't know what day it might be written up.

Q. The warning was dated the day you found the rods?

A. I didn't say that.

Q. Could you explain what you did say?

A. I said, I write a warning on the day, I write the date in on the day I find the rods. But, I could write it the following day.

Q. Okay. So, If a warning has a particular date on it, that is the date you found the rods?

A. That is the date I wrote it.

Q. If a warning has a date on it, would that date reflect the date that you found the rods?

A. No, not particularly.

Q. If a warning has a date on it, would that date reflect the date the warning was written?

A. Pardon?[55]

Q. If a warning has a date on it, would that date reflect the date that warning was written?

A. Right.

Q. Did you write up the warning to Lynn Arnold on the same date that you found the rods?

Mr. Hester: Objection, asked and answered.

Judge Linton: Well, frankly, the witness seems to change his answer and it may be that he doesn't understand the question on this one. So, I'm going to overrule that objection.

By Mr. Yudien: (Resuming)

Q. You can answer the question.

A. Ask it again, please.

Q. Did you write up the warning to Lynn Arnold on the same date as when you discovered those rods?

A. I told you once, I didn't know.

Q. Might you have?

A. I might have.

In contrast to his inability to recall the time of day he found the rods, or whether he prepared the warning the same day he found the rods when asked by General Counsel, Booker testified with clear recollection when called by Respondent. Thus, he then testified that he found the rods in the early morning of April 10 and that he told Emerson to make out a warning slip for Arnold.

Finally, I credit Arnold's testimony that he burns his gouging rods down to some 2 inches; that he saves rods 2-1/2 inches or greater in length; that he has pointed out to Leadman LaBorde that whole gouging rods were lying scattered in the bay and LaBorde simply shrugged his shoulders.

As I credit Arnold's testimony that he had never previously been counseled or warned regarding gouging rods, and in light of his credited testimony that he does not discard rod stubs in excess of 2-1/2 inches, I find that Respondent's warning to Arnold falsely basing "insubordination" of fabricated prior warnings,[56] violates Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, as alleged in paragraphs 8 and 17 of the second (April 28) complaint. I shall order that the warning be expunged from Arnold's personnel records and that Respondent notify Arnold it has done so.

(4) May 29 suspension and June 2 warning

It is undisputed that on Thursday, May 29, when Arnold reported for the second shift, he was called into Plant Superintendent Greene's office for a discussion concerning some welding he had done. Present in the office besides Superintendent Greene, were Personnel Manager George Dillard, Foreman Manuel Law, and Arnold. Greene testified that he called the meeting because it had been reported to him through Booker that Arnold had used the wrong kind of wire on welding a Westinghouse exhaust extension the night before. He further testified that Dillard was present, in lieu of Vice President Bradshaw or Employee Relations Manager Hillman Deaton, because one of them is present when the problem appears to be serious enough to involve the possibility of termination of the employee. Sometime that morning, Booker had called him and reported that as two of his welders were moving the exhaust extension, job number 159120, they observed the wrong wire on the welding machine and that he was afraid it had been welded with the wrong wire. Greene told Booker to obtain a sample of the weld and give it to the metallurgist for chemical analysis. Later that day, the metallurgist, or welding technician, confirmed that it had been welded with the wrong type of wire.

Booker confirmed the foregoing and testified that he personally went back and looked at the welding machine and observed that the spool of wire on the feeder was McKay 75 and that it should have been 91B3L wire. The chemical analysis proved that McKay 75 wire had been used.

[55] Booker suffers from some hearing loss, and I consider the "Pardon" to be a reflection of that fact rather than anything else.

[56] It seems evident that Respondent was more concerned with preparing for litigation than in ascertaining the true facts. Thus, Respondent wrote on the warning "photograph retained in Employee Relations Department." The photograph was received in evidence as Resp. Exh. 35A. In short, I find that the gouging rods (Resp. Exhs. 35 and 35A) were not Arnold's.

At the afternoon meeting in Greene's office, Greene asked Arnold what type of wire he had used. Arnold stated that he had used 91B3L. Greene asked how he knew that and he said he had looked on the box which was labeled 91B3L. Greene told him that he had used McKay 75 wire. Arnold, according to Booker, asked how Greene knew that and Greene replied because a chemical analysis had been run.

Arnold testified at the hearing that the roll of wire inside the box also has a label on it and that he did not remember checking the label attached to the spool of wire, and that as the wires are the same color, there would be no way of telling the difference between the two without reading the labels. He further testified that he had no reason to believe that the sticker on the inside of the spool was going to be different from the one on the outside of the box. He testified that it was his usual procedure to check only the label on the outside of the box, and that he had never been instructed to do any differently.

Vice President Bradshaw testified that Respondent's vessels are all built under the standard set by the code of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers (ASME). Under the code, and in accordance with the code, Respondent established a quality control manual with guidelines relating to different procedures and processes. He testified that Respondent's quality control manager established certain guidelines for supervisors, weld technicians, and leadmen. Under these guidelines, such persons are to issue the welding rods and welding wire, make a record of it, and ascertain that everyone gets the right rods and wire. Although such persons can delegate authority, for example, to a top welder in a bay, with the approval of the quality control manager, there is no evidence in the record that the supervisory or quality control personnel delegated this responsibility and authority to Arnold or anyone else. Nevertheless, Greene testified that at the meeting he "reminded" Arnold that it was a welder's responsibility to secure the proper type of wire for each job, and that Arnold understood and knew that fact.

Both Arnold and Booker testified that a certain amount of heat was generated in the meeting when Booker admittedly interrupted Arnold at one point by saying, "wait a damn minute," in order that he, Booker, could express a point. Booker testified that the point he made at that time was that if the two welders had not pointed out the problem the job could have gone out of the bay and to the customer, put into use, and "could have exploded and killed several people and cost several million dollars." At this point in the conversation, Greene told Arnold to punch the clock, go home, and return Friday, that they had other things to consider. When Arnold asked what other things they had to consider, Greene told him that it was none of his business. Arnold responded that other employees had done similar things and no one had been sent home as far as he knows. Greene replied that employees had been sent home, and they also had told the supervisor that they had made a mistake but that Arnold did not know he had made a mistake. Booker stated that they had another test they wanted to run on the weld.

Greene further testified that the following day (Friday) Booker reported another problem regarding welding by Arnold. This time it was on a blade ring which allegedly was "literally full of pinholes and bad welding on both sides." Booker reported that Arnold and employee Jimmy R. Grant had welded on the blade ring.

Arnold testified that in leaving to go home he stopped to tell his rider that he had to leave and for the rider not to wait for him at the end of the shift. About half way to bay 13 where the rider worked, Bay Foreman Law caught Arnold by the shoulder and told him he would have to leave the plant. Arnold told him that he was going to tell his rider that he was leaving. Law told him that he could not do that and he had to "get out of the plant." Arnold asked if Law meant he could not tell his riders that he was leaving. Law responded, "E. C. Greene wants you out of the plant." Arnold said he had to go tell his riders, and he proceeded. Law followed him. Thereafter, Arnold called his brother-in-law who came and picked him up.

On Friday around 2 p.m., Arnold testified that Greene called him and told him not to report to work that they were not through with the investigation. Greene testified that he told Arnold that other problems had come up. When Arnold inquired as to the nature of those, Greene told him that there were some problems with blade rings and they were running more calculations on the exhaust extension.

Greene testified that it was the decision of him and Dillard that Arnold should be sent home, for they wanted to know how much rework would have to be done and there were more tests and calculations to run. The record does not reflect the nature of these other tests and calculations.

Greene testified on cross-examination that he did not permit Arnold to continue working because he had not admitted that he made a mistake. Earlier, Greene had testified that an employee may not get a warning if he admits his mistake. This was in relation to bad welding involving a bunch of pin holes, and where the welder admits he made a mistake and wants to do something about it.

Booker testified that Arnold was sent home because there was a lot of rework involved in the exhaust extension, requiring gouging out the weld and rewelding, and Greene wanted to check further and see how far and how deep it had to be gouged.

Greene testified that Booker reported to him that extensive pin holes and other problems had been discovered in a blade ring.

Foreman J. C. Wise testified that quality control had found the poor work on the blade ring and brought it to his attention through a rework order of form 13-A. Wise testified that on inspecting the welding on the blade he found that there were two weld symbols on the blade ring, one being for Grant and the other being for Arnold. Wise approached Grant who initially denied that he had done the welding. Wise testified that the welding had been done a week earlier. Later, after Grant had had the opportunity to inspect the work, he told Wise that in fact he had done the poor welding and explained that he simply had done a bad job.

On the afternoon of Monday, June 2, Arnold was called to a meeting in Greene's office. Employee Relations Manager Deaton was present. At the meeting, Greene gave him a warning slip (G.C. Exh. 7) for violating rule no. 41, "Unsatisfactory work on jobs 159120 - exh. ext. & job 159122-01." The warning was signed by J. F. Booker and initialed by Greene. Booker testified that initially he had written a separate warning for the exhaust extension, but then tore it up and put both jobs on the same warning notice.

At the time Greene handed Arnold the warning slip, he told Arnold that the committee had met and decided to bring Arnold back to work. He then handed Arnold the warning and said that they had found some more welding Arnold had done that was bad and that they had photographs of it. He said that the welding was rotten all the way through, had pin holes in it, the weld was broken, undercut, and had to be deseamed and welded. Arnold asked him how he knew that he had welded on it, and Greene replied because Arnold's weld symbol was on it. Arnold stated that more than one welder worked on it and how did Greene know that Arnold did all of the bad welding. Greene stated that another employee was given a warning for the same job.

When Deaton inquired whether Arnold had welded on the blade ring, Arnold told him he did not know because he had welded on 10 or 15 and did not recall at that time. Greene stated that they could argue all day and not get anything settled, and he told Arnold to go back to work.

Arnold testified that Jimmy Grant also welded on the blade ring. He further testified that the day the work was done, the weld had been capped out on one side and the supervisor (Foreman Law) told him the weld was finished and told him to turn it over. Arnold testified that he assumed the supervisor had seen the pin holes and that they would be repaired in the back at what is called the "pickup" area where some repairs are made. Arnold turned the blade ring over and started welding another bevel. Arnold testified that on the side that had the pin holes, he had welded only in the very bottom of the bevel before, and that the pin holes were not in his welds but on the surface. While he stated that his weld symbols ("LA") were on the blade rings, it would not necessarily indicate the part of the welding he had actually done. Arnold testified that he did not repair the pin holes because his supervisor told him the weld was finished and to turn it over, and that in bay 8 "when the supervisor tell you to do something, that is what you do."

Although Arnold testified that it was not unusual for the men assigned to pickup to do these pin holes, the inspector who found the pin holes, Roy Ross, testified that these pin holes were the worst he had seen in the recent past and should have been repaired by the welder, and that if he, as inspector, sees the poor welding first, it will not go to the pickup welding process but will be rejected by him.

Grant testified that he has been a first-class welder only since March 14. This was the first time he had welded on a blade ring and the day before he welded on it he asked Foreman Wise to show him how because he had not previously performed such welding. He testified that he stenciled his weld symbols by the portion of the work on Friday, May 23, just as the whistle blew ending the first shift, and he did not have time to check for pin holes. When he returned to work the following Monday, the blade ring was gone and he was again unable to check for pin holes.

Grant admitted that when first questioned by supervisors about the bad welding he denied doing it because he was not sure which side he welded, but when he later had a chance to inspect the job himself he realized he had done the faulty welding. He then went to Supervisor Wise and admitted to him that he had made the pin holes. Later that day, he received a warning slip for his "unsatisfactory work" on welding the blade rings (G.C. Exh. 16, dated 5-30-80).

It should be noted that on May 20 Arnold assisted in distributing a handbill at the plant gate on behalf of the Union. The handbill was a copy of a letter dated March 10 addressed jointly to Respondent's president, William E. Adams, and to the Regional Director for Region 15 of the Board from International Representative Al Washington, Jr., on the Union's letterhead. (G.C. Exh. 12). Some 48 employees signed their names as the "Boilermakers in-plant organizing committee." Arnold's name is the first on the list, and Grant's signature is on the second page toward the end. Booker, who signed Grant's warning slip, admitted that at the time he issued the warning to Grant he was aware of the handbilling at the gate and of Grant's signature on the list. Presumably he was also aware of Arnold's signature.

Grant testified that a few minutes after Booker and Wise had asked him about the welding on the blade ring, he went back by himself and inspected the blade ring and ascertained that he had caused the pin holes. He thereafter called Wise over to his work station and said that he had gone back and inspected the job and that he had done the pin holes. Wise replied, "I know. Me and Mr. Booker had figured that already." Wise did not deny this in his testimony.

A little later, Wise came by and called Grant aside and gave him the warning slip and told him that Booker had told Wise to give it to Grant. Grant testified that Lynn Arnold had welded on the other side of the blade ring.

Grant explained that it was not unusual for one welding blade rings for the first time to get pin holes in the work, and that when using a CO2 gun a whiff of wind can cause a pin hole. Indeed, the day before he began work on the blade ring he asked Wise to show him how to weld on it since he had never welded on it before.

With respect to the wrong wire used by Arnold, there is no doubt that such involved a serious mistake. However, I find that the mistake was that of supervision in accordance with Respondent's own quality control guide and not that of Arnold. There is no evidence that Respondent felt the mistake was serious enough to warn the supervisors, leadmen, and quality control personnel involved, nor is there any evidence that welders had been advised that, contrary to the quality control manual guidelines, they are expected to match the wire to the label on the box. While a disinterested observer may not see anything wrong with requiring a welder to make certain that the wire is the same as that on the box label, it must be remembered that the welders work with these materials day in and day out. Moreover, Arnold testified that he followed his usual procedure—a procedure which had never caused a problem previously. In view of all the circumstances, I conclude that Respondent saw the event as a convenient pretext to continue to build its case against Arnold, and that in the absence of his union activities and testimony in February it would not have issued the warning to him.

With respect to the bad welding on the blade ring, the evidence reveals Respondent's animus against Arnold (for which Grant suffered). Thus, even though on Friday, May 30, Grant had admitted that he did the bad welding which had caused the pin holes, Respondent nevertheless delivered the predated warning to Arnold the following Monday. Grant, I find, was warned only to justify the warning given to Arnold.

I shall order that these warnings to Arnold and Grant be expunged.

g. July 22 written warning to Sanders

By hearing amendment (G.C. Exh. 2) to the first (March 14) complaint, General Counsel added paragraph 8A alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act by warning Sanders on July 22 both in writing and verbally (orally).

Sanders testified that on Friday, July 18, while he was working in bay 10, Supervisor "Red" Mitchell of bay 13 came and asked if he would work overtime the following evening in bay 13. Sanders replied that he would. The following evening, under the instructions and supervision of Leadman Porterfield, Sanders welded a closing seam on a tank (welding a head to the tank).

A brief description here can not disclose the work problems Porterfield and Sanders, along with a fitter and the welder's helper, experienced that evening. Porterfield had to switch Sanders from job to job at different times. These were several interruptions. Finally, on the closing seam for which Sanders received his warning, a comedy of errors, none caused by Sanders, occurred.[57] Thus, after Sanders had welded about half the seam his weld ground, which was welded to the outside of the tank by the welder on the previous shift, broke off, and his machine stopped. The helper climbed up a ladder to the manway and hollered in to Sanders that the ground had broken. After someone rewelded the ground, Sanders welded about 3 more feet when Porterfield climbed up to the manway entry and informed Sanders that the flux belt on the outside of the tank was broken. Sanders stopped welding again, and waited inside the tank about a half hour while it was being fixed. On being signaled, by their beating on the tank, that it was ready, Sanders then welded about another foot, and had to stop again when Porterfield climbed back up the tank to the manway opening and told him that the helper forgot to put flux on the belt, which had set the belt on fire and burned a hole in the belt. After this was repaired, Sanders was finally able to finish the job. Sanders testified that such starts and stops are easily visible in the weld. Although the foregoing nightmare of events was exasperating and disconcerting, Sanders testified that the biggest problem was the fact that there was a misalignment of 1/4 inch by virtue of a head which was too large. In the terminology of Quality Control Manager Walsworth, there was an offset. Walsworth testified that there is an offset on every railcar tank and every head because the head has a 1/8-inch (2/16-inch) to 3/16-inch greater thickness than the tank shell it is joined to. Thus, Walsworth testified that even on a perfect joinder there is an offset (an extension of one metal plate above the other). In addition to the offset, there may be some misalignment. Walsworth testified that the combination a fitter does is acceptable so long as it is within the specified tolerance. The tolerance for bay 13 is not defined in the record.[58]

The fitter told Sanders that he had mismeasured the head and was having a lot of trouble with it (the offset/misalignment) and might have to cut if off and put on another head.[59] Sanders' testified that supervisory Leadman Porterfield was well aware of the misalignment problem.

Quality control personnel, in X-raying the closing seam, found defective welds in each of the 26 pictures taken of the circumference of the closing seam, and for these defects Greene issued Sanders a warning (G.C. Exh. 13) on Tuesday, July 22, in the presence of General Foreman Sepulvado and Foreman G. W. McKaskle.[60] Although the warning itself specified 25 pictures as disclosing defects, Walsworth testified that the correct number was 26 out of 26. Greene explained that it takes 26 photos, 18 inches in length, to photograph the circumference of a closing seam on a tank, and that there is some overlap in each picture.

When giving Sanders the warning, Greene testified that he told Sanders he had to "go on record" with him regarding the defects because of their severity and the extensive rework involved. Greene testified that on the preceding order, with 50 tanks, the average defect was only one per closing seam, with a high of five defects.

Sanders testified that Greene asked him what had happened on the job, and Sanders explained all the details (summarized above). He also explained that the large misalignment had caused the weld to roll, and that Sanders had to increase the voltage to compensate for the roll in order to spread the weld a little wider. In short, Sanders told Greene that a 20-minute job had been extended to 2 hours because of all the problems.

[57] Sanders testified that he was working on the inside of a 50–60-foot-long tank, at one end and some 25 feet from the manway exit. It was dark, smokey from the welding, and so hot inside the tank that a yellow crayon in his pocket melted. At one point someone, apparently an insensitive "practical joker," beat on the tank with a hammer—with predictable effect upon Sanders who was inside what then became a large steel drum.

[58] Sanders testified that the fitter told him they did not fit a head on a tank in bay 13 where the difference was more than one-fourth inch. He further testified that in bay 10, where he had been since about February 12, quality control rejects any difference greater than one-eighth inch.

[59] Indeed, Sanders stated that in fact some others were cut and redone.

[60] Porterfield was conspicuously absent. McKaskle did not testify. Thus, Sanders' testimony is undisputed that when he was helping to distribute the May 20 handbill (G.C. Exh. 12) he handed one to McKaskle.

After checking with Sepulvado, Greene said that the tanks in Bay 13 were different from the ones in bay 10, and that the ground is the responsibility of the welder. Sanders testified that the latter is true if the one doing the welding attached the ground.

To Sanders' knowledge (and no evidence to the contrary was presented), neither the helper who failed to put flux on the flux belt, nor the fitter who improperly aligned the head and tank, nor the welder who improperly tacked the ground to the outside of the tank received warnings for their mistakes.

The meeting ended with Greene telling Sepulvado to give Sanders the warning. After receiving the warning, Sanders left.[61]

Clearly, Respondent is entitled to decide what work is acceptable and what must be rejected, and it may discipline employees for defective work so long as such discipline has not been motivated by statutorily protected conduct. Even then, Respondent may do so if it proves that it would have issued the warning in the absence of such protected activity. Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

It is significant that only Sanders[62] was warned for the events involving the closing seam. Of even more significance is the fact that Leadman Porterfield (who apparently, so far as the record shows, received no reprimand himself) was with the job, and the welder's unidentified helper, every step of the way. Porterfield knew the problems.

In short, I find and conclude that Respondent seized upon the defective welding as an excuse and pretext to add one more warning to Sanders' record, and that it would not have issued the warning absent Sanders' protected activities.[63] Accordingly, I find that the July 22 warning violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act,[64] and that Respondent should be ordered to rescind same and notify Sanders personally that it has been expunged from his personnel records.

4. Crowder's March 12 written warning and suspension

Willie D. Crowder, who also testified in the February hearing as one of General Counsel's witnesses, has been employed by Respondent for over 12 years. He has been classified as a first-class hand code welder and also as an automatic machine welder for about 11 years.

On March 12, Crowder received a written warning (G.C. Exh. 17) for "Failure to follow instructions" in violation of rule 19. More specifically, the warning issued allegedly because the grounding nut was loose on Crowder's welding cable. When Crowder declined to accept the warning notice, he was suspended.

Vice President Bradshaw testified that Respondent had an ongoing program, for quality control and safety reasons, to ensure that the welding machines were properly grounded. He testified that if a grounding were not properly tightened, the grounding lead could heat up and cause substandard welding or possibly a severe shock. He initiated the construction of a new type of welding ground as part of this program. Photographs of the welding grounds are in evidence as Respondent's Exhibits 19 and 20. He further testified that since about early June 1979 Respondent has had numerous meetings and other communications with supervisors and employees in which they have been instructed regarding the importance of keeping the grounds tight.

Bay 11 Foreman Delmo Cason testified that he left his office around 1 p.m., follwing the lunch period with the intention of going to the back of the bay. Crowder's welding position was directly in front of Cason as the latter left his office. Cason observed that the tank Crowder was working on was rolling (a normal procedure on some of the jobs) and he observed that the ground was "flopping around." Therefore, Cason testified that he walked over to make sure and found that the ground was "very loose." He then reported the matter to Claude Veatch, general foreman of bays 11 and 12, and the two returned to Crowder's work station and again inspected the ground. Veatch agreed that it was loose, and called Crowder down and had him tighten the ground with a crescent wrench. Confirming the testimony Bradshaw had given, Cason testified that he was concerned about Crowder's loose ground because of the instructions to keep them tight and because the matter had gotten to the point where he was, "concerned about my job." Indeed, he testified in the Monday meeting with the bay employees that he had told them what was expected concerning tightening of the grounds, and that they should check the grounds every morning before they went to work, tighten them with a crescent wrench, and to recheck them three or four times a day. He further testified, "And I told them also that was the last time we was going to tell them about the grounds. The management of the company was through talking about grounds. We would have to do something about it."

Crowder testified that after taking his lunchbreak on March 12 he noticed, as he was about to resume work, that the grounding nut was loose on the tank. He therefore tightened the nut by twisting the cable in a clockwise fashion and also by tapping the nut with a wedge to make certain that he got it "snug and secure." He then ascended the tank and began welding wrap pads. About 20 minutes before 1 p.m., he observed that Cason came straight to the end of the tank where Crowder was working, grabbed the grounding cables and "jerked" them side to side several times until they were so loose they would swing freely. At the time, Crowder was welding a pass around the pads with the welding machine. About 20 to 30 minutes later Cason returned with Veatch and shook the cables again while showing them to Veatch. They both looked up at Crowder and then walked away. Moments later Crowder finished welding the pass, took a crescent wrench down the ladder and tightened the ground and returned to his job. Some 30 to 40 minutes later Cason summoned Crowder to the office to see Veatch.

[61] Just before the end of the meeting, Greene accused Sanders of having a "real bad" welding record in bay 10. Sanders responded that was the first he had heard of it.

[62] Who had acceded to a request for help in bay 13, and who consented to Porterfield's personal request to stay and weld rather than leave after all the confusion and after someone hammered on the tank with Sanders inside.

[63] Greene's closing remark to Sanders, that the latter had bad welding in bay 10 (a new allegation to Sanders) has all the characteristics of a cat licking his lips, while taunting the trapped mouse, in anticipation of having the mouse as its dinner course very soon.

[64] As alleged in par. 8A of the August 4 hearing amendment (G.C. Exh. 2) to the first (March 14) complaint.

In the office, Veatch said that the employees had been reminded to keep the ground cables tight and then handed Crowder a warning slip. Crowder made no effort to reach for it and said that no one had told him he would get a warning because the ground nut was not tight. Veatch stated that Crowder had to do what he was told, and again handed the slip toward Crowder who again made no effort to accept it. At that point Veatch said that, "Well, you can accept it or refuse it." Crowder asked what will happen if he refused it and Veatch replied that he would write "a letter" about it. Crowder told him to go ahead and write the letter. Veatch responded, "Don't worry. Don't worry Crowder, I'll do my job." Crowder replied for him to go ahead and do his job, saying, "Thank you, I appreciate it." Crowder then returned to his work station and resumed welding.

In his own testimony, Cason admitted that he shook Crowder's ground cables, but denied that he loosened Crowder's ground. He further testified, on cross-examination, that, "We were concerned with grounding at the time. I was checking anything that was suspicious of having a loose ground." However, he stated that he was not particularly going to check Crowder's ground but just happened to see that it was loose. Nevertheless, he testified that he did not check any other grounds in the bay that day, although he had done so on Monday of that week.

Veatch denied that he told Crowder he did not have to accept the warning even though a report would be written about the matter. He assertedly told Crowder that while he could not make him take the warning slip, if he refused to do so he would have no other choice but to write a report on the situation which would be made a permanent record in his personnel file. When Crowder still refused, Veatch told him to return to work. After Crowder returned to work, Veatch contacted Superintendent Greene, outlined the events, and recommended that he be permitted to send Crowder home for refusing to take the warning notice. Greene said not to do so but to call Crowder back into his office again and if he still refused to take the warning then send him home.

It is undisputed that Cason was sent to summon Crowder again to the office. Veatch testified that in the second meeting he told Crowder that they needed him to take the warning slip to acknowledge the fact "that you have made a mistake, and that you knew that you shouldn't have done it and take the warning slip and let it be a lesson to you and a reminder not to continue that." Crowder reiterated his position that he was not taking the warning slip, and that Veatch could do whatever he wanted with it. Veatch then testified that he told Crowder to punch out and go home and that they would be in touch with him later. He testified that Crowder was sent home in order to maintain a measure of discipline. Following such testimony, Veatch was specifically asked if he had told Crowder in the second meeting to take the second warning so as to acknowledge that he had made a mistake. Veatch answered in the affirmative and stated that Crowder admitted that his ground was loose and that he had gotten his crescent wrench, descended from the tank, and tightened it. Veatch testified that he had given written warnings to other employees for failing to ground their machines properly, and he identified Respondent's Exhibits 22 and 23 as warnings he had given to Memphis Evans and Leon Bell for having their grounds loose. The warnings are dated August 13 and April 21, respectively, after the event in issue here.

Concerning the second meeting, Crowder testified that it was very short and that neither he nor Veatch took time to sit. Veatch stated, "Crowder, it seems to me you got a bad attitude." Crowder asked him how he could arrive at that conclusion since they had talked only once. Veatch told him, "Well, anyway, you punch out and go to the house and don't you come back until I call you." Crowder testified that he then left, put up his tools, and went home. In neither meeting, Crowder testified, were voices raised, and both parties spoke in a regular, low tone of voice.

Crowder testified that when he went to pick up his paycheck 2 days later, on Friday, March 14, Cason told him that he had been trying to call him, and that Employee Relations Manager Hillman Deaton wanted to talk with him. Crowder then went to Deaton's office where Deaton asked him for his version of what had happened. Crowder testified that he told Deaton everything in its entirety, including how Cason had swung the grounding cable and how "they got the warning slip plotted up on me." Deaton stated that the warning slip was not an admission of guilt, but simply something to show that he had been warned. Deaton advised him to take the warning slip, unless he thought it was absolutely against his will in which case he would not have to. He repeated acceptance of the warning did not mean a whole lot, and did not constitute an admission of guilt. He told Crowder to report to work on Monday morning and that he, Deaton, would set up a meeting in Superintendent Greene's office to have everyone present and work the matter out. Crowder expressed the thought that he did not know whether that would do any good because it would be their word against his. Deaton said, "Well, no, it's their word against ours." Crowder said he knew why they were "messing" with him, that it was because he had testified in the hearing on February 4 against the Company. Deaton replied, "No, it shouldn't be that way. It shouldn't have anything to do with it."

Deaton testified that when the warning slip with Crowder's paycheck came to him he attempted to investigate the matter. The following day, Thursday, March 13, he telephoned Crowder's home four times without success, and was not able to speak with Crowder until he came in Friday to pick up his paycheck. He explained to Crowder that the warning was not an admission of guilt, and that Crowder had the employee grievance procedure as a recourse. Crowder then readily accepted the warning and said he wanted to proceed with his recourse.

Deaton testified that at the meeting the following Monday, March 17, attended by Vice President Bradshaw, Superintendent Greene, Veatch, Crowder, and himself, Crowder expressed his position that the warning should not have issued. However, Deaton testified that "the letter of warning stood." He further testified that in the process of the discussion, Crowder indicated that he wanted to be transferred from bay 11. After the meeting, Respondent's officials discussed the matter and decided to transfer him to bay 13. Under cross-examination by General Counsel, Deaton conceded that there is no specific requirement that an employee accept a warning. However, he said, "It is a routine matter in view of the grievance procedure." He said that Respondent has not had any experience with employees refusing to accept a warning.

Deaton testified that employees had been informed of the grievance procedure, that it is a matter of company policy in writing and that he did not know whether it had been posted.

Crowder testified that at the Monday meeting, March 17, Cason was not present. Deaton started the meeting by telling the others that Crowder was there to tell his side of the story. Crowder testified that he told them everything in its entirety including the fact Veatch told him he could accept or refuse the warning, and that if he refused "a letter" would be written up on the matter. After Crowder recited all the events, Deaton turned to Veatch and asked if that was the way it had happened. Veatch replied in the affirmative. Crowder was asked if he had anything else to say, and he told them how he had performed in bay 11. Thus, he told how he had been transferred to the bay in January prior to the February hearing, and that in order to help Respondent succeed in a welding project Vice President Bradshaw had conceived, he, Crowder, had carried flux and wire by hand and on his shoulder in order to expedite the job while other welders waited for assistance. "Then, I get a warning slip for some pennyante reason like grounds not being tight. And I told Mr. Greene, I told them all in the meeting, I said, 'You could have checked all over the job that day and you would have found countless grounds loose with nuts not tight.'" At that point Greene interrupted and said, "No, we can't say that. I know for a fact that Cason checked every ground in Bay 11, and yours was the only one that he found loose." Greene also added that Crowder was guilty of insubordination when he refused to accept the warning slip Veatch had handed him. Bradshaw said that it was very important to have the grounds tight. At that point Crowder requested that he be transferred from bay 11. They told him that the matter would be considered later, and Crowder returned to work. Later that morning he learned that his transfer request had been granted.

When asked that if he were concerned about his job as he had testified, and after having found one ground loose, why did he not then check other grounds to make double certain, Cason testified that he had checked on other grounds on days before and after this and he really did not have time to do more checking that day since it was approaching 1 or 2 p.m., the shift changes at 3:30 p.m. and supervisors come in around 2:45 p.m. Cason testified that the lunch period ended at 12 noon and that he had done paperwork in his office after that for some 45 minutes to an hour. He testified that while there was still time to check grounds if he had done that specifically, he would have had to stop his other supervisory activities.

Fitter's helper Paul Jamison, called by General Counsel, worked in bay 11. On the day Crowder received his warning for a loose ground, Jamison, who was working on the next tank from Crowder, observed Cason jerk on Crowder's grounding cables. Later that dey, Cason told fitter Randy White, whom Jamison was helping, to make sure he tightened up his ground because he had just given another man a warning for it. Jamison testified that when Cason came by he did not check Jamison's ground and if he had done so he would have found that it was loose and probably would have been moved with a flick of the wrist. Jamison testified that the ground nut is supposed to be tight enough so that it will not wiggle. Although Jamison testified that he had been in the process of moving his equipment and had not had the opportunity to tighten the ground, he further explained that Cason would not have known that. After Cason left, White handed Jamison the crescent wrench and he tightened the ground and tacked it down.

Charles L. Meshell, who has been a first-class welder for 4 years, recalled the day that Crowder was sent home from work in bay 11 because of a loose ground. On that day, before Crowder was sent home, no supervisor had spoken to Meshell about his ground cable. Afterwards, Leadman Herschel Finley came and told him to make sure his ground was welded to the tank. Meshell checked the ground and discovered that it was so loose that the nut could be turned with his fingers. At no time, before or after the conversation, did Finley check Meshell's ground. Later that same afternoon, Cason came by and told him the same thing. Cason did not check the ground in any way.

Meshell testified that in the recent weeks before the hearing, some employees were tacking their grounds to the tank and some were not and that supervisors knew this. Moreover, when Meshell entered bay 11, Foreman Britain told him that the ground cable should not be just thrown inside the tank, that they should be welded to the tank.[65]

On consideration of the foregoing, and the entire record, I find that Cason, contrary to his denial, deliberately jerked and pulled on Crowder's ground cable until he had loosened it, and all for the purpose of creating a basis to issue him a warning. Crowder testified in a convincing fashion, as did Jamison and Meshell, and I credit them. In contrast, I was not favorably impressed by the fashion in which Respondent's witnesses testified.

[65] In its brief, Respondent argues that with respect to cables thrown into tanks, it no doubt involved tanks which were stationary and would not roll; that it is possible to get a proper ground when the tank is stationary by throwing the ground into the tank, and that Crowder was welding on a tank which rolls.

I also note from Cason's own testimony that he was so concerned about the grounding problem as to be worried about his own job security, yet after he allegedly found Crowder's ground loose, he did not take the time to check any others.[66] Moreover, even if Cason did not jerk the ground until it was loose, he personally engaged in disparity of treatment later that day involving employees White and Jamison, as did Leadman Finley regarding Meshell's ground. Under either interpretation of the facts, Respondent proceeded unlawfully against Crowder in issuing a warning to him.

With respect to Crowder's 2-day suspension, I again credit his testimony. Accordingly, I find that Veatch told him he could accept the warning or not,[67] and, in the second meeting, admittedly told Crowder that by accepting the warning he would be admitting his error. Crowder, believing himself in the right, can hardly be faulted for declining to admit what he considered a falsehood. Deaton, Greene, and Veatch admitted there is no rule requiring employees to accept warnings, yet Crowder was suspended for not accepting the warning. I credit Crowder that Deaton told him, in their meeting of Friday, March 14, that Deaton said he would not advise Crowder to come to work until after the March 17 meeting if Crowder persisted in refusing to accept the warning. I do not credit Deaton's denial.

In view of the foregoing, and the entire record, I find that the March 12 warning was violative of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

As the March 12 warning was tainted, I find that Crowder's refusal to accept it was protected. Therefore, by suspending Crowder for engaging in a protected refusal, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act. I do not accept Respondent's argument stated in fn. 6 at p. 62 of its brief that Crowder should not receive backpay for the full 2 days he was not at home when Deaton called.[68] Veatch did not instruct Crowder to remain by the telephone or tell him that he would be paid during his suspension. Indeed, Crowder testified that he possibly could have waited a week, or a month or more before being called and he could not stay at home just waiting.

Respondent, I find, should be ordered to expunge the warning, so inform Crowder, and pay him backpay for his suspension of 2 days.

5. Grant's written warnings of April 14 and May 30

a. April 14

Jimmy R. Grant testified that he began working for Respondent on September 14, 1977, that nearly all of his time has been in bay 8, and that he has been classified by Respondent as a first-class welder since March 14.

International Representative Al Washington, Jr., testified, without contradiction, that about April 5 he mailed a certified letter addressed jointly to William E. Adams, president of Respondent, and to Region 15 of the Board, on union stationery and signed by him. Some 48 employees signed their names to the letter,[69] with their names extending onto a second page above the appellation "Boilermakers In-Plant Organizing Committee." The letter reads:

> As you are aware, many of your employees have authorized the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers to represent them for the purpose of collective bargaining and other mutual aid and protection.
> Therefore, this union has formed an in-plant organizing committee. The following named employees of Riley-Beaird, Inc. have authorized us to inform you that they constitute the organizing committee in the Riley-Beaird Plant.
> As additional employees join this committee, their names will be supplied to you in the near future. They will be engaging in only peaceful and protected activity. We request that you and all officers and agents of Riley-Beaird respect their rights protected by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

Washington's testimony is undisputed that he picked up the signed return receipt at the post office on April 7. The copy in evidence (G.C. Exh. 12) also reflects the National Labor Relations Board's Region 15's date stamp of (Monday) April 7.[70] Grant testified that his name appears on page 2, fifth name down, right hand side (J. R. Grant).[71]

One week later, Foreman J. C. Wise summoned Grant to the office of General Foreman Frank Booker of bay 8. In the presence of Booker, Wise sat down and signed his name to a pink warning slip and said, "You know what this is for don't you?" When Grant inquired for what, Wise said, "I told you all over and over about washing up early." Grant, on not being given any opportunity to discuss the matter, took the warning (G.C. Exh. 15)[72] and left the office.

At the hearing, Grant explained that on the previous Friday, April 11, at or about 3:25 p.m. he went to the restroom. On leaving the restroom, he washed his hands and with a paper towel dried his face. At that time the horn blew ending the shift. Also with him washing in a similar fashion was Johnny Ray Booker. As Grant was washing his face, he looked and saw Night Supervisor Manuel Law about 50 to 75 feet away pointing in his direction. Employee Booker was standing some 3 feet from [66] As the warnings to Evans and Bell issued in April and August after Crowder's warning and after the charge was filed on Crowder's warning (G.C. Exh. 1(h); Case 15-CA-7621-2), I find their persuasive character to be small indeed.

[67] As General Foreman Booker told Arnold regarding his warning of April 11.

[68] Respondent's argument borders on being frivolous.

[69] Although the letter is dated March 10, Washington explained the passage of time before mailing on the basis the signatures were being secured.

[70] Presumably this copy was furnished by General Counsel.

[71] Grant testified that the Union handbilled at Respondent's plant gate with copies of the letter about mid-March. In this Grant was in error as the evidence clearly shows that such handbilling did not occur until around May 20.

[72] Dated (Friday) April 11, the written warning, asserting violations of rules 19 and 22, states, "Refusing to follow instructions. Washing up early."

Grant. At the time, Law was speaking with General Foreman Booker while pointing in the direction of Grant. At that time the horn blew and Grant went home.

Grant also testified that Foreman Wise joined Law and Booker during the pointing demonstration. They also had clear visibility of Johnny Ray Booker who also works in bay 8. Grant testified that Johnny Ray Booker often washes up early anywhere from 3:10 to 3:25 p.m. everyday, and that General Foreman Booker had been in the vicinity when he has been doing so. Also, Grant has observed that Foreman Wise would see Johnny Ray Booker washing up early. To Grant's knowledge, Johnny Ray Booker never received any warnings for washing up early.

In addition to Johnny Ray Booker who washes up early practically daily, with obvious supervisory knowledge, Grant testified that employees Ray Whiddon, Ramsey (last name not identified), and R. L. Southern have been permitted by Supervisors Wise, Emerson, and Booker to pack up early in order to leave. Grant testified that all three of them received warnings, about 2 weeks prior to the hearing, but that they had been repeating their conduct since then without any further warning so far as Grant was aware.

On cross-examination, Grant testified that when he went into the restroom Johnny Ray Booker already was there washing his hands, and when Grant came out of the restroom to wash his own hands, Johnny Ray Booker was standing at the water fountain which is right next to the wash basin.

When asked how he knew that Whiddon, Ramsey, and Southern had washed up early, Grant testified that he began observing after he had received his own warning notice in order to ascertain whether any others were getting warnings. Between mid-April and some 2 to 3 weeks before his testimony, Grant observed Johnny Ray Booker washing up between 3:10 and 3:25 p.m. everyday. Not until 2 to 3 weeks before the hearing did the three, Whiddon, Ramsey, and Booker receive a warning.

Grant testified that he has never washed up early nor packed up early, and that Ramsey, Southern, and Johnny Ray Booker are the only ones he has seen pack up early or wash up early and that they do it most of the time. On redirect, Grant named Ray Whiddon, Ramsey, and R. L. Southern as washing up early consistently before they received a warning, and that they continue to wash up early.

Grant testified that he was making a distinction between washing his hands after leaving the restroom and washing up early. He further testified that he did not use the restroom everyday at 3:20 p.m. or so, whereas Ray Whiddon, Ramsey, and Southern were doing so everyday at that time. Grant testified that General Foreman Booker told employees at the safety meeting not to wash up early or use the restroom at the same time everyday, and Grant testified that this was the very first afternoon he had gone to the restroom at that time. General Foreman Booker was speaking and referring to the end of the shift and just before lunchtime.

In his testimony, Foreman Law confirmed that on April 11 General Foreman Booker, Foreman Wise, and he were walking down the bay considering the work to be done on the second shift. Law noticed Grant washing up and, ribbing Supervisor Booker because he is always talking about men washing up, Law pointed to Grant and said, "Look, you got a man washing up early." At that time Grant looked at them but finished washing. Law denied that anyone was washing at the same time as Grant and specifically denied that J. R. Booker was washing at the same time. On cross-examination, Law conceded that employees are permitted to wash up after leaving the restroom, but not their arms and face as Grant was doing.

Foreman J. C. Wise corroborated the version of Law and testified that when he issued the warning slip to Grant the following Monday morning for washing up early on Friday, April 11, Grant told him that he knew he was going to get a warning. Grant said he had dropped his wife off at work at Western Electric and made the comment to her that he knew he was going to get a warning because he got caught washing up early.[73]

Wise also testified that no one else was washing up at the same time as Grant, and specifically J. R. Booker was not. Wise explained that when he said that Grant was washing up, he meant that Grant was washing his hands, arms, face, and had soap up to his elbows. Wise said that he made the recommendation for the warning and that General Foreman Frank Booker made the decision that one should issue. Wise testified that at the time he gave the warning slip to Grant he had no knowledge that Grant was involved in any union activity.

On cross-examination, Wise conceded that he thought J. R. Booker was standing by the water fountain near the washup station. On further cross-examination, he admitted that he did see J. R. Booker there, getting a drink of water at the same time that the supervisors observed Grant washing-up. Wise admitted that J. R. Booker did not receive a warning for being at the water fountain. He stated that nothing was said to Grant on April 11 because as soon as the whistle blew Grant left.

General Foreman Frank Booker testified that when he observed Grant at the washbasin he appeared to be "taking a bath." Booker identified Respondent's Exhibits 33 and 34 as written warnings given to employees Ray Whiddon and R. L. Southern for washing up early before lunch. Both warnings are dated July 9 and refer to violations of rule no. 19 "Washing up early before noon." They are signed by J. F. Booker, Supervisor. General Foreman Booker testified that he was responsible for issuing the warnings to Whiddon and Southern. When asked why he issued the warnings to them, he testified that he "repeatedly" told them no washing up before break, noon, or before quitting time. He denied seeing any other employee washing up early since the warning had been issued to Grant. He further denied knowledge that Grant was engaged in any activity for the Union at the time the warning was issued to him.[74]

[73] During his own cross-examination, Grant testified that he normally takes his wife to work, and he denied that he engaged in any conversation with Wise when the latter gave him the warning for washing up early.

[74] As with Grant, Booker also was confused about the date General Counsel's Exhibit 12 was distributed as a handbill, for Booker testified

Continued

Booker testified that he does not care who gets a drink of water when he needs one, and that there certainly is a difference between getting a drink of water at the water fountain and washing up early. He further testified that he would not issue a warning to someone obtaining a drink of water at the water fountain shortly before the end of the shift or before lunch. Booker testified that he never saw Wooden or Ramsey washing up early. On cross-examination he also testified that he has never stopped anyone from washing their hands after going to the restroom.

Conclusion

General Counsel alleges in paragraph 10 of the third (June 25) complaint that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by issuing the April 11 warning to Grant. I conclude that General Counsel has established a prima facie case, and that Respondent has not shown that it would have issued the warning notwithstanding Grant's union activities. I find that Grant made a believable witness, and I credit him. I find that Respondent had knowledge of Grant's union activities by virtue of the fact that Respondent received the Union's letter on April 7, 4 days before Grant was observed washing up after leaving the restroom, and I consider this timing to be of particular significance.

While I credit Wise's uncontradicted testimony that Grant made the statement that he told his wife that he knew he was going to get a warning, I find that such remark is subject to two equally plausible explanations. One would be that which Respondent attributes to it, that is, that Wise knew he was guilty of a violation of company rules. The second and equally plausible explanation is that Grant knew he was going to be discriminated against because he had signed his name to the letter which had been sent by the Union a few days earlier.

No evidence was presented by Respondent that it had ever issued a warning for washing up early prior to the one issued Grant. Although an argument can be made that this allegation, in isolation, might be dismissable, it is clear that I must consider the entire case.

Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by issuing the April 11 warning to Grant, and I shall order it to expunge the warning and notify Grant that it has done so.

b. May 30

Grant's May 30 written warning (G.C. Exh. 16) is for "unsatisfactory work" in violation of rule 41. The warning, dated May 30, 1980, is signed by General Foreman J. F. Booker. The factual circumstances (pin holes in a blade ring) already have been set forth above in section III,C,3(f)(4) dealing with a similar warning to Arnold (and his suspension).

Wise admitted that Grant has been a good welder for him, and I credit Grant's testimony that he reexamined the blade rings and then called Wise over to his work station and admitted to him that he had caused the pin holes.[75] Later that afternoon Wise served the warning notice on him.

Booker admitted that at the time of the warning he was aware of Grant's union activities because he had seen Grant's name on the Union's letter, copies of which had been distributed at the plant gate, but that such fact made no difference. He further testified that Grant was experienced in using a CO2 welding gun, and that he, Booker, has issued warnings to several other employees for poor workmanship.[76]

General Counsel argues that even though Grant admitted doing faulty welding, his warning nevertheless should be found violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act on the basis that the welding was only a pretext seized on to mask the real motive—to punish Grant for signing and assisting in distributing the letter handbill a week earlier.[77] General Counsel also points to the fact that Wise admitted Grant had just begun welding on blade rings during the week in which he received the warning, that he was just learning the job, and that welding blade rings is different from welding other products. Respondent did not depart from normal procedure, as General Counsel argues, when the blade ring was not allowed to be repaired in the "pick up" section because Quality Control Inspector Ross, called as a witness by General Counsel, testified that it is his job to reject work as bad as that and return it to the welder.

Finally, General Counsel refers to the fact that Greene testified that a welder who admits he has caused "a bunch of pin holes" and wants to do something about it would not receive a warning.[78]

The argument also could be made that Respondent issued the warning to Grant, notwithstanding the policy described by Greene, in order to add support to the warning issued Arnold.

that it was passed out at the gate on March 10, the date shown on the letter. Later in the day it was handbilled, he found copies of it lying on his desk where people had brought them in and left them on his desk. He denied having a copy on his desk the day the written warning was issued to Grant for washing up early. I note that April 11 was 4 days after Respondent received G. C. Exh. 12.

[75] I credit Grant's version that he, on his own, went to the back of the bay and rechecked the blade ring, and I do not accept Wise's testimony suggesting that he and Grant went together.

[76] Booker's testimony regarding previous warnings for poor workmanship (which Greene also identifies as rule 41) is supported by Resp. Exh. 44. That exhibit reflects that from 1976 through 1979, bay 8 issued written warnings for violating rule 41 as follows: 1976—4; 1977—0; 1978—2; and 1979—7.

[77] Contrary to this statement in General Counsel's brief, on redirect examination Grant testified that, although he observed the handbilling, he did not personally assist. Whether he watched from a distance, or stood next to those making the distribution, is not established in the record.

[78] While Greene's answer is not entirely definitive, he seems to be saying that Respondent would not issue a formal warning (written or verbal) to an employee who not only admits his mistake but also displays a good attitude (i.e., eager to do a good job). Grant fits that criteria. While he did not ask for help then (he had earlier asked Wise to show him how to weld blade rings), he admitted his mistake and Wise, in his own testimony, apparently considered Grant a willing worker as well as a good one. Accordingly, in issuing the warning to Grant (only his second, and both are in controversy in this case), Respondent departed from its own policy as described by Superintendent Greene.

Conclusion

Under all the circumstances, including, among others, the animus shown by the findings and conclusions reported at 253 NLRB 660 (1980), and the departure from Greene's policy, I am constrained to find that Respondent indeed was substantially motivated to issue the May 30 warning to Grant because of the fact he signed the Union's letter-handbill which, as Arnold testified, was distributed about May 20.

Under Wright Line, supra, Respondent was required to demonstrate that it would have issued the warning notwithstanding Grant's protected activities. Here again, I am persuaded that Respondent would not have done so absent Grant's name appearing on the Union's letter-handbill. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by issuing the May 30 warning to Grant,[79] and that it should be ordered to expunge such warning and inform him personally (i.e., in addition to the notice to be posted) that it has done so.

6. Discrimination against Broden

a. Warning of April 23

Willie Broden, a class "A" mechanic since December 19, 1979, has worked for Respondent over 28 years (since March 1952). He reports to Mechanical-Maintenance Supervisor W. T. Palmer. Broden prefers to work the night shift (3:30 p.m. to midnight),[80] and for most of his employment prior to June 16 he did so. However, in mid-May, as Broden was preparing to leave on vacation, Palmer informed him he (Broden) was being assigned to the day shift (7 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.) effective upon his June 16 return from vacation.

The times Broden worked days in the past, the longest stretch being 3 to 4 months, occurred when he was not needed on the night shift because of a shortage of work there.

On Monday, April 28, Broden received a written warning from Supervisor Palmer.[81] Dated April 25, the warning (G.C. Exh. 21) is for "Improper Assembly of Aronson Turning Rools, causing heavy damage to unit." Palmer testified that he asked Broden to reassemble a set of power rolls which had been leaking oil. A seal had just arrived, and the power rolls already had been disassembled to replace the seal before Broden was assigned the task of reassembly. Although Broden previously had never reassembled this particular type of equipment, Palmer testified that Broden said he could do the job. Palmer stated that in reassembling the equipment, Broden failed to preset the gearbox bearings correctly, and this damaged the worm and worm gear so badly they had to be replaced.[82]

According to Palmer, the worm and worm gear were ordered immediately after this happened at an approximate cost of $1,500 to $1,600,[83] and they were thereafter installed by the maintenance people. When asked who, specifically, Palmer replied that Leadman Preston LaBorde "may have put it in." On cross-examination by union counsel, Palmer stated he could not swear that the new parts had in fact been installed, and then conceded that the rollers "could be" operating with the old worm gear. A moment later he stated, "I didn't say the leaderman put [it] in, I said he had the job done." Palmer further answered that he was not sure who did the actual work.[84]

Broden testified that on April 28, Palmer told him he had reassembled the rolls incorrectly, and that any class A mechanic should have known to preload the bearings. He then gave Broden the warning, and told him that the rolls were disassembled in the maintenance building and for him to reassemble them. Before Broden left, Palmer showed him the blueprint for the rolls. It was the first time Broden had even seen the blueprint for that kind of roll. He testified that bearings on the other rolls preload differently. The following night Palmer told Broden that he had checked the rolls. Palmer, apparently, was satisfied with the manner in which Broden had reassembled them. Broden was never thereafter told that the rolls were not working.

Broden testified that on April 21 he observed that the worm (or ring) gear was worn, but that he did not mention it to Palmer because the wear did not appear that significant. However, on receiving the warning and being told about excessive damage, Broden did point out to Palmer that the gear had been worn. Palmer's response, if any, is not described in the record. Broden further testified that in reassembling the rolls on April 28 after the warning, he noticed that the worm gear shaft was bent a little. He showed this to Palmer who apparently agreed that it was bent some. Nevertheless, Broden testified that he used these same parts, including the shaft, in reassembling the rolls the night of April 28. On cross-examination, Palmer testified that the rolls were put back into service performing the same work as before.[85]

[79] Such violation is established in any event by virtue of my finding that a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to issue the warning to Grant was the desire to add artificial support to Arnold's warning. That is, in order to avoid revoking Arnold's warning, it also warned Grant since both worked on the blade ring. Respondent's reasoning is logically defective, for Grant's admission absolved Arnold. That Respondent persisted in the warning to Arnold surely reflects the intensity of its animus against one of the handful of employees recognized by all as one of the strongest and most visible of the Union's supporters.

[80] Broden testified that he informed Palmer of his preference a long time ago and once, specifically, in 1977.

[81] Palmer testified that he consulted with Vice President Bradshaw before he issued the warning.

[82] Broden testified that the rolls sounded all right after he reassembled them on April 21, but that they began making a "popping" noise on April 24.

[83] Respondent did not offer or produce at the hearing the requisition form or invoice described by Palmer.

[84] Broden earlier had testified that after receiving the warning he again reassembled the rollers, and that he used the old parts. Called during the Union's August 1 case, Broden testified that the Friday before his testimony he had observed the new parts in the maintenance department in a box marked "Bay 12 rolls." On cross-examination, Broden conceded that although the new worm gear looked the same as the old one, he could not say it was the same one that had been ordered. On the other hand, I note that, although Broden and Palmer testified on August 7, the hearing was not closed until August 27. Yet Respondent offered no specific evidence to rebut Broden's testimony of seeing the new parts in a box. Accordingly, I find that as of August 1 the new parts had not been installed in the rollers and that such rollers were still operating with the old parts.

[85] Palmer initially said "limited" service, but on further questioning by union counsel it is clear that the service was not "limited."

It should be noted that the instant warning was Broden's first written warning in his 28 years of employment with Respondent. Moreover, although Palmer at one point testified he was sure that he had given Broden some verbal warnings during the more than 20 years he had supervised him, and that the last one would have been within the last 5 years, he had to concede that not one verbal warning was reflected in any of the personnel records of Broden which Respondent had brought to the hearing. The records extended back through 1972, and Palmer stated that he believed they were all the records he had.

Palmer testified that recently, he thought since the warning to Broden, he has issued warnings to employees Frank Rivers and B. J. Jones for similar carelessness in disassembling a machine. No copies of the warnings were offered in evidence, and the incidents for which Rivers and Jones were warned are not further described. (On the other hand, General Counsel offered no evidence that Broden had made mistakes in the past without being warned or that non-union employees had made similar errors with impunity.)

Although Broden testified that during the first part of 1980, prior to his warning, he attended several union meetings, there is no evidence Respondent was aware of Broden's sympathies—until Respondent received Union Representative Washington's letter on April 7. The letter contains Broden's signature on the second page as one of the Union's members of the in-plant organizing committee.

Broden testified without contradiction that, when he assisted in distributing the letter as a handbill at the plant gate on May 20, he spoke to Supervisors Tom Britain and Harvey Reynolds, and they observed him. He further testified that about late April or early May, some 2 or 3 weeks before the May 20 handbilling,[86] Night Superintendent G. W. McKaskle came to Broden in the electric shop and asked him how the Union was going.[87] Broden answered that he did not know, and further testified:

> And he went on to tell me then that Mr. Palmer told him to watch me around there and see if I was going around amongst the men talking any union talk to them.[88]
> At that time I ran my hands in my shirt pocket, pulled out some church tickets that I was trying to sell to help raise money to pay for the church that we are building.
> He said, "Willie, you see that?"
>
> I said, "Yes, sir."
> He said, "People don't know what's going on."

In his own testimony, Palmer did not mention the foregoing conversation.

Conclusion

General Counsel established that on April 7 Respondent became aware of Broden's membership in the Union's in-plant organizing committee; that barely 3 weeks later Broden received the first warning (written or verbal) in his 28-year career at Respondent's plant; and that although the warning was for "heavy damage to unit," no such damage was ever shown to Broden or the existence thereof demonstrated at the hearing.[89] Where the reason given is false, as I find, it is appropriate, in light of the timing and other circumstances of the entire record,[90] to infer, as I do, that Respondent actually was motivated to issue the warning because of Broden's announced membership in the Union's in-plant organizing committee. General Thermo, Inc., 250 NLRB 1260 (1980).

I further find that Respondent's Wright Line evidence falls short of persuading that it would have issued the warning notwithstanding Broden's union activities. In view of the falsity of the "heavy damage" reason, and Broden's unblemished record of 28 years, I find that the evidence is insufficient to establish that Respondent would have issued the warning in any event.

Accordingly, I find that Respondent, as alleged,[91] violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by issuing Broden the April 25 warning, and that it must be ordered to expunge such warning from his records and notify him personally that it has done so.

b. Broden transferred June 16

As earlier noted, effective June 16, Broden was transferred from the evening shift to the first, or day, shift.[92] Palmer testified that he transferred Broden to the day shift to pick up the slack created on routine preventative maintenance when several of the first-shift mechanics were required to spend much of their time on various new construction projects at the plant.

General Counsel argues that the transfer was made for the unlawful purpose of moving Broden from the evening shift, where he was not supervised, to the day shift where Respondent's supervisors could keep a close watch on Broden concerning his union activities.

[86] Broden testified that Union Representative Washington, Lynn Arnold, C. M. Sanders, and Willie Hall were among those handbilling.

[87] Par. 11A(b) of the July 1 "Amendments To Consolidated Complaint" alleges the interrogation as violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. I so find.

[88] Par. 11A(a) of the July 1 "Amendments" alleges that such conduct created the impression of surveillance of union activities in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. I so find.

[89] This is not to say that Respondent did not in fact order a replacement for the worm and worm gear. I do not credit Palmer, and I do not accept his testimony, that the parts would not have been ordered had it not been for Broden's mistake. I note that the worm gear already was worn and that the new parts had not been installed even as late as August 1 while the rolls had been operating on the old parts. In short, the "heavy damage" is a trumped up phrase, falsely describing what obviously amounted to very little damage, and so worded to provide an ostensibly legitimate basis for building a case against long-term employee Broden because he had aligned himself with the Union.

[90] I also note Respondent's general animus and the fact that its focus on Broden's union activities was important enough for McKaskle to interrogate him a few short days after the warning and unwittingly disclose Respondent's plans to surveil Broden's union activities.

[91] Par. 9 of the third (June 25) complaint.

[92] Pars. 9A, 13, and 15 of the July 23 "Second Amendments to Consolidated Complaint" allege the transfer to be in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

Palmer testified that the transfer was "considered to be temporary," and that within the last 2 to 4 years he has moved Broden to the day shift to help out in a similar situation.

Although the record gives rise to a strong suspicion that Broden's transfer was unlawfully motivated, I find that the evidence falls short of establishing it to be so. While I do not credit Palmer except where he is independently corroborated by credited witnesses, I note that Broden previously has worked on days. Moreover, there is no evidence that the transfer is really permanent or indefinite notwithstanding Palmer's testimony that the transfer, while not explicitly temporary, is "considered to be temporary." Accordingly, I shall recommend this portion of the case be dismissed.

7. Discrimination against Willie Hall, Jr.

a. Introduction

(1) Hall's employment record

Fired on April 3, 1980, for poor quality of work, Willie Hall, Jr., had been one of the most prominent supporters of the Union at Respondent's plant. As in the familiar nursery rhyme, everywhere the Union was, Hall would surely be. Within 2 months after testifying against Respondent at the February hearing,[93] Hall was fired.

Hired by Respondent in August 1972, Hall had been classified as a first-class welder for 5 years. Despite his journeyman classification, Hall's employment record bears many pock marks. Indeed, in its brief (Resp. Br. p. 59), Respondent states that, "Without question, Hall was the worst welder in the plant, and he had received no less than three written warnings prior to 1980 for poor welding." The prior warnings introduced in evidence are:

1. April 2, 1973—Bay 8—Violated rule 41: Unsatisfactory work. "Poor welding on horizontal seam job #190456, resulting in rework. I have discussed your poor work performance with you previously."[94]
2. June 18, 1975—Bay 8—Violated rule 41: Unsatisfactory work. "The weld you put on this unit (121014–01) the appearance is very bad, you being a 1st class welder. Will have to improve or further disciplinary action will be taken."
3. April 21, 1977—Bay 8—Violated rule 19: "Refusing to follow instructions."
4. June 30, 1977—Bay 11—Violated rule 19: "You had weld rods in your hip pocket instead of your rod pouch."
5. [95]July 14, 1977—Bay 11—Violated rule 19, 31, & 41: [No description.]
6. March 2, 1978—Bay 8—Violated rule 6: Bad Workmanship. "Bad welding, Hall you have been putting in bad welds for several days, you have been talked to about this type of work. You have to improve in order to stay a welder at this plant."

Hall's work performance from March 1978 to March 1980 apparently was acceptable or better,[96] for he did not receive his seventh warning (G.C. Exh. 18), an action in issue here,[97] until March 11, 1980:

7. March 11, 1980—Bay 11—Violated rule 41: "Unsatisfactory Welding on U fitg. s/o 161598-03 TK-15."

The March 11 warning and other final events in Hall's employment are treated below.

(2) Complaint allegations

All allegations concerning Hall are in the second (April 28, 1980) complaint. They consist of (a) reassigning Hall on February 6 to more onerous and less desirable work; (b) issuing Hall a written warning on March 11; (c) verbally warning Hall on March 15; (d) suspending Hall on March 31 for 3 working days; and (e) discharging Hall on April 3.

(3) Hall's arthritis

For nearly 7 months prior to his February 4 testimony, Hall had been welding pads in bay 11. It is undisputed that welding pads is less physically demanding than welding fittings.[98] Pads are simply reinforcing metal plates usually welded to the outside of a railroad tank car,[99] but fittings cover openings in the tank shell. Thus, fitting welds must withstand pressure, whereas some pad welds are not subjected to pressure. (It appears that some pads are subjected to pressure.)

Hall testified that he suffers from arthritis, and that the foremen in bay 8 and 11[100] were aware of that fact.[101]

[93] Administrative Law Judge Evans, affirmed by the Board, found in sec. II, A, of his Decision in Riley-Beaird, Inc., 253 NLRB 660 (1980), that Supervisor Tom Britain unlawfully interrogated Hall in September 1979. However, in ALJD, sec. II,D,1 and 3, Administrative Law Judge Evans did not credit Hall wherein he testified that certain high officials of Respondent displayed photographs of strike violence.

[94] There follows on the form this preprinted statement: "You are hereby notified that repetition of this offense, or others, will subject you to further disciplinary action. It is hoped immediate improvement will make further action unnecessary." On this warning to Hall, the foregoing statement is underlined.

[95] Warning no. 5 was the subject of an unfair labor practice charge filed July 20, 1977, on Hall's behalf by the UAW in Case 15–CA–6540. The Regional Director's dismissal was affirmed by the General Counsel on October 18, 1977, on the basis: "Under all the circumstances, including the fact that the welding job in question performed by Hall did fall apart at the seams thereby causing extensive damage, and that the warning was issued only after the Company viewed Hall's personnel file, the burden of establishing that Hall was warned for other lawful reasons could not be sustained." (G.C. Exhs. 20(c) and (d)). A contemporaneous charge in Case 15–CA–6571–2, alleging a transfer of Hall on June 6, 1977, in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3), was dismissed by the Regional Director with the UAW's appeal therefrom being denied by the General Counsel on October 19, 1977 (G.C. Exhs. 20(a) and (b)).

[96] As we shall see, Supervisor Britain told Hall in early 1980 that his welding was excellent.

[97] Par. 10 of the second (April 28, 1980) complaint.

[98] In addition to the testimony of Hall and other witnesses who so testified, Supervisor Claude Veatch also confirmed this fact.

[99] Some pads are small, and some are as long as a 60-foot railroad tank car.

[100] For bay 11, Hall specifically named Tom Britain, Delmo Cason, and Claude Veatch.

[101] Veatch denied such knowledge. I credit Hall.

Indeed, in June 1979, while he was assigned to bay 8, Hall was hospitalized for 8 days because of his arthritis, and in September 1979, after having transferred to bay 11, Hall spent 14 days in the hospital. He testified without contradiction that his safety record at the company reflects these facts.

In addition, Hall testified that he receives gold shots for treatment of his arthritis. In December 1979, Foreman Cason wanted to transfer Hall to the day shift. Hall testified that he explained to General Foreman Veatch and Cason that he preferred the evening shift so he could receive his gold shot treatments from his doctor. Veatch asked Hall to work days just for December, and told Hall he could return to the second shift in January 1980. Hall agreed, and returned to the second shift as promised.

(4) Contentions of the parties

As earlier noted, Respondent contends that Hall was the "worst welder in the plant." It asks on brief, "What was the Respondent to do? Continue to allow Hall to perform substandard welding without even making an attempt to improve?"

General Counsel has alleged that the actions imposed on Hall by Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act. General Counsel argues that, to the extent Hall did perform unsatisfactorily on any jobs following his testimony at the February 4-5 hearing, it was because Respondent, knowing about Hall's arthritic condition, deliberately transferred him from welding pads to the more onerous job of welding fittings. Respondent, General Counsel argues, knew that Hall would be unable to properly weld the fittings because of his arthritis, and that Hall would thereby provide the basis for his own discharge. Such intentional assignment, General Counsel argues, was in retaliation for Hall's protected activities, and the discipline and discharge which predictably flowed from such onerous assignment were unlawful.

b. Hall's February 6 reassignment from pads to fittings

As noted above in subsection (3), dealing with Hall's arthritis, Hall had been welding pads in bay 11 for nearly 7 months prior to his February 4 testimony. Hall testified that when he returned to work on February 6 on completion of the hearing before Administrative Law Judge Evans, he was reassigned to bay 11, from welding pads to welding fittings. Nearly 3 weeks later, on February 25, Foreman Cason told Hall he would weld pads that night. Hall then asked him why he had been taken off pads and assigned to fittings when he returned from testifying at the hearing. Cason replied, "Because I wanted to take you off the pads." Hall then asked if his welding was bad, and Cason responded no, that he would have been the first person to tell Hall if such were the case.[102]

While I find that Cason's February 25 expression to Hall regarding the move from pads to fittings is more instructive (the abruptness supports an inference of animus) than his testimonial reason, it is to be noted that at the hearing Cason testified that he made the decision to move Hall from welding pads to welding fittings because Respondent was planning to increase its production of tank cars and there was a need for extra welders.[103] In order to obtain the additional production, Cason has to train new employees (trainees) to do the work. Cason testified that the normal practice is to refrain from assigning trainees to weld fittings because fittings are pressure-type work, whereas pads are not. Cason placed P. E. Chaney on the pad station with the trainees and assigned Hall to a fitting position because Hall had welded fittings previously. Cason specifically testified that no one replaced Hall on pad weldings, and that Charles Meshell did not replace Hall.[104] He further testified that welding on fittings was not a more difficult job, but that Respondent attempted to use only first-, second-, or third-class welders rather than trainees because fittings are pressure-type work. I do not credit Cason. His demeanor was not nearly as impressive as that of Hall and Meshell.

[102] Indeed, Hall around late June 1979 was asked to go from his then assigned bay 8 to help out a few nights in bay 11. After Hall had welded fittings there for about a week, Supervisor Tom Britain complimented Hall on his "excellent" work, asked him to transfer to bay 11, and at the end of the first week, asked Hall to switch to welding pads because Britain needed a first-class welder on pads who did "not mind working." After Hall had spent only 1 night on pads, Britain was so pleased with Hall's "excellent" welding that he assigned Hall to pads. Britain did not testify.

[103] General Foreman Claude Veatch testified unpersuasively that he had no personal knowledge of why Hall was transferred from pads to fittings. Cason was bay foreman on the day shift, and Britain the second-shift foreman.

[104] I credit the testimony of Hall and Meshell that they swapped jobs. Since July 1979, Meshell had been welding fittings in bay 11. Employed by Respondent since 1972, and a first-class welder for 4 years, Meshell testified that he welded pads for 2 days in July 1979, but that Second Shift Foreman Britain removed him because of bad welding. Now, on February 6, an excellent pad welder, (Hall) was replaced by Meshell whom Britain had labeled as bad on pads.

Respondent contends that the record discloses that Hall and Meshell worked different shifts and that therefore Meshell could not have replaced Hall. In its brief, Respondent urges me to reverse my ruling excluding a pretrial affidavit (Resp. Exh. 48) of Hall. In the excluded affidavit, Hall stated that Meshell was "put on the 11-7 shift in Bay 11" on February 6, and P. E. Chaney was brought from the first shift and took Hall's place welding pads on the second shift. (Resp. Exh. 48, p. 2, rejected exhibit file.) Respondent offered the exhibit as impeachment after Hall had testified and left the hearing. I rejected the exhibit (offered during the rebuttal stage, and not during Hall's cross-examination), at the objections of the General Counsel and the Charging Party, on the basis that the offer came too late since Hall was not present to be given an opportunity to explain the statement. In its brief, Respondent argues that "no rule of evidence" requires an opportunity be given to explain a discrepancy between testimony and a prior recorded statement since both "stand on their own merits." Even if Hall were a full-party opponent, so that an admission normally would be received under FRE 801(d)(2), I would have had the same difficulty here from the standpoint of fundamental fairness and due process. While I consider that the two grounds just mentioned are sufficient to support my ruling, I note that FRE 613(b) states that a prior inconsistent statement of a nonparty witness is not admissible (for impeachment) "unless the witness is afforded an opportunity to explein or deny the same and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate him thereon . . . ."

Respondent also observes that its Exh. 27, Meshell's daily record card, reflects that Meshell worked on the first shift the entire month of February. Even if that were so, it would not seem to be controlling. There is no contention that Meshell was not switched to pads on February 6. Whether he did so on the second shift or the first shift does not seem of controlling significance. The same amount of pad work was done, first shift or second, and Hall was switched to fittings. Moreover, Superintendent Greene specifically testified that the daily record card is less reliable than the computer printout, which in turn is based on the timecards punched by the employee. Accordingly, I do not accept Resp. Exh. 27 over the testimony of Hall and Meshell.

Although it is true that Hall had welded fittings previously, the abruptness and timing of the reassignment, coming immediately after Hall returned from the February hearing was made, I find, for the purpose of intimidating Hall, and serving as a warning to others—that union activities displease Respondent, and testifying against Respondent will not go unpunished. Thus, I find that Respondent, as alleged, violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) by transferring Hall from welding pads to welding fittings on and after February 6, 1980. Furthermore, I find that the purpose of assigning Hall to the physically more onerous job of welding fittings was twofold. First, to punish him physically, and second, to transfer him to a job where there would be a greater possibility that he would make mistakes which could provide a basis for his discharge.

While Respondent is not required to permanently assign Hall to welding pads, it is not entitled to reassign him for unlawful reasons. The remedy must be for Respondent to restore the status quo ante, i.e., return Hall to welding pads, if such job is in existence.

c. March 11 written warning

After he was assigned to welding fittings, Hall received a written warning, dated March 11, for "Unsatisfactory welding on U fitg. s/o 161598-03 TK-15." The work allegedly was performed by Hall on the evening of March 10.

Soon after Hall arrived at work the afternoon of March 11, Foreman Tom Britain came and informed him that he was wanted in the supervisor's office. On arriving in the office, and being seated, Hall observed that Foreman Delmo Cason was writing on a form. Completing his writing, Cason gave it to Hall and told him it was a warning slip for unsatisfactory welding.

Hall asked that if he was doing unsatisfactory welding on fittings, why Respondent did not put him back on pads where he had been performing satisfactorily, "because you know I suffer with arthritis and it is uncomfortable for me to weld on the fittings." Before Cason could respond, General Foreman Claude Veatch came into the office and asked Hall what his problem was. Hall replied that he was speaking to Cason. At that point, Cason told Hall, "Call me Mr. Cason."

Hall asked why he should have to say "Mr. Cason," and the latter stated, "Because I am the boss out here." Hall replied that he tendered respect to those who gave him respect, that the only titles in the plant were "leadermen, supervisors, general foreman and foremen," and that the "bosses" left when people stopped "sharecropping."

At or about that point Hall stated that he had not been shown his allegedly bad welding and he asked to see it. Veatch said that Cason and Britain did not have time to show the welding to him, and that: "Once we said you did something, that's what you did." When Hall then asked about disparity in warnings being issued, Britain replied:

> A bad welding is depending on how we look at it. Don't worry about the next man, no matter how bad it is, just worry about yourself.

Hall then returned to work.

Shortly thereafter, as Britain passed Hall at his work station, Hall again asked to see his bad welding. Britain replied that he did not have time to show Hall, and he thereupon walked away from Hall. Moments later employee Memphis Evans came over and asked Hall about the warning slip he had received. Britain returned, told Evans to return to his own work station, and then told Hall. "Hall, as long as you're in this bay, I don't want to catch you talking to no employees."[105]

Hall testified that in the past Respondent had showed employees their bad welding.[106] Indeed, when Hall was warned in 1977 for bad welding, he was shown the welding he had done which the Company claimed was substandard.

With respect to the allegedly poor welding, Veatch testified that Cason had discovered the poor welding and called Veatch over to examine it.[107] Agreeing with Cason, Veatch called Superintendent Greene to inspect the job since it appeared that a warning should be issued and a warning required Greene's approval. Greene also agreed that the welding was very poor. Veatch testified that the weld had to be gouged out and rewelded, and that such work was performed on the day shift before Hall arrived on the second shift. Veatch explained that the tank, number 15, had to be moved on through the assembly line to keep from holding up other work on the line.

Hall testified that he had not done any work on tank 15. He testified that he knew he had not because of notes he had been keeping on his work. He explained that after he testified at the February hearing, the "lawyers" suggested that he keep notes on his activities "because you never can tell what's going to happen after you testified against a person." Hall testified that he began making his notes when he returned to work on February 6, and that he made them for all of his work from his return through March.[108] He further testified that his notes[109] reflected that he had worked on tank 4 of job number 161610 on March 10 (G.C. Exh. 19, p. 10). He did not realize until later, after receiving the warning (which he put in his pocket without inspecting when Cason gave it to him), that he had not in fact worked on tank 15.

[105] Welder L. H. Williams testified that about 2 weeks after the February hearing he was told by Foreman Britain not to talk with Hall during working time, yet Britain never applied the same restriction to his conversing with other employees even though they would do so during working time in the presence of Britain.

[106] This fact is corroborated by Meshell who testified that when he was verbally warned in July by Britain for bad welding, he was shown the welding on his request.

[107] Pin holes and poor appearance in a nozzle weld. Veatch testified that Hall's welding symbol was on the work. However, no photograph was offered in evidence of the weld as was done with Resp. Exh. 29 pertaining to a weld allegedly done by Arnold. Indeed, Greene testified that a photograph was made of some other work by Hall, yet that photograph was not offered in evidence either.

[108] Hall's last day at work was on March 31, and his termination followed on April 3.

[109] The notes are contained in G.C. Exh. 19, a small notebook with an orange cover. More will be said later regarding the book's authenticity.

As will be seen below, I find that Hall's notes (G.C. Exh. 19) are genuine, and that he carefully recorded in specific detail the job orders and tank numbers he worked on after returning to work on February 6. Respondent offered no documentary or other substantiating evidence in support of the testimony of its witnesses that Hall in fact worked on tank 15. As I find that Hall testified with a far more impressive demeanor than Respondent's witnesses, I credit Hall, and I therefore find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, as alleged, by issuing the March 11 warning to Hall.

d. March 15 verbal warning

The record is somewhat confusing regarding the allegation of a mid-March verbal warning.[110] While it appears that supervisory personnel, including Superintendent Greene, concluded that Hall had done some bad welding on another tank, and so told Hall, there is no documentary evidence that a verbal warning issued. Veatch testified that no warning was given because Hall denied making the weld in question and Respondent could not demonstrate for certain that he had been the welder. In its brief, page 28, Respondent stated, "Hall was not given any type of warning because Hall denied that he had done the welding and there was no conclusive proof that he had in fact done it."[111]

To avoid extending this already lengthy decision, I shall forgo further discussion of the matter,[112] and I shall dismiss the allegation, paragraph 11 of the second (April 28, 1980) complaint.

e. Suspending and discharging Hall

(1) March 31 conference room meeting and suspension

Hall's suspension and discharge were triggered by the same event. Therefore, the two allegedly discriminatory actions[113] are combined for treatment.

On March 14, the Union filed its charge in Case 15-CA-7621 (one of the instant cases) alleging that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act by issuing the March 11 written warning to Hall. The return receipt, in evidence as G.C. Exh. 1(d), reflects that Respondent received the charge on March 17. A few days later, Respondent accused Hall of faulty welding, suspended Hall and then discharged him.

It is undisputed that on March 31 Hall was summoned to a meeting of a disciplinary committee in the conference room adjacent to the office of Hillman Deaton, manager of employee relations. The six[114] present at the meeting were:

William Bradshaw—Vice President of Manufacturing
Hillman Deaton—Manager of Employee Relations
George Dillard—Personnel Manager
Claude Veatch—General Foreman, Bay 11
Rupert Sepulvado—General Foreman, Bays 5, 6 and 13
Willie Hall, Jr.—Welder

All of the six-named persons testified concerning the meeting, and there is a sharp, and critical, conflict between the version given by Hall and the essentially singular version given by the five management representatives.[115]

Deaton also identified a reject report (Resp. Exh. 37) which describes the defective work allegedly done by Hall on tank 22. Dated March 25, the reject report (on quality control form 206) reflects that rail car tank 22, out of project number 161595-03, was rejected for faulty welding performed in bay 11.[116] The defective welding is described as:

[110] Different dates are referred to in the record, and there are references to different tanks (14 and 22).

[111] Hall testified that the matter even progressed to a meeting in the office of Hillman Deaton, manager of employee relations. In the presence of Superintendent Greene and General Foreman Veatch, Deaton told Hall he would have to accept Hall's word that he had not done the welding in question since Foreman Britain did not know (was unable to demonstrate) that Hall had done it.

[112] It should be noted that in conjunction with this second mid-March event, Greene testified, without contradiction, that he told Hall he had a welding problem, and suggested that Hall transfer to the day shift in order that he could receive some retraining, either on the job or at welding school. Hall declined, saying that he had no problem with his welding and that he preferred the second shift. Greene acquiesced, but asked Hall to seek assistance from the second-shift welding technician and supervisors if he saw that he had a welding problem. Greene concluded with the admonition, "But we can no longer tolerate this type of work, and if it continues, the company is going to have to take further disciplinary action." At the hearing, Hall testified that when he accepted the offer of welding assistance in 1977 he even received a warning during such assistance, and, figuring Respondent would do the same to him this time, he declined.

[113] Hall's March 31 suspension is the subject of par. 12 of the second (April 28) complaint, and his April 3 discharge is alleged in complaint par. 13.

[114] Only Bradshaw named a seventh, Superintendent E. C. Greene. During his own testimony, Greene testified that he was on vacation the week of the meeting.

[115] In its brief, Respondent suggests what amounts to a numbers test. Thus, it argues that I must accept Respondent's version or conclude that the five conspired to commit perjury. I reject this argument. While the number of witnesses supporting one version of a factual conflict is one factor to be considered, it is not the controlling one in credibility resolutions. Were it so, an administrative law judge's responsibility would end, in this instance, after outlining the dispute and, on noting that the division of witnesses is 5 to 1, accepting as true the version of the five. Such is not the law.

[116] Hall's notebook (G.C. Exh. 19) reflects that he welded fittings on two tanks numbered 22. The first occasion was on March 14 on project number 161595-03 (the same project number noted on Resp. Exh. 37), and again on March 25 (the very date of Resp. Exh. 37) respecting project number 161610. It appears very likely that tank 22 of March 14 (project 161595-03) was the subject of the almost issued verbal warning concerning a nozzle discussed in the prior subsection of this Decision. Veatch's testimony would seem to so indicate, although he places the date later. Greene places the date about mid-March, but at one point he

> The weep hole on the repad on the U nozzle leaked when the coils were on hydro. Request repair procedure. The vessel has not been hydro tested.

The report further reflects that after the leak in the repad was repaired, that area passed the hydrostatic (water pressure) test.

Hall's account of the conference room conversation describes the confrontation in such graphic detail that it justifies repetition[117] here:

> And, the conversation started off, Hillman Deaton spoken to me, he said, "Hall, the last meeting that you and I had together, I thought we resolved everything and worked out everything together, but I find out later that you filed unfair labor practice charges against us."[118] And, he said, "What makes you think you are right in doing this?"
> I spoken and said, "Deaton, it's not that I think I'm right. I am doing what the law says that I have a right to do when I feel a person is harassing me."
> And, at that time, George Dillard spoken up. He said, "Hall, in 1977 you filed unfair labor practice charges against us and you went all the way to Washington, D.C. with it and you lost. Now, what makes you think you will win this charge?"
> I spoken and I said, "Dillard," I said, "what happened in 1977 doesn't mean it's going to happen in 1980." I said, "This is a new ball game."
>
> And, at that time, George Dillard spoken up, he said, "Hall, it is you who are harassing the foremen in the bay out there, by taking this little notebook of yours and going out there and writing down everything you do. We should be filing charges against you."[119]
> I said, "Well, George Dillard, if you think you should file charges against me, then do that."
> Q. Then what happened?
> A. And then, William Bradshaw, he spoken up. He said, "Hall, they also have unsatisfactory work that you did out there in the bay." I think he said Bay 10 or 14, I'm not sure.
> So, I asked him, I said, "Bradshaw, would you draw me a picture or a diagram and show me what was the bad welding I did out there?"
>
> So, he got a pencil and a piece of paper and he drew a diagram of the pad I was supposed to have welded.
>
> And, so, I smiled and looked at it and said, "This seems funny to me."
>
> He said, "What's so funny about it, that you don't understand?"
>
> I said, "You all taken me off of pads February 6th, 1980. You say this was welded in March. How could I have welded this?"
> And, at that time, Claude Veatch spoken up, he came over there and looked at the picture and said, "No, this is the wrong picture, a wrong diagram."[120] So, at that time, I spoken up and said, "Well, it seems as though you all can't get your story together here."

Hall testified that at one point Bradshaw told him he had done $20,000 to $30,000 worth of bad welds on a tank, and Hall replied that he could not have done that much welding, good or bad, in a whole week.

At that point Dillard advised Hall that he could leave and, after an exchange of a few more words, Hall left the conference room. After about 5 to 7 minutes the others also emerged. Deaton then called Hall into the former's office and told him that the committee had voted to send Hall home. Not knowing Sepulvado, Hall asked for the correct spelling of the foreman's name. Deaton said he did not know, and Hall, pulling out his notebook, said that he would spell it as best he could. Deaton then stated: "Hall, this is what I'm talking about. This is what is going to cost you your job." Hall asked what Deaton was referring to, and the latter replied: "That little book. You get rid of that book and the rest of it,[121] and everything could be more easy for you."

Hall said he had paid 35 cents for the book and intended to keep it since other welders and fitters have books they make notes in. Deaton then asked Hall why he persisted in his belief that the Union would succeed in coming in the plant in light of its past failures, and Hall replied, in effect, that this time the situation was different. After further conversation, Hall asked whether he was fired and Deaton told him no. As Hall prepared to leave, Deaton asked, "Hall, will you get rid of that little book?" Hall replied in the negative, and went home.

Turning now to the version of Respondent's five witnesses, I note that their essentially singular report is devoted mainly to denials that Deaton and Dillard referred to any 1977 or 1980 unfair labor practice charges, and denials that Deaton linked Hall's problem to the notebook he had.

Respecting the 1977 charges, the version of the management witnesses is that the only reference to them refers to tank 14. Hall identifies the March 14 tank 22 as the subject of his near verbal warning. As Hall further explained, the digits 03 are part of the job or project number on March 14 tank 22. The digits 22 following job number 161610 on March 25 designate the tank number and are not part of the job number as one might conclude. Hall explained that he did not always include the last two digits following the dash on the job number, and that such two digits in his notebook refer to the tank number.

[117] The quoted testimony is from Hall's direct examination. When asked on cross-examination to repeat his story, Hall did so in a remarkable display of memory recall. I conclude that the March 31 event remained very vivid in Hall's mind.

[118] An obvious reference to the March 14 charge relating to the written warning issued to Hall on March 11.

[119] Although Dillard's remarks are not the subject of a complaint allegation, they constitute threats in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act, if actually made. I credit Hall, and I find an additional 8(a)(1) violation based on this fully litigated matter. Salem Transportation, Co., Inc., 252 NLRB 1103 (1980).

[120] During cross-examination by the Union, Veatch conceded that Bradshaw diagramed a big wrap pad rather than the fitting reinforcement pad which allegedly leaked because of improper welding by Hall.

[121] Hall stated that he asked Deaton if the "rest of it" referred to the charges he (the Union on his behalf) had filed, but that Deaton made no comment.

came when Bradshaw asked Hall if he kept notes of all his work, and Hall replied that he had been told to do so after the 1977 charges.[122]

Bradshaw testified that he sat next to Hall at the conference and that Deaton opened the meeting by saying they were there to review Hall's bad welding work on tanks 15,[123] 14,[124] and 22.[125] Bradshaw testified[126] that he asked Hall whether he had welded on tank car 22, and that Hall pulled a little black or navy blue[127] book from his shirt pocket[128] and said he had to look at his book. Hall then confirmed that he had indeed worked on tank 22 and gave an unspecified date.[129] Bradshaw then asked Hall if he kept records of everything he did, and Hall replied, "Yes, sir, since I had some unfair labor practices turned down on me and they advised me to keep records and that is what I'm doing."

Bradshaw further testified that after Hall was dismissed from the meeting, the committee decided to send him home (suspend him) "until we could further investigate the whole aspect of all his welding." He further testified that as the committee left the conference room, Hall, waiting in an adjacent area, asked Bradshaw, not Deaton, who Sepulvado was and how to spell his name. According to Bradshaw, he spelled the name slowly for Hall who had out his notebook.[130]

Despite Bradshaw's reference to further investigation, no evidence of such was presented at the instant hearing. In fact, there is only limited evidence regarding the welding allegedly performed by Hall on tank 22. Such evidence came from Sepulvado and Veatch.

Sepulvado, general foreman over bays 5, 6, and 13, testified that tank 22 had been built in bay 11 and then sent to bay 13 where his people welded external coils to the tank. Thereafter, tank 22 was "sold to inspection" by bay 13, and hydro tested in bay 14[131] where it reportedly leaked.[132] Tank 22 was returned to bay 13 where Sepulvado's crew cut off the coils and discovered that the leak was coming from the reinforcement pad for the unloading nozzle which is welded to the tank. The leak was repaired, the coils reattached, and welded again. On cross-examination, Sepulvado testified that the welding inspector identified Hall's welding symbol.[133]

Veatch testified that Hall, concerning the near verbal warning in mid-March regarding tank 22 (job number unspecified), stated that he had welded all the fittings on the tank except the bottom unloading nozzle then under question. Indeed, Veatch said all the other fittings bore Hall's welding symbol. Accordingly, Veatch explained that when the second failure developed, a leak during a hydrostatic test of certain coils, it was known that the work had been performed by Hall. However, Veatch conceded that he was unable to say himself exactly what item on tank 22 leaked since the repair was not handled in his bay.

[122] Of course, this does not coincide with the notebook dates which begin with February 6, 1980. Hall testified that it was during the February 1980 hearing that the "lawyers" suggested he keep notes, and he began doing so on February 6.

[123] Apparently the subject of the March 11 written warning.

[124] When called as a 611(c) witness the first day of the hearing, Superintendent Greene at one point stated that Hall had done bad welding on a tank 14. There is no other evidence in the record clarifying this reference. Greene went on to describe his talk with Hall in which he offered him welding assistance and retraining. However, the record shows that such offer pertained to Hall's allegedly faulty welding in mid-March on tank 22—for which no warning issued because it could not be demonstrated that Hall was responsible for the weld in question.

[125] It is unfortunate that the parties failed to develop a clear record regarding tank(s), 22. As already observed, Hall's notes reflect two different tank 22's on different dates in March. At the hearing, Respondent denied that Hall received a verbal warning for the mid-March welding on a tank 22 (job or project number not specified), and then on March 25, repair was requested on a tank 22 with the same job number corresponding to Hall's notes for the date of March 14.

[126] Although the meeting was on March 31, Bradshaw said he could not recall the date, and that it seemed like "four or five weeks ago." Bradshaw testified on August 7—over 4 months after the meeting.

[127] All five of Respondent's witnesses so identified the color, and further stated that the book opened from right to left. The notebook Hall identified (G.C. Exh. 19) is orange and opens from bottom to top. All five denied that G.C. Exh. 19 was the book Hall referred to. There is no dispute that the pages were loose. Bradshaw said the pages Hall had were dirty from shop sweat and frayed. Dillard said some of the pages had grease on them. On rebuttal, Hall credibly explained that there was no occasion for the pages to be greasy since he wears gloves to weld and pulled the gloves off to write. Moreover, I note that the orange cover to G.C. Exh. 19 has what appears to be a welding burn on the front, and that the pages are either sweat or water stained. Contrary to Respondent's suggestion on brief, the notebook does not have the appearance of being purchased a few days before the hearing. I find it to be the notebook Hall used.

[128] Hall testified that he was not certain whether he pulled the book from his pocket in the conference room meeting, although he was sure he did when he met later only with Deaton. It seems logical that Hall would have referred to his notes in the conference room and I find that he did remove the book from his pocket there to inspect his notes.

[129] Contrary to Veatch's testimony that Hall's weld symbol was on all (except one) of the fittings on tank 22, Hall testified that on tank 22 he welded only two fittings, the manway and the fitting next to the manway. Sepulvado identified the point of leak as the reinforcement pad of the unloading nozzle. As Veatch identified the unloading nozzle as being on the bottom of the tank, and Hall implied that the manway is on top of the tank, it seems evident that Hall did not weld the item which leaked (if there was a leak). Finally, in view of Veatch's testimony that the unloading nozzle leak, for which Hall almost received a verbal warning in mid-March, was repaired by replacement, and Sepulvado described the item which lead to Hall's suspension and discharge as the reinforcement pad for the unloading noozle, there is every possibility that, if there in fact was a leak, it was caused by whoever "cut the bottom out, replace[d] it." In short, there is every indication that Respondent seeks to blame a leak in the replaced bottom on Hall, when he in fact had nothing to do with the replaced part and Respondent knew very well he had nothing to do with it.

[130] The spelling which appears in G.C. Exh. 19 appears to be "Sepvead." Thus, this misspelling is more consistent with Hall's version than with Bradshaw's. Even if G.C. Exh. 19 is not the notebook Hall displayed on March 31, as Bradshaw and the others testified, it would seem that in any recopying by Hall into G.C. Exh. 19, the correct spelling of Sepulvado would appear if Bradshaw spoke slowly. I credit Hall concerning this matter.

[131] Hall testified that the work done in bay 11 is inspected and tested by air pressure in conjunction with soap and water, and if there is a leak it is repaired before the tank leaves bay 11. This raises some question regarding Respondent's later evidence that Hall's work was discovered in another bay to be the cause of a leak.

[132] The General Counsel's hearsay objection was overruled. Thus, this testimony is evidence only of the reported course of action and not proof that there in fact was a leak.

[133] It is undisputed that the welders have symbols they stamp into the work to identify it. Hall testified that his weld symbol had always been QN until sometime in March (before the March 31 meeting), but that he did not recall the new symbol since he had used it only a short time. Sepulvado did not identify the weld symbol the inspector found; the inspector did not testify; and the record does not disclose what symbol, if any, was found.

According to Deaton, the March 31 meeting was very short. He opened it by referring to tank 22[134] and told Hall that there was a problem with his welding performance. Hall replied that the only problem was that he was being harassed. Deaton said welding code specifications had to be met. Bradshaw then asked Hall if he had worked on tank 22, and Hall removed a small notebook from his pocket, thumbed through the pages, and said yes. At that point there was some discussion concerning whether it was pad or fitting work (an apparent reference to Bradshaw's diagram). Bradshaw asked Hall if he made notes about everything on the job and Hall responded, "No, but since I filed those unfair labor practices in 1977 and they were not successful, I have been told to write down job developments as they occur." Deaton testified that was about the extent of the meeting. He denied the various hearing assertions of Hall regarding Deaton's and Dillard's references to charges and to the notebook.

Deaton further testified that just after the committee left, and while he and Hall were in Deaton's office, he advised Hall that the committee had decided to suspend him during an investigation in which his case would be further reviewed. Deaton denied that there was any reference to Sepulvado, the Union, or Hall's notebook while they were in his office. He testified that his next conversation with Hall was to advise him that he had been terminated.

Dillard testified that he said nothing at the meeting. His testimony is consistent with that of the other four management representatives.

(2) April 3 discharge of Hall

Deaton testified that he could not recall the exact date the decision was made to terminate Hall, but that it was made in the 3-day period between March 31 and April 3. Dillard recalled that the discharge decision was made the day after the March 31 suspension.

Deaton testified that when Hall telephoned him on April 3 he told Hall that the committee had met and had "rendered a termination." He denied that there was any reference to Hall's notebook in this very brief conversation. Bradshaw testified that he happened to be in Deaton's office when the telephone rang. While he could not hear what the caller said, he could hear Deaton's statements. According to Bradshaw, Deaton said, "Willie, I was just fixing to call you. You have been terminated." Deaton told the caller to come get his check at anytime, and that ended the 3-to-4-second conversation. Bradshaw denied in his testimony that Deaton said, "We voted Wednesday to terminate you." Of course, Deaton's own version comes very close to that which Bradshaw denied.

Hall testified that when he telephoned Deaton the latter said he was glad Hall had called, because he was about to call him. Deaton then said, "Well, they had a conference concerning you. They voted to terminate you." According to Hall, Deaton said that he could give up his notebook or quit. Hall said he would not give up the book and that Deaton would not get it short of a court order. Deaton then told Hall he was terminated and they then discussed the procedure for Hall to pick up his check.

One final point to be considered is Hall's testimony that when he and Deaton were conversing in Deaton's office at the time of Hall's March 31 suspension, Deaton allegedly told Hall he was with Hall 100 percent.[135] Hall told Deaton that Deaton would lie if necessary in order to save his job and feed his family, that such was just human nature. On cross-examination, Hall modified the reference to human nature to say that it depends on the individual.

(3) Attorney-client privilege

Before concluding the issues regarding Hall, it should be observed that Sepulvado admitted on cross-examination by counsel for the General Counsel that before testifying he had reviewed a list of questions with Respondent's attorney, William E. Hester III. Although Sepulvado had a copy of the list with him, he did not refer to it during his testimony. When counsel for the General Counsel moved for production, attorney Hester objected on the basis of attorney-client privilege. Counsel for the General Counsel argued that the objection should be overruled because (1) the privilege had been waived when the questions were asked; (2) the document was producible under the Jencks Act; and (3) privilege, if such, was outweighed by the interest in developing a probative record. The Union took no position. After some colloquy regarding this matter, I declined to order production under Federal Rule of Evidence 612(2) (order to produce is discretionary where notes reviewed before testifying), and I sustained the objection. In order to preserve the notes for examination on review, or remand, they were placed in an envelope, marked as General Counsel Exhibit 32, and the envelope sealed and marked, in part, "Sealed Exhibit."

Only counsel for the General Counsel addresses the matter in his brief where he additionally argues that the notes are not protected by the attorney-client privilege since only a communication from the client, not the reverse, is privileged. In the alternative, counsel for the General Counsel argues that in assessing credibility I should consider the fact that Sepulvado's testimony was based on a two-page list of questions he studied prior to testifying.

In adhering to my ruling, I observe that the "Report of House Committee on the Judiciary" on Fed. R. Evid. 612 states, "The Committee intends that nothing in the Rule be construed as barring the assertion of a privilege with respect to writings used by a witness to refresh his memory." (Emphasis supplied.) The attorney-client privilege is encompassed within Fed. R. Evid. 501. Finally, I take note of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Upjohn Company et al. v. United States (IRS), 49 L.W. 4093 (January 13, 1981), wherein the Court essentially declared that corporations enjoy the same attorney-client privilege as an individual.[136] No different result would obtain even if the notes are considered only the "work product" of attorney Hester. I do not consider that the notes detract from Sepulvado's credibility any more than I deem as detracting from Hall's credibility the fact he had two pretrial affidavits which he presumably reviewed before testifying.

[134] Unlike Bradshaw, Deaton did not list tanks 15 and 14.

[135] Supposedly this related to a remark by Deaton that his job would be easier if the plant were unionized.

f. Conclusions regarding Hall's case

Respecting the notebook question, I credit Hall's testimony that General Counsel's Exhibit 19 is the notebook he had in his possession at the March 31 conference room meeting. Hall testified in a straightforward and detailed manner and, with one exception hereafter noted, I credit his testimony completely. In contrast, Bradshaw, as noted above at various points, could not recall relevant facts. Indeed, it seems that Bradshaw has a tendency to testify in a positive way about erroneous facts. An example is the fact that Veatch admitted that Bradshaw's March 31 diagram depicted a wrap pad rather than the item allegedly welded improperly by Hall. The witnesses other than Bradshaw devoted most of their testimony about the March 31 meeting to simple denials of some of Hall's assertions rather than giving a detailed description of what was said there.

Although the entries in Hall's notebook specify job numbers and tanks he worked on, Respondent did not offer any company documents demonstrating that Hall did not work on the tanks reflected by the notebook entries.[137] Respondent had ample opportunity to produce rebuttal records inasmuch as there was a hearing recess between August 8 and 27 when resumed with the majority of Respondent's case. Hall had testified on August 6, the third day of the hearing.

Turning now to the March 31 meeting, I credit Hall's specific and detailed account over the rather flat descriptions offered by Respondent's witnesses. Moreover, I note that Hall testified forcefully and convincingly. Even when Hall was asked on cross-examination to repeat his story, he did so in an unhesitating manner and in an almost identical detail.[138] In short, Hall's version has the ring of truth.

The one point concerning which I do not credit Hall is his testimony regarding Deaton's supposed April 3 offer that Hall give up his notebook in exchange for returning to work. Unlike the rest of Hall's testimony, this particular point just does not "fit." Thus, it appears that before the discharge decision Deaton often assumed a kind of mediator role, or that of a grievance referee, and could conceivably make the remarks Hall attributes to him. In contrast, it is illogical that Deaton, after the decision to terminate had been made, would have offered Hall a chance to return to work. Particularly, this is so where, as I find, Respondent was seeking any pretext to rid itself of Hall.

On the other hand, I accept Hall's testimony that in the March 31 conference room meeting Deaton and Dillard did refer to the notebook as described by Hall, and that Deaton, later in his office, told Hall that the notebook was going to cost him his job.[139]

Respecting the basis for the March 11 warning, I find that Hall did not perform any welding on tank 15, and that Respondent attributed any defective welding on the tank to Hall as a pretext to build a current record against him because of his union activities and his February testimony.[140]

I further find and conclude that Respondent sought to attribute bad welding on tank 22 to Hall for the same unlawful reasons, and that it thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) and (4) by suspending Hall on March 31 and discharging him on April 3.

Considering now Respondent's Wright Line[141] burden, I find that although the General Counsel has shown that unlawful considerations were motivating factors in Hall's reassignment, warning, suspension, and discharge, Respondent has failed to demonstrate affirmatively that it would have reassigned (to fittings), warned, suspended, and discharged Hall notwithstanding his protected conduct. Some of Respondent's failure in this regard is the rather confusing evidence regarding tank 22. Evidentiary references to the tank were usually not connected to a job number, and Respondent offered unsatisfactory evidence that Hall in fact welded the item which leaked.[142] Indeed, there is only hearsay evidence that there was a leak in fact, and that was admitted over the General Counsel's objection merely to show a course of action (and why Respondent took the action it did). Sepulvado's testimony that his bay employees repaired the area which leaked is not competent evidence of a leak in fact since only the inspector conducting the hydrostatic test could observe a leak. Sepulvado's crew simply repaired the area a leak was presumed to flow from.

[136] Thus, it is immaterial that Sepulvado is a line supervisor and not member of a managerial "control group." As an agent with relevant knowledge, communications with Sepulvado are protected by the attorney-client privilege.

[137] Resp. Exh. 18, relating to Arnold's case, is a computer printout of work performed on a specified project, and Superintendent Greene testified that there are computer printouts which are made by the accounting department for all jobs. Moreover, Resp. Exh. 47, also introduced regarding Arnold's case, describes the project number and the number of tanks. Hence, I conclude that there were records available which Respondent could have offered had it chosen to do so, and I draw an adverse inference from its failure to do so.

[138] Moreover, Hall's version not only is internally consistent, it is consistent with independent facts: the 1977 and 1980 unfair labor practice charges and the fact that he did keep a notebook as Respondent well knew in advance of the meeting.

[139] This remark simply reflected that the notebook symbolized Hall's protected union and testimonial activities. Moreover, as Hall's testimony reflects, Deaton would pretend to be a kind of confidant to Hall whenever they were alone in Deaton's office. This, then, explains why Deaton would tell Hall that the notebook would cost him his job.

[140] Hall's last pre-February warning came in March 1978. His pre-February record has several poor performance warnings, including one which underlines some pointed language about further discipline. Nevertheless, one must ask why Respondent retained Hall in the years 1973 to March 1978 if it considered him a poor welder. One must also wonder why Hall, whose performance was warning free between 1978 and March 11, 1980, all of a sudden could do nothing right.

[141] Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

[142] The welding inspector who, according to Veatch, identified Hall's weld symbol was not called to testify. Moreover, Veatch's testimony is of questionable accuracy since Hall testified that his weld symbol was changed in March. Although Respondent was quick to offer photographs of other work in question in this case, none was offered of the item in instant dispute—even though Greene conceded that some were made of tank 22 in mid-March. In short, Respondent's evidence is far too skimpy and garbled.

Accordingly, as I find that Respondent has not carried its Wright Line burden, I shall order that it expunge the March 11 warning from Hall's employment record, revoke the March 31 suspension and April 3 discharge, reinstate Hall to welding pads (if such job is in existence), and make him whole.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by unlawfully interrogating employees about their protected activities, by giving them the impression of unlawful surveillance, and by illegally threatening them because of their protected activities.

4. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3), (4), and (1) of the Act by assigning employees to more onerous and less desirable work, subjecting them to stricter supervision, requiring them to adhere more closely to plant rules, restricting their communications with their fellow employees, citing them with unexcused absences, and by warning, transferring, and discharging employees.

5. The foregoing unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. Respondent did not issue Willie Hall, Jr., a verbal warning on or about March 15, 1980, and therefore did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) as alleged.

7. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by transferring Willie D. Broden from the second shift to the first shift on or about June 16, 1980.

THE REMEDY

In view of the foregoing, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from its illegal conduct, and to (1) expunge the unexcused absences charged to Cecil M. Sanders for February 4 and 5, 1980, and inform him it has done so; (2) expunge the warnings issued to Lynn A. Arnold, Willie D. Broden, Willie D. Crowder, J. R. Grant, Willie Hall, Jr., Cecil M. Sanders, and Thomas B. Stamper and notify them personally that it has done so; (3) retransfer Arnold, Sanders, and Stamper to their former positions in bay 5, which they enjoyed prior to their discriminatory reassignments and transfers in February 1980 or, if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs; (4) reinstate Hall to his second-shift position of welding pads in bay 11 which he occupied prior to his February-April discriminatory reassignment, suspension, and discharge, or, if such job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position; and (5) make whole, with interest, Arnold, Crowder, and Hall for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discriminatory suspensions and discharge taken against them. Backpay shall be computed in the manner established by the Board in *F. W. Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[143]

The Respondent, Riley-Beaird, Inc., Shreveport, Louisiana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Unlawfully interrogating employees concerning their union activities and that of other employees.

(b) Unlawfully interrogating employees concerning charges they have filed with the Board.

(c) Creating the impression of surveillance of employees' union activities by telling them that a supervisor has been instructed to observe their union activities.

(d) Unlawfully threatening employees with filing of charges against them because they make and keep notes concerning their work and events at work.

(e) Illegally threatening employees with discharge because they make and keep notes concerning their work and events at work.

(f) Unlawfully charging employees with unexcused absences to penalize them for being absent from work in order to give testimony at a Board proceeding.

(g) Assigning employees to more onerous and less desirable work, subjecting them to stricter supervision, requiring them to adhere more closely to plant rules, and restricting them in communicating with their fellow employees because they support the Union, or any other labor organization,[144] or because they have filed charges or given testimony under the Act.

(h) Unlawfully issuing warning to employees.

(i) Unlawfully reassigning and transferring employees.

(j) Illegally suspending and discharging employees.

(k) Discouraging employees from membership in International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organizations, or discouraging employees from filing charges or giving testimony under the Act, by unlawfully reassigning, warning, suspending, or discharging any of its employees, or discriminating against them in any other manner with respect to their hire or tenure of employment in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (4) of the Act.

(l) In any like or related manner interferring with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, to form, join, or assist International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, to act together for the purpose of collective bargaining or of other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any or all such activities.

[143] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[144] The phrase "or any other labor organization" is appropriately included. Elk Brand Manufacturing Company, 253 NLRB 1038 (1981).

2. Take the following affirmative action which will effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Offer Lynn A. Arnold, Willie Hall, Jr., Cecil M. Sanders, and Thomas B. Stamper immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions of employment or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

(b) Make whole Lynn A. Arnold, Willie D. Crowder, and Willie Hall, Jr., for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Remove from its records and destroy all copies of, and references to, the warnings issued as shown below:

Lynn A. Arnold	March 6, 1980 April 11, 1980 May 29, 1980
Willie D. Broden	April 25, 1980
Willie D. Crowder	March 12, 1980
J. R. Grant	April 11, 1980 May 30, 1980
Willie Hall, Jr.	March 11, 1980
Cecil M. Sanders	February 4 and 5, 1980, unexcused absences July 22, 1980
Thomas B. Stamper	February 25, 1980

(d) Preserve and, upon request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its Shreveport, Louisiana, plant signed and dated copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[148] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 15, and after being duly signed and dated by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and shall be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that such notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director for Region 15, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

IT IS ALSO ORDERED that the complaints be dismissed insofar as they allege violations not specifically found herein.

---

[148] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On September 29, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Joel P. Biblowitz issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, Charging Party Fred Ens, Sr., filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint herein be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the informal settlement agreement entered into between the parties on January 24, 1980, and vacated and set aside by the Regional Director for Region 22 of the National Labor Relations Board on November 26, 1980, be, and it hereby is, reinstated.

---

[1] Charging Party Ens, Sr., has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL P. BIBLOWITZ, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in Newark, New Jersey, on May 26 and 27, 1981. An order consolidating cases, first amended complaint issued on November 26, 1980, based on charges filed as follows: Case 22-CA-9254 was filed on May 29, 1979, and amended on July 5, 1979; Case 22-CA-10198 was filed on August 5, 1980, and amended on October 9, 1980; Case 22-CA-10354 was filed on October 20, 1980. The complaint alleges that Cambridge Chemical Corp., herein called Respondent Chemical, and Cambridge Contracting, Inc., herein called Respondent Contracting, and at times collectively referred to as Respondent Cambridge, discharged Fred Ens, Jr., on or about May 3, 1979, because he joined or assisted Local 394, Laborers International Union of North America, AFL-CIO, herein called Local 394, and engaged in other concerted actions, and discharged Fred Ens, Sr., on May 18, 1979, because of the unfair labor practice charge filed by Ens Jr. regarding his discharge.[1] The complaint also alleges that Paul P. Pruss & Son, Inc., herein called Respondent Pruss, discharged or laid off Ens Sr., Ens Jr., and Golie Ricks on May 9, 1980, at the request of Respondent Cambridge, because they joined or assisted Local 394, engaged in other concerted actions, and because they filed or otherwise participated in a Board proceeding under the Act.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent Contracting and Respondent Chemical, New Jersey corporations with their principal office and place of business at 11 West 21 Street, Linden, New Jersey, are affiliated business enterprises with common owners, directors, personnel, facilities, and a common labor policy. Admittedly, Respondent Contracting and Respondent Chemical constitute a single integrated business enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of the Act. Respondent Cambridge is engaged in the business of providing and performing tank cleaning, heavy equipment cleaning, light construction services, and related services. In the course of its business operations during the 12-month period preceding November 1980, Respondent Cambridge caused to be purchased and delivered to its Linden office cleaning equipment and materials, and other goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, of which goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 were transported to said Linden office in interstate commerce directly from outside the State of New Jersey.

Respondent Pruss, a Pennsylvania corporation with its principal office in Elizabeth, New Jersey, is engaged in the business of providing and performing tank cleaning services and related services. During the calendar year 1979 Respondent Pruss provided and performed tank cleaning services valued in excess of $50,000 for enterprises including, inter alia, Exxon Company, U.S.A., located within the State of New Jersey, which enterprises, including Exxon Company, U.S.A., are directly engaged in interstate commerce. It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent Cambridge and Respondent Pruss are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[1] An allegation in the complaint that Respondent Cambridge granted an unlawful wage increase was withdrawn at the hearing.

259 NLRB No. 184

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondents admit, and I find, that Local 394 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. BACKGROUND

On May 3, 1979, Respondent Cambridge discharged Ens Jr. allegedly because of his activities on behalf of Local 394 or his other concerted activities; on May 4, 1979, Ens Jr. filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board regarding his discharge. On May 18, 1979, Respondent Cambridge discharged Ens Sr. allegedly because of his participation in, and in reprisal for, the unfair labor practice charge filed by Ens Jr. On or about January 24, 1980, prior to the unfair labor practice hearing in the matter, Ens Jr. and Respondent Cambridge entered into an informal settlement agreement (approved by the Regional Director) providing for, inter alia, certain moneys to be paid to Ens Sr. and Ens Jr. and a notice providing, inter alia:

> WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against our employees because of their membership in, activities on behalf of, and support for, Local 394, Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization.
> WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

Prior to the execution of this informal settlement agreement, Ens Jr., Ens Sr., and Ricks had obtained employment with Respondent Pruss. On May 9, 1980, Respondent Pruss discharged Ens Sr. and Ricks and laid off Ens Jr. The complaint alleges that Respondent Pruss discharged or laid off Ens Jr., Ens Sr., and Ricks because it was requested to do so by Respondent Cambridge for the same alleged reasons that Respondent Cambridge discharged Ens Jr. and Ens Sr.—their concerted activities and their filing of charges and participating in Board proceedings under the Act. On November 26, 1980, the Regional Director withdrew approval of, and vacated and set aside, the informal settlement agreement dated January 24, 1980, and incorporated the original allegations of the May 1979 discharges in the consolidated amended complaint issued on November 26, 1980. The moneys paid by Respondent Cambridge to Ens Jr. and Ens Sr. pursuant to the informal settlement agreement were not returned to Respondent Cambridge.

The attorney for Respondent Cambridge (who at the instant hearing represented all the Respondents) filed an undated brief and notice of motion requesting "that the Order withdrawing approval of the settlement agreement should be vacated, as a matter of law or, in the alternative, a severance of that proceeding should be granted from the unfair labor practice charges separately issued as against Pruss and Cambridge arising out of the discharge by Pruss of employees Ens Sr., Ens Jr., and Golie Ricks and an initial hearing held before a different Administrative Law Judge." On May 18, 1981, John M. Dyer, Associate Chief Administrative Law Judge, issued an order where he stated:

> IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that the Motion be denied. One question to be decided is whether the terms of the settlement agreement were violated by the actions alleged in complaint paragraphs 20 and 21. If the Judge decides that such actions violated the terms of the settlement agreement as alleged in complaint 22, he thereby finds that the settlement agreement was properly set aside. If the Judge finds that the actions did not violate the terms of the settlement agreement, then it will be ordered reinstated. Respondent is not prejudiced by so proceeding since this is the threshold question. For this reason and the reasons expressed in Counsel for the General Counsel's Opposition Memorandum, Respondent's Motion and Alternative Motion must be denied.

On the basis of this order, after the discussion of all the facts herein (including the discharge by Respondent Cambridge of Ens Sr. and Ens Jr.), the first subject under my analysis and conclusion will be whether Respondent Cambridge violated the terms of the earlier settlement agreement entered into on January 24, 1980, with Ens Sr. and Ens Jr.

IV. THE FACTS

Ens Sr. began his employ with Respondent Contracting in or about 1970; at the time he was terminated, on May 18, 1979,[2] his title was supervisor, contracting. Ens Jr. began working for Respondent Contracting part-time in 1974 and 1976; he was hired by Respondent Contracting as a full-time employee in January 1977 and was employed as a working foreman. While the parties agree that Ens Jr. was not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act during the period in question, Respondents allege that Ens Sr. was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act during his employment with Respondent Cambridge; the General Counsel appears to urge that Ens Sr. was not a supervisor within the meaning of the Act during that period.

Ens Sr. was paid an hourly rate of $5.20; Ens Jr. was earning $4 an hour while many of the laborers employed by Respondent Cambridge earned from $3.65 to $4.50 an hour. Respondent Cambridge's operation involved performing chemical cleaning and maintenance work at the Exxon Refinery in Linden, New Jersey. Ens Sr, met on a daily basis with an Exxon coordinator, who informed him of the next day's assignments. Ens Sr. then decided on the required number of men and trucks needed for the job. (Most of the laborers on these jobs were temporary help from an employment service.) He has not hired or fired employees. He testified that he has not recommended that employees be discharged; on one occasion he informed Paul Oriel, vice president and general manager and an admitted agent of Respondent Cambridge, that he had caught an employee sleeping in the truck on three occasions; the employee was not discharged. When the Exxon coordinator informs him that he wants the Cambridge employees to continue working past the usual 4:30 quitting time, he (Ens Sr.) would ask the entire crew to remain on the job. If some of these employees refused this request, Ens Sr. would sometimes ask some of the other employees to work the overtime hours; Oriel also chose employees to work overtime. When asked how he decided whom to ask, Ens Sr. testified: "No particular way." He also testified that some employees are better at certain tasks than other employees and that he would take that into consideration in choosing employees to work overtime: "some guys are afraid of heights. You can't put them on a tower." Ens Sr.'s supervision is only over the employees of Respondent Contracting; if he could not locate enough employees to work overtime at any particular time, he would notify Oriel who would request employees of Respondent Chemical[3] to work overtime. Oriel testified that Ens Sr. could, and has, recommended that certain employees be discharged, but on the few occasions that he has so recommended it was not followed because the employees were long-term employees at the time; he could not remember any occasion where Respondent Cambridge followed Ens Sr.'s recommendation to discharge an employee, but his recommendations were given careful consideration. Respondent Contracting has 9 or 10 employees; Oriel and Frank Riley, president of Respondent Cambridge, appear to be the only agents of Respondent Cambridge on the corporate hierarchy above Ens Sr. at the time.

[2] Unless otherwise indicated, all dates mentioned herein are for the year 1979.

I would find on the basis of the above that Ens Sr. was not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act at the time in question. It is clear that he could not hire or fire employees and that he never effectively recommended the discharge of any employee; although his recommendations were given "careful consideration" there was no evidence that they were ever followed. His decision on the number of employees to be employed each day was strictly dictated by the stated demands of the Exxon coordinator. Additionally, it appears to me that the only activity engaged in by Ens Sr. that could be considered out of the ordinary, was, on occasion, selecting employees to work overtime, but even that required little, if any, independent judgment; rather, these decisions appear to be rather pedestrian and predictable in nature. These findings, together with the fact his salary is not appreciably higher than many of the other employees, together with the fact that Oriel and Riley are also available to supervise the 9 to 10 employees of Respondent Contracting, convince me that he was not a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

On April 30, at or about 7:30 a.m., prior to beginning work, about seven or eight of Respondent Contracting's employees were discussing the need for raises. Ricks said that they should agree on an amount of a raise that they desire and approach Riley with it and everybody agreed at that time that it was a good idea. During the employees' 10:30 a.m. break at the Exxon refinery they continued discussing the possibility of approaching Riley with certain demands and one of the employees of Respondent Contracting, Joe Miller, informed Ens Jr. that they had no power to approach Riley with any demands. Ens Jr. decided that Miller was correct and he told the other employees that maybe they should contact a union. All the other employees agreed except Miller who argued that he was better off without a union because he needed the overtime hours he worked in order to survive; Ens Jr. and another employee informed Miller that if a union obtained good increases for them he would not have to work so much overtime. At lunchtime that day the employees got together again and Ens Jr. decided to "test" the employees' resolve regarding a union. In this regard he took a blank piece of paper and signed it; he handed it to Ricks, who also signed it. When he gave it to the other employees: "I just said here, sign this piece of paper, please," although, again, the paper contained nothing but signatures.[4] All the employees present signed the paper except Miller; Ens Jr. told Miller, "everybody else signed this piece of paper, Joe. Why don't you put your name on it?" Miller refused. When Miller asked what the paper was for, Ens Jr. said it was nothing, just a piece of paper with a list of names. Miller again refused and Ens Jr. threw away the paper. Later that day, Ens Jr. learned that Mike Sherrick, one of the employees who signed his blank piece of paper, was fired at lunchtime.[5] During the afternoon break Miller approached Ens Jr. and told him that he did not know how it happened, but Oriel found out about the list. Ens Jr. said that there was only one way he could have found out, and that was through Miller, but Miller denied it.

Ens Sr. testified that at lunchtime that day he observed Miller sitting in front of one of Respondent Cambridge's buildings speaking with Oriel. He overheard Miller telling Oriel that he was not able to live on 40 hours pay, but he did not hear anything that Oriel said.

On May 3, during lunchtime, the employees again discussed contacting a union or speaking to Riley about getting more money. It was decided that they would meet that evening at a local bar and that, prior to that meeting, Ens Jr. and Ricks would attempt to contact a union. That same day Ens Jr. and Ricks picked Local 394's telephone number from the phone book. While they were at the Exxon refinery they went together to a public telephone where Ricks called the Local 394 office. A woman answered the phone and Ricks informed her who he was and where he worked, and that they were having problems on the job; she told him that his first step should be to get in touch with the Labor Board. She also informed Ricks that he should call back the following Monday.

[3] Respondent Contracting performed general cleanup work at the refinery, while Respondent Chemical performed specific jobs using chemicals to clean tanks and towers.

[4] Ens Jr. testified: "Well, if you were one of the regular employees of Cambridge at the time, and was—how could I say it—had worked with myself for a year or two at the time and knew there was talk of union going around, and therefore knew that there was nothing to fear by signing this piece of paper."

[5] The circumstances surrounding his discharge will not be discussed herein. Although he was paid $1,000 pursuant to the settlement of the prior matter on January 24, 1980, he is not named in the consolidated amended complaint. It should also be noted that in other parts of the record there is testimony that Sherrick was discharged on May 3; this seems more reasonable as Ens Jr. testified that Sherrick was present at a meeting on May 3 with the other employees.

On that same day at or about 3 p.m., Ens Sr. returned to Respondent Cambridge's Linden facility to work on the daily timesheets, which are submitted by Respondent Cambridge to Exxon for reimbursement for work performed. Riley said to him, "The shit hit the fan over at the refinery, didn't it Freddy?" and Ens Sr. asked him what he was talking about. Riley then said that he did not know who was causing all the trouble: "It's that guy who comes out here." Ens Sr. thought he was referring to an individual named Matty Dudeck, but Riley said that it was not Dudeck, he was referring to an Exxon supervisor named Ronny Grue. Riley then said, "I have to let your son go tonight." When Ens Sr. asked why, Riley said, "we got a call from purchasing that him and Sherrick are dealing in dope." Ens Sr. protested and said that if it involved dope why did Exxon's purchasing department report on it rather than the more appropriate department, security. Riley then said, "well, we'll say it's his driving record, but in a month or so when this blows over, he can come back and work." Riley gave him Ens Jr.'s last checks; Riley never called Ens Jr. to inform him of his discharge.

When Ens Sr. went home that evening he informed his son that Riley said that he was fired for dealing in dope, but Riley would go along with calling it a discharge for a poor driving record. (That afternoon, when Ens Jr. finished work, he could not find his timecard to punch out). Ens Jr. told his father that the allegation was untrue, and he denied at the hearing that he had ever sold or used a controlled dangerous substance.

On May 4, Ens Jr. filed an 8(a)(1) charge with the Board against Respondent Contracting alleging that Respondent Contracting restrained and coerced its employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. This charge does not specifically allege that Ens Jr., the Charging Party, was discharged in violation of the Act.

Between May 6 and May 13, Ens Sr. went to speak with Riley, and before the discussion began, Oriel walked in. Ens Sr. told them that he had heard rumors that he and Ricks were the next ones to be discharged; Oriel said that it was not true. Ens Sr. then said that he had spoken to his son and he still was unsure whether to bring a lawsuit against them or Exxon. Riley then informed him that they had received notice of the unfair labor practice charge that Ens Jr. had filed. According to Ens Sr.'s testimony, Riley then said, "Who said anything about dope?" and Ens Sr. said, "You did." Riley asked Oriel if he (Riley) had said anything about dope and Oriel said that he had not. Ens Sr. protested and left.

Oriel testified that Ens Jr. was discharged for the following reasons: " . . namely because he would not work overtime for me. He had a poor driving record. He was caught in the refinery speeding many times by Frank Riley.[6] And he refused to listen to me, only to his father, and that and stories that were going around the shop at the time. As he was supplier for any type of drugs that you would want." Oriel testified that, within a week prior to Ens Jr.'s discharge, he was informed by Miller that he had purchased drugs from Ens Jr. Miller testified that he has purchased marijuana from Ens Jr. The closest he could estimate the time of this purchase was "within a year" of Ens Jr.'s discharge. He also testified that he reported this to Oriel, but he did not testify as to when he did so.

Oriel testified that Riley made the decision to discharge Oriel. Oriel also testified that he would not have recommended discharging Ens Jr. until he heard of the drug dealing, and at that time he recommended to Riley that he be discharged. He also admitted that he heard of the drug allegations regarding Ens Jr. a month prior to his discharge. Regarding one of Respondent Cambridge's other reasons for discharging Ens Jr.—his alleged refusal to work overtime—Oriel testified that he "almost always" refused to work overtime for him, while he did work overtime for his father.[7]

On May 18 Ens Sr. reported for work as usual. At or about 3:30, while he was preparing the daily reports, Oriel said to him, "it's layoff time." Ens Sr. said "layoff time?" and Oriel said "yes." Ens Sr. asked, "What reason are you giving for firing me?" Oriel said, "You are not doing your job." Ens Sr. asked him what he meant and Oriel repeated that he was not doing his job. Ens Sr. told Oriel that he would probably have another Labor Board case on his hands, and left. He testified that he had never been warned about his work performance prior to that.

Oriel testified that a number of reasons contributed to Ens Sr.'s discharge. One reason was:

> Fred Ens Sr. had a pickup truck he was allowed to take home every evening and weekends. In that pickup truck, he would carry, besides the gas in the truck itself, three or four or five gallon cans, which he used during the day to fill pumps or trucks that ran out of gas. Now, it seemed that every weekend he would fill up those cans and bring them back Monday morning empty. On top of that, on Sunday I came to work and he was filling up the cans on a Sunday morning with keys to the gas pump that he shouldn't have had, and to the office that he shouldn't have had, to unlock the electrical part of the gas pumps to start them up.

Oriel testified that this event occurred 2 or 3 months prior to the discharge of Ens Sr. and, after the event, he changed the keys on the gas pump and the office. He testified that the reason they did not discharge him at that time was that in about January there was an explosion at the Exxon refinery which tripled his work force. Although he had convinced Riley, by then, that Ens Sr. should be discharged, they could not do so until they could locate a replacement for him. In or about February, Oriel asked a retired Exxon coordinator to take the job, but he refused. They therefore waited until the explosion cleanup was completed in mid-May and, at that time, discharged Ens Sr. and replaced him with Miller, at first on a temporary basis but, according to Oriel's testimony, 6 months later Miller was given the job permanently because he had performed the job well. Oriel was asked why he waited so long before replacing Ens Sr. with Miller when he knew in February that the retired Exxon coordinator would not take the job. He answered that he did not feel that Miller could handle the job earlier, with all the extra work caused by the explosion; however, by May that cleanup work had been completed. At that point in his testimony (in answer to a question from me, after direct and cross-examination) Oriel testified that for 3 months prior to Ens Sr.'s discharge they had complaints about their work under Ens Sr.'s supervision; they did not discharge him earlier because of the heavy workload.

[6] Riley did not testify.

[7] On cross-examination, Oriel testified that after he told Ens Sr. to inform Ens Jr. that he was fired, Ens Sr. told him that Ens Jr. was going to the Labor Board. I would find that Ens Sr. informed Oriel of this in a later conversation, not on May 3. For one thing, Ens Sr. never testified to this. Additionally, I find it unlikely that a person who has been given a double shock of hearing that his son has been fired, and for dealing in dope, would immediately answer that his son was going to the Labor Board.

Oriel also testified that, in early May, Ricks came into his office and said that, although he did not want to cause trouble, he wanted Oriel to know that Ens Jr. had made a statement in front of all the employees (during the country's gas shortage) that his family had no problem with gas because his father could take as much as he wanted out of there. Ricks testified that, on the day Ens Sr. was discharged, he (Ricks) called Ens Sr., who said that he was told that one of the reasons he was fired was because Ricks had told Riley that during the gas shortage Ens Jr. had made the statements that they did not have to worry about gas because his father got it from Respondent Cambridge. After Ens Jr. told Ricks this, Ricks went to Oriel's office where Miller was present, and told Oriel that he (Ricks) had not made the statement in question, that it was Miller who said it. According to Ricks' testimony, Miller made no denial and Oriel said that Riley was not going to let anybody run his business. Miller testified that he never heard Ens Jr. make the alleged statement about Ens Sr. taking gas from Respondent Cambridge nor did he inform anyone that Ens Jr. had made such a remark.

Oriel testified that the other reason Ens Sr. was discharged was because he persisted in doing his paperwork (the daily timesheets that are transmitted to Exxon for billing purposes) in the afternoon, when he should have performed the work in the morning. He testified that "quite a few times" he told Ens Sr. that he should not leave the job to do his paperwork; that he was paid a half hour overtime, daily, so that it would not interfere with his presence at the jobsite, and yet he continued to report back to Respondent Cambridge's office at 3 or 3:30 to perform his paperwork. Ens Sr. testified that he was supposed to do the paperwork anytime he had the chance and Oriel never complained to him that he should be at the jobsite with the other employees rather than doing the timesheets in Respondent Cambridge's office at 3:30

Ricks testified that on May 18, at or about 5:30 p.m., as he was walking toward the train station, Oriel stopped his car and gave him a ride to the station: "And in the course of my riding with him to the station he said there is not going to be no union at Cambridge."

Ricks left the employ of Respondent Cambridge in December. He was served with a subpena from General Counsel at the hearing in Case 22-CA-9254 on January 24, 1980; he appeared on that day at the Labor Board, as did Riley and his wife, Oriel, and Miller. Ricks did not speak to any of these people, and never testified as the case was settled prior to hearing by the payment of a total of $3,500 to Ens Sr., Ens Jr., and Sherrick and the posting of the Board notice, supra, which was complied with by Respondent Cambridge.

Ens Sr. was hired at Respondent Pruss on July 14 (there is no contention by Respondent Pruss that he was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act during his employment there); Ens Jr. was hired by Respondent Pruss on December 7;[8] Ricks, on December 31.

The next event of importance herein was a meeting between Oriel, Riley, and Victor Cappetta, manager of the chemical cleaning division of Respondent Pruss, and an admitted agent of Respondent Pruss; this meeting took place in Cappetta's office and he placed the time of the meeting as mid-April 1980. Also present at the time was Respondent Pruss' garage man. Cappetta testified that when Riley and Oriel walked into his office they were furious. Riley said that there was damage done to his equipment the previous night and "this nonsense has got to stop." Cappetta said that he knew nothing about it, and Riley said, "This has got to stop, otherwise I'll take my own actions." (He did not specify what these "actions" would be, nor did Cappetta ask him what actions he would take; Cappetta testified: "I didn't bother to ask him. Because at that time he was fit to be tied.") Cappetta asked Riley about 10 times who did the damage, but Riley would not tell him.

The only other witness to this conversation to testify, Oriel, testified that Riley told Cappetta (whom he had known for years) that there was some damage done to his equipment[9] and he was pretty sure he knew who did it. He wanted it known that he wanted it stopped and wanted no more. Cappetta asked Riley nine times whom he was referring to, but Riley refused to tell him. Oriel testified that he and Riley felt that Ens Jr. had done the damage to the truck because Miller told them that Ens Jr. had threatened to damage their equipment. (Miller did not testify regarding this subject.) Oriel testified that they spoke to Cappetta "to let them know we knew who did it and ask it to be stopped." Although Riley did not name Ens Jr., "I assumed that they knew the circumstances . . . of which Fred Ens, Jr. used to work for us." He also testified that they went to Cappetta to get a warning to Ens Jr. without him being singled out. They did not name Ens Jr. to Cappetta because of the prior Labor Board matter with him.

[8] The brief of Respondents states: "Ens Jr. started with Pruss on December 7, 1979, after the settlement aforesaid." That is not correct; Ens Jr. obtained his employment with Respondent Pruss 6 weeks prior to the settlement agreement.

[9] Oriel testified that one of Respondent Cambridge's vehicles had an oil drain hose cut in half while parked at the Exxon refinery the prior evening or that morning. Oriel saw it and testified that there was no doubt in his mind that it had been cut. Ens Sr. testified that, after this, he spoke with a mechanic of Respondent Cambridge who told him "somebody broke an oil line and it could have broke itself."

Ens Sr. testified that, about 2 days after this conversation, Cappetta told him that Riley and Oriel came to see him and told him that guys were tampering with his trucks. Cappetta asked who it was and Riley said, "You know who the guys are." Cappetta said that if he knew who they were he would not ask him and Riley said, "Who's the three guys that brought me up on charges to the Labor Board." Ens Sr.'s testimony continues: "Then he went on to say—Vic Cappetta—that Frank Riley told him, I got ten million dollars and I'll go in that Refinery and cut the price[10] so bad that nobody will be making money on big jobs."[11] Both Cappetta and Oriel specifically deny that Riley mentioned the $10 million figure; although neither specifically denied Riley's alleged statement of "The three guys that brought me up on charges to the Labor Board," I believe their numerous denials that Riley mentioned any names can reasonably be construed as a denial of this alleged statement.

Shortly thereafter, Cappetta informed Paul Pruss, Jr., herein called Pruss, vice president of Respondent Pruss, of his conversation with Riley and Oriel. About a week later (the next occasion that he was in the area) Pruss met with his employees at the Exxon refinery 1 day during lunch and informed them that he had heard a complaint about another contractor's equipment, he did not approve of any shenanigans, and he did not want any problems with any of the contractor's including Riley. No names were mentioned.

On May 9, 1980, Respondent Pruss discharged or laid off Ens Jr., Ens Sr., and Ricks. Ens Jr. was employed by Respondent Pruss as an operator driver at their Bayway, New Jersey, location—driving a truck and operating some of its chemical cleaning equipment. When he arrived for work on May 9, 1980, he found a note left for him at Respondent Pruss' clothes trailer at the Exxon refinery. The note stated: "Fred Ens, Jr. Please leave your PCS card and Badge with Tommy. Paul is reforming the acid company seperate [sic]. So you are laid off temp. and Golie." It was signed "Ron."[12] Nothing was said to him about it and nobody was there for him to question. He had lost his PCS (prescription card), but he did leave his badge in the office and left. Fell testified that Ens Jr. was laid off for lack of work, as was Ricks and they were chosen because they had the least seniority. Ens Jr. was recalled to work by Respondent Pruss in August 1980; admittedly, when he returned to work for Respondent Pruss there was one employee—Flo Ruiz—working for them who had not been employed there when Ens Jr. was laid off. Ens Jr. filed a grievance with the union representing Respondent Pruss' employees. It was determined that an employee had been hired for a 2-day period in May 1980 and therefore Respondent paid Ens Jr. 2 days' backpay. His case for backpay for the entire period of his layoff (due to the presence of Ruiz and others) is still pending. Fell testified that there were occasions during Ens Jr.'s layoff when Respondent Pruss employed others: "We get jobs at the last minute from Exxon. We can't afford to call in and get people from outside which are already laid off. He may not be home. So we call the Bayonne refinery [another operation of respondent Pruss] and they have extra men, which they might be slow, they alternately send them over to us for a couple of days. We send them back again.

Ricks testified that on May 9, 1980, Fell handed him a layoff slip and said that he was going on vacation for 2 weeks and when he returned Ricks and Ens Jr. would be transferred to Respondent Pruss' Elizabeth terminal to work with Ens Sr. He was never recalled. Fell testified that Ricks was originally laid off for lack of work, although he was dissatisfied with Ricks because of his poor attendance record; he testified that from January through May 9, 1980, Ricks only appeared for work on or about 60 days, although he could have worked every day during that period but he was often out sick. Ricks testified that he could not remember whether he worked more or less than half the workdays during this period. After Ricks' layoff Respondent Pruss and the union representing its employees discussed the matter; Fell told the union that because of Ricks' poor attendance record he wanted to discharge him, rather than lay him off. The union determined that because of his poor attendance record he had not completed his probationary period and his layoff was converted to a discharge. No grievance or arbitration was filed regarding this layoff/discharge.

Ens Sr. was discharged by Respondent Pruss on May 9, 1980. Ens Sr. testified that, a day or two before Cappetta allegedly informed him of his conversation with Riley and Oriel, he was told by Fell to call Pruss, at the Philadelphia office. Pruss told him that he had a complaint from Ronnie Grue (who is in charge of chemical cleaning for Exxon in the area) that Ens Sr. did not use an inhibitor[13] on a certain job. Ens Sr. told him that he was wrong and that one of the employees who did the cleaning job with him was present and he could tell Pruss that they did use the inhibitor and Grue was a witness to it. Shortly thereafter, Ens Sr. met Grue and asked him about his complaint to Respondent Pruss that he (Ens Sr.) had not used an inhibitor in the acid; Grue told him that he never made such a complaint. About 2 days later while Ens Sr. was in Respondent Pruss' trailer with Cappetta, Grue walked in. He told Cappetta and Ens Sr. that he never made a complaint to Pruss and that he was present when Ens Sr. and his crew put the inhibitor in the acid.

[10] As stated, supra, both Respondent Cambridge and Respondent Pruss are engaged in the same type of business and both perform work at the Exxon refinery. They were described as "friendly competitors." Ens Sr. testified that at one time Respondent Cambridge had almost all of the Exxon work, but that Respondent Pruss was "cutting in on them."

[11] Counsel for Respondent objected to the entirety of Ens Sr.'s testimony regarding the Riley, Oriel, and Cappetta conversation as hearsay. I overruled the objection on the ground that the statement was an admission and not hearsay under Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2). Although it is not entirely clear in the record, my ruling was meant to apply only to Respondent Pruss, the only one of Respondents for which Cappetta is an agent. It appears to me that there is no way that Respondent Cambridge can be bound by Cappetta's alleged statements to Ens Sr. and even the General Counsel appears to agree, when he stated: "Do his statements bind Cambridge? Probably not."

[12] Although there is no allegation in the consolidated amended complaint that "Ron" (Ron Fell) is a supervisor for Respondent Pruss, Respondent Pruss admits the allegation of the consolidated amended complaint that Ens Jr. was laid off on or about May 9, 1980. "Tommy," the name in the note, was his foreman that day.

[13] An inhibitor is a chemical that is put into the acid (hydrochloric acid or phosphoric acid) that is used to clean tanks, exchangers, pipes, and lines at the refinery. The inhibitor stops the acid's reactions after the cleaning job has been completed.

Ens Sr. testified further that about 2 weeks later he saw Pruss outside Respondent Pruss' trailer in Bayway and the first thing that was said was Pruss said to him, "You're a liar." Pruss then spoke about people damaging his equipment and how expensive it was to repair the equipment. They then walked into the trailer and Pruss again called Ens Sr. a liar. Ens Sr. told him that the next time he called him a liar without a reason he would hit him. Pruss then said that he could not think straight because he was taking his medicine and that he was not going to lose everything that he and his father had worked for. Ens Sr. said he did not know what he was talking about and that was the extent of that conversation.

About 2 weeks later (May 9, 1980) Pruss called Ens Sr. to his office at the end of the day. Cappetta was present also. Pruss took some papers from his briefcase and handed them to Cappetta who looked them over and returned them to Pruss. Pruss said to Ens Sr. that he lied on his employment application; Ens Sr. asked how he lied and Pruss said, "I had a check run on you and you served time."[14] Ens Sr. said, "You think that's something to be proud of? I go around bragging about that? Why didn't you ask me about it and I would have told you." Pruss told him that he was going to have to let him go and gave him his paycheck and a check for a week's vacation. Ens Sr. asked if there were any chance of his returning to Respondent Pruss and Pruss said that he could not think straight. Ens Sr. walked out of the office with Cappetta, who told him, "Give him a day or two to calm down." He never returned to the employ of Respondent Pruss.

On June 26, Ens Sr. filled out an application for employment for Respondent Pruss.[15] One of the questions asked is: "Have you ever been convicted of a crime, excluding misdemeanors and summary offenses?" He answered "no." On direct examination (prior to the introduction of his employment application) Ens Sr. was asked how he answered this question and he testified: "I actually don't know if I filled it out." On cross-examination, Ens Sr. repeated that he did not know whether he answered that question; when asked why he did not state on the application that he had been convicted of a crime, he testified: "Because when I asked Vic Cappetta should I fill that all out, he said all they want is name, social security number and deductions." When he was asked whether the application asked for a lot more than that, Ens Sr. testified that he did not know what else he filled out; "It was one of those deals where I met the fellow [Cappetta] on the outside of the gate. When I asked him, you want me to fill out all this stuff, and he said you are hired."

Cappetta testified that he did not personally know Ens Sr. prior to his employment at Respondent Pruss, but he had seen him at the Exxon refinery while he was employed at Respondent Cambridge, and he did not know that Ens Sr. had a prison record at the time he was hired by Respondent Pruss. He learned of it about a month prior to Ens. Sr.'s discharge from Pruss who told him: ". . . he had a record. He had been in prison . . . we all know it now. For this reason, we can't tolerate this kind of character." Cappetta also testified that he gave Ens Sr. the employment application to fill out and expected him to "fill it out thoroughly"; he testified that he did not tell Ens Sr. simply to fill out his name, address, and social security number on the application. After he gave Ens Sr. the employment application he left and did not see it again; it went to Respondent Pruss' office in Philadelphia.

Fell testified that while Ens Sr. was employed by Respondent Cambridge he saw him at the refinery and, occasionally, spoke to him, just as he spoke to the other employees of Respondent Cambridge, but he did not learn that Ens Sr. had a prison record until Pruss informed him of it about 2 weeks or a month prior to his discharge. Pruss told him that he had done the check because they were losing a lot of tools. According to Fell's testimony, Ens Sr. was not discharged at that time because they were in the middle of a job and they needed him until the job was completed. Fell also testified that during the period of the employment of Ens Sr. and Ens Jr. many tools started disappearing. Although they did not speak to them about the missing tools, Respondent Pruss "just assumed" that they were responsible for the loss of these tools; he discussed this loss with Pruss and that was another reason for the discharge of Ens Sr.

Pruss testified that in about February or March 1980 Cappetta and Fell informed him that some of their equipment was missing. About a month later he received an "anonymous tip" that one of his employees "may have an unsavory background." In regard to this "tip" he testified to the following: ". . . [it] sort of like got around through the grapevine back to me. . . . I don't even remember [whom he heard it from]. I was bullshitting with a couple of guys in the smoke shanty, that kind of thing. . . . Like I said, I heard scuttlebutt. They said something to the effect that did you know that Fred Ens was in jail, or something like that, and I said no, what are you talking about? And they said well, you'd better check it out. That was the extent of the conversation. That's when I called the investigator. . . In other words, this party came to me and said hey, I heard the man had a record. But I don't want to be accused."

After the conversation, Pruss examined Ens Sr.'s employment application and saw that he did not list any conviction; he then employed a private investigator to check into Ens Sr.'s background (this was about a month prior to Ens Sr.'s discharge). As to way he employed the investigator, Pruss testified:

> Well, a combination of things. Equipment started to disappear from some of our locations. We couldn't point a finger on anybody, but it just didn't add up. The thing wasn't making sense that all of a > sudden after so many years the equipment is starting to walk off the job the way it did.

[14] Ens Sr. went to prison for receiving stolen property, larceny, and bookmaking. This occurred in 1973 while he was employed by Respondent Cambridge. After being in prison for about 6 months he was eligible for the work release program and returned to Respondent Cambridge's employ at that time.

[15] The application states, inter alia: "I hereby certify that the facts set forth in the above employment application are true and complete to the best of my knowledge. I understand that if employed, falsified statements on this application shall be considered sufficient cause for dismissal."

> So when this subject was brought up about Ens Sr. I called this private investigator and asked his opinion. He said better check it out. I said okay, go ahead, and that's what I did. You know, I retained him to investigate.

Sometime thereafter, Pruss received a certified statement from the clerk of Union County, dated April 29, 1980, certifying to Ens Sr.'s convictions. He testified that he waited until May 9, 1980, to discharge him because he was in the middle of a job, for which he needed him, and waited until the job was completed. Pruss also testified this was not the first occasion when equipment and tools were missing; "I mean occasionally guys will lose a tool. But you don't start losing hundreds of dollars worth of equipment in a matter of weeks, and it just walks off the job." He then testified: "The equipment problems was going on for a period of months, because both Ronnie Fell and Vic Cappetta complained to me about it. . . . And then it sort of came to a head when this stuff was brought to my attention that Mr. Ens had an unsavory background. And I might add that since these people are no longer with me, I'm not losing the hundreds of dollars worth of tools anymore, either."

On rebuttal, Ens Sr. testified that while employed by Respondent Pruss he used his own tools, and at the beginning of his employment there, Fell informed him that tools were being left on the job are stolen, and named two employees whom he thought were taking the tools—George Heinkel was the name he remembered.

V. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSION

Where there are credibility issues to be resolved (which is not too often herein) I would credit Respondent's witnesses over Ens Sr., Ens Jr., and Ricks. Respondents' witnesses, and most especially Oriel and Miller, appeared to me at the hearing to be testifying in a frank and truthful manner. Although Ens Sr. and Ricks did not appear obviously untruthful in their testimony, there were aspects of their testimony that indicated to me that they were not being entirely truthful. Ens Sr. initially testified that he did not know if he answered the question on Respondent Pruss' employment application regarding convictions for a crime. It appears to me that an individual applying for a job who had recently been in prison would look hard and long at that question; the attitude of society being what it is, he must have been fearful that if he answered yes he would not get the job, while, at the same time knowing that if he answered no, and his background were discovered, he could be summarily discharged. It is certainly not the type of question that Ens Sr. would forget. For that reason I would find that Ens Sr.'s testimony lacked some credibility.

My reason for finding Ricks' testimony somewhat less than credible is not as obvious as my reason stated supra regarding Ens Sr. Ricks began working for Respondent Pruss on December 31 and worked there until May 9, 1980. Respondent Pruss' witnesses testified to Ricks' extremely poor attendance record during his employment there, testifying that of the 90 to 95 workdays during this period Ricks only appeared for work on or about 60 days, although he could, and should, have worked every day. Ricks' testimony that he could not remember how many days he worked or whether he worked more or less than half of the available workdays during this period does not ring true to me. It would appear to me that an employee beginning employment with a new employer would be more cognizant of his attendance record, at least for the first few months, and especially if he were absent from work as often as Ricks was. Additionally, Ricks appeared to me to be somewhat evasive at times in his testimony. Lastly, because I found Miller to be a frank and truthful witness, I would credit his testimony that he purchased marijuana from Ens Jr. and, where necessary, I would credit his testimony over that of Ens Jr.

The first issue to be decided (pursuant to the order of Associate Chief Administrative Law Judge Dyer) is whether Respondent Cambridge violated the terms of the informal settlement agreement entered into on January 24, 1980. In that agreement Respondent Cambridge agreed, inter alia, that it would not discharge or otherwise discriminate against its employees because of their membership in Local 394 or any other labor organization and it would not, in any like or related manner, interfere with, restrain, or coerce its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

Settlement agreements will not be set aside absent a breach of their provisions or the commission of subsequent unfair labor practices. Mohasco Industries, Inc. (Laurens Park Mill), 172 NLRB 2079 (1968); Sundstrand Castings Company and Sundstrand Corporation, 209 NLRB 414 (1974). The basis of the General Counsel's allegation that the settlement agreement should be set aside is the April 1980 conversation between Riley, Oriel, and Cappetta; this is the only basis for the General Counsel's allegation since there is no allegation that Respondent Cambridge engaged in any other unfair labor practices subsequent to January 24, 1980.

I have found, supra, that Ens Sr.'s testimony regarding his conversation with Cappetta about his April 1980 conversation with Riley and Oriel is hearsay as to Respondent Cambridge and is binding only upon Respondent Pruss as an admission under Federal Rules of Evidence 801(d)(2). It would therefore be of no assistance in overturning the settlement agreement and so Ens Sr.'s version of this conversation will be temporarily put aside. Cappetta's and Oriel's version of this conversation is that Riley told Cappetta that damage had been done to his equipment and it had to stop. Cappetta asked Riley 9 or 10 times who did it, but Riley refused to tell him. The only difference between their testimony regarding this conversation is that Cappetta testified that Riley said that he would take some unspecified action if the damage did not stop (Oriel never testified to this) and Oriel testified that Riley told Cappetta "he was pretty sure he knew who did it."

The logical question that arises is why did Riley and Oriel speak to Cappetta at all if they refused to divulge the name of the person who they felt did the damage. The General Counsel would allege that, even absent the naming of the alleged culprits, the purpose of the visit was in the nature of a signal to Respondent Pruss to take some action against Ens Jr., or Ens Jr. as well as Ens Sr. and Ricks. Just as I found Oriel to be a credible witness I find his explanation for the visit not unreasonable; one of their trucks had been damaged and they assumed (from what Miller told them) that the damage was done by Ens Jr.; they were afraid to single him out because they had been "stung" by the Labor Board settlement 3 months earlier, but they wanted the word sent out to all of Respondent Pruss' employees at the Exxon Bayway terminal (including Ens Jr.) that they did not want it to happen again. According to Oriel, it seemed like the safe way to accomplish their purpose.

On the basis of the above, I would find insufficient evidence to establish that Respondent Cambridge violated the terms of the January 24, 1980, settlement agreement. Their visit with Cappetta had a legitimate purpose and there is no probative evidence that it was accomplished in any unlawful manner. The January 24, 1980, settlement agreement will therefore be reinstated.

The remaining issue to be considered is whether the discharge of Ens Sr. on May 9, 1980, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act and whether the discharge of Ricks on May 9, 1980, and the layoff of Ens Jr. from May 9, 1980, through August 1980 violates Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act. The consolidated amended complaint alleges that Respondent Pruss discharged or laid off Ens Sr., Ens Jr., and Ricks because they joined or assisted Local 394 or engaged in other protected concerted activities, and because they filed charges or participated in a Board proceeding under the Act; it is also alleged in the consolidated amended complaint that Respondent Pruss took this action because Respondent Cambridge requested it to do so.

I have found, supra, that Respondent Cambridge did not violate the January 24, 1980, settlement agreement by the visit of Riley and Oriel to Cappetta's office in April. I would likewise find that there is insufficient evidence to establish the allegations in the consolidated amended complaint that Respondent Pruss discharged or laid off Ens Sr., Ens Jr., and Ricks because Respondent Cambridge requested it to do so. As stated supra, Riley and Oriel had a valid reason for speaking to Cappetta (the damage to their truck) and they accomplished this task in a careful, lawful manner. Clearly, they never specifically asked that the employees be discharged or laid off and the evidence is insufficient to establish that this conversation was meant to serve as a signal to Respondent Pruss to take action against these employees.

The only allegation remaining, therefore, is that Respondent Pruss discharged or laid off Ens Sr., Ens Jr., and Ricks because of their activities on behalf of Local 394, other protected concerted activities, or their participation in the filing of, or participation in, a Board proceeding. This allegation must also fall. Without the assistance of the General Counsel's allegation that Respondent Cambridge instigated the discharge and layoff of Ens Sr., Ens Jr., and Ricks by Respondent Pruss, there is not a scintilla of evidence that these terminations were unlawful. Ens Jr., in his employment application with Respondent Pruss, stated that he had been discharged from his employment at Respondent Cambridge because of his union activity and he was hired nonetheless; additionally, Respondent Pruss' employees are represented by a union. As regards the allegation that they were terminated in violation of Section 8(a)(4) of the Act, the Board proceedings, at that time, involved only Respondent Cambridge and had no effect upon Respondent Pruss. Without finding that Respondent Pruss acted on May 9, 1980, against Ens Sr., Ens Jr. and Ricks as a favor to Respondent Cambridge or in fear of what Respondent Cambridge would do if they did not so act (which I have not found, supra.) there is no evidence that Respondent discharged Ens Sr. and Ricks, and laid off Ens Jr. in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, and these allegations against Respondent Pruss will therefore be dismissed.

That is not to say that the discharges and layoff of Ens Sr., Ricks, and Ens Jr. are beyond suspicion. All occurred on the same day, about a month after the visit by Riley and Oriel. Respondent Pruss exlains this as being caused by a work slowdown and the fact that these individuals were the least senior employees. I am also skeptical regarding Ricks' discharge; it was originally a layoff, but when the layoff was grieved the union determined that he had not worked enough days to complete his probationary period, and the layoff was converted to a discharge; this appears to be contrary to the practice followed by unions I have observed. However, the General Counsel, in order to have his contentions sustained, must show more than establishing that Respondent's case is suspicious. Under Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), he must establish "a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a 'motivating factor' in the employer's decision." The General Counsel has not sustained that burden herein.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Cambridge Contracting, Inc. and Respondent Cambridge Chemical Corp., a single integrated business enterprise, is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent Paul P. Pruss & Son, Inc., is an employer within the meaning of Section of 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. Local 394, Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. Respondent Cambridge has not engaged in conduct in violation of the informal settlement agreement entered into on January 24, 1980.

5. Respondent Cambridge has not engaged in any conduct in violation of the Act as alleged herein.

6. Respondent Pruss has not engaged in any conduct in violation of the Act as alleged herein.

ORDER[16]

It hereby is ordered that the consolidated amended complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

It is further ordered that the informal settlement agreement entered into between the parties on January 24, 1980, and vacated and set aside by the Regional Director for Region 22 of the National Labor Relations Board on November 26, 1980, is hereby reinstated.

DECISION AND ORDER

MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On March 16, 1981, Administrative Law Judge John M. Dyer issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed cross-exceptions and briefs in support thereof and in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.

1. The General Counsel excepts to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to find that Respondent additionally violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when, on November 13, 1976, Respondent's president, Newman, interrogated employee Phyllis Hicks regarding her willingness to cross the picket line in the event of a strike, and in the same conversation told Hicks that if they did not have the Union he could afford to pay some of them better wages. We find merit in this exception.

The Administrative Law Judge correctly stated that the standard to be applied in determining the lawfulness of Newman's conduct is that applied in Mosher Steel Company, 220 NLRB 336 (1975). Thus, questions about employee strike intentions which are not accompanied by threats, promises, or other coercive conduct are not per se unlawful, but must be judged in light of all of the relevant circumstances. We find that Newman's questioning of Hicks, occurring in the context of his statement that if they did not have the Union he could afford to pay some employees better wages, exceeded the bounds set forth in Mosher Steel, and that Respondent, by Newman's conduct, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. We shall amend the Administrative Law Judge's Conclusions of Law and recommended Order accordingly.

2. We also find merit in the General Counsel's exception to the Administrative Law Judge's failure to find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act when, following the strike, it denied reinstatement to probationary employees Dale Thomas and John Carpenter.

It is well established that an economic striker who has not been permanently replaced is entitled to reinstatement upon making an unconditional offer to return to work, absent a showing by the employer that its refusal to offer reinstatement was based on legitimate and substantial business justifications.[3] Further, the denial of reinstatement to an economic striker, absent legitimate business reasons, is so inherently destructive of employee rights that evidence of specific antiunion motivation is not needed.[4] We find that Respondent has not met its burden here. Thus, there is no evidence that

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. Administrative Law Judge Ivar H. Peterson conducted the hearing in the instant case in May 1977. Following the issuance of his Decision, the Board remanded the case for additional findings. Before issuing a Supplemental Decision, however, Administrative Law Judge Peterson retired. After obtaining statements of position from the parties, the Board issued an order remanding the case for a hearing de novo by a new administrative law judge. Subsequently, however, the Board approved a stipulation entered into by the parties that the case be decided by a new administrative law judge based on his own review of the original record and his own findings of fact and credibility resolutions independent from the Decision previously issued by Administrative Law Judge Peterson. Thereafter, Administrative Law Judge John M. Dyer was assigned to issue a decision. It is the Board's established policy to attach great weight to an administrative law judge's credibility findings insofar as they are based on demeanor. However, in contested cases the Act commits to the Board itself the power and responsibility of determining the facts as revealed by a preponderance of the evidence, and the Board is not bound by the administrative law judge's findings of fact, but bases its findings upon a de novo review of the entire record. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). Administrative Law Judge Dyer's credibility findings are based on factors other than demeanor, and in consonance with the Board's policy set forth in Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., supra, we have independently examined the record in this case. We find that there is no basis on the record in this proceeding for reversing his credibility determinations or his findings of fact based thereon.

[2] Employee Hicks testified to a conversation on November 15 or 16, 1976, with Director of Marketing Miller, in which the latter allegedly asked her whether she intended to cross the picket line in the event of a strike. Miller denied having any conversation with Hicks. The Administrative Law Judge, assuming arguendo, without deciding, the truthfulness of Hicks' testimony, found that no violation had been established. We find it unnecessary to reach this issue since the finding of such an additional violation would be cumulative and would not materially affect our Order.

We adopt the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Miller did not threaten employee Mihuc in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by stating that Respondent was going to close the plant during the winter and that Miller and Respondent's president, Newman, were going to go to Florida. In so doing, however, we disavow the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Miller's words were not meant seriously. Rather, we find, in agreement with the Administrative Law Judge, that in the context in which it was made the statement did not constitute a threat.

In view of the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion, which we adopt, that employee Holibaugh was not discharged in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act, we find it unnecessary to pass on the Administrative Law Judge's statement that, even had the discharge been unlawful, the strike would not have been an unfair labor practice strike.

either Thomas or Carpenter was ever warned or otherwise advised prior to the strike that his work was unsatisfactory. Indeed, the only evidence regarding Respondent's decision not to offer them reinstatement is Supervisor Lascelles' self-serving testimony that after the strike he asked Thomas' and Carpenter's foremen about their work and was told that it had been poor. It is therefore clear that Respondent has not demonstrated that Thomas and Carpenter in any event would have been discharged prior to the unconditional offer to return,[5] or that its refusal to offer them reinstatement was otherwise justified by substantial and legitimate business reasons. Accordingly, we find that, by its conduct, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Insert the following as new Conclusions of Law 7(d) and 8 and renumber the subsequent paragraph accordingly:

"(d) Coercively interrogating employee Phyllis Hicks regarding her willingness to cross the picket line in the event of a strike.

"8. By discriminatorily failing and refusing to reinstate economic strikers John Carpenter and Dale Thomas upon their unconditional offer to return to work, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act."

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Mobile Home Estates, Inc., Bryan, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Insert the following as new paragraphs 1(f) and (g) and reletter the subsequent paragraph accordingly:

"(f) Coercively interrogating employees regarding their willingness to cross a picket line in the event of a strike and informing employees that, if they did not have the Union, Respondent could afford to pay some of them better wages.

"(g) Discriminatorily refusing to reinstate, upon their unconditional offer to return to work, employees who participate in an economic strike."

2. Insert the following as a new paragraph 2(c) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly:[6]

"(c) Offer John Carpenter and Dale Thomas immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, with interest, to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). (See Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).)"

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection
To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

WE WILL NOT do anything that restrains or coerces employees with respect to these rights.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize, meet, or bargain with International Union, Allied Industrial Workers, AFL-CIO, and its Local 712, as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the following unit:

> All production and maintenance employees at Respondent's Bryan, Ohio, place of business, but excluding plant clerical employees, office clerical employees, road service employees, truck drivers, and guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that their Union is no good and costs them money and they should resign from it and form their own union.

WE WILL NOT urge employees not to engage in a strike and not to support their Union.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate employees regarding their willingness to cross a picket line in the event of a strike.

WE WILL NOT discriminatorily fail or refuse to reinstate, upon their unconditional offer to return to work, employees who participated in an economic strike.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with the above-named Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described above, and, if any understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

WE WILL provide the Union with the information it requested in its December 10, 1976, letter and with any similar information it may request.

WE WILL offer our employees John Carpenter and Dale Thomas immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without loss of seniority or other rights and privileges, and WE WILL make each of them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of our discrimination against them, with interest.

MOBILE HOME ESTATES, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOHN M. DYER, Administrative Law Judge: Following the issuance of an Order by the National Labor Relations Board, herein referred to as the Board, remanding this case to the Administrative Law Judge who originally heard the proceeding and his becoming unavailable, the parties hereto, Mobile Home Estates, Inc., herein referred to as the Company or Respondent, International Union, Allied Industrial Workers, AFL-CIO and its Local 712, herein referred to as the International and the Local and collectively as the Union, and the counsel for the General Counsel, herein referred to as the General Counsel, expressed their desires on how to proceed to the Board, and it issued an Order remanding the proceeding to the Regional Director for a hearing de novo. Following the issuance of a notice of hearing by the Acting Regional Director on July 2, 1980, the parties stipulated that this case could be referred to an administrative law judge for issuance of an original and independent decision based on that administrative law judge's own analysis, review, findings, and conclusions in this matter, and not adopting or relying on the findings and conclusions in the Decision of the prior administrative law judge. Following an agreed motion and stipulation, to the Board, it issued an order on September 18, 1980, granting the motion, approving the parties' stipulation, and ordering the chief administrative law judge to designate an administrative law judge for the purpose of issuing and serving upon the parties a written decision on the record containing findings of fact, specific resolutions on the credibility of the testimony of witnesses, conclusions of law, and recommendations. The Chief Administrative Law Judge appointed me and I, with the agreement of the parties, set a date for receipt of their briefs in this matter. Briefs received from Respondent and the General Counsel have been studied and considered, together with the record and exhibits.

The complaint, as amended, sets forth the jurisdiction and commerce allegations and the status of the Union, all of which are admitted. Respondent admitted the supervisory status of Company President James Newman, Director of Marketing Steve Miller, Plant Manager Clarence Brannun, and Plant Superintendent Lascelles. Respondent admitted that it had recognized the International as the bargaining representative of a production and maintenance unit at Respondent's Bryan, Ohio, place of business in March 1972 and signed a 3-year contract with the Union which was in effect from November 13, 1973, through November 14, 1976. Respondent denied that the Union represented a majority of its unit employees until the date of its answer, but admitted that the Union had requested negotiation and collective bargaining with it up through December 10, 1976.[1] It admitted that certain employees struck Respondent from November 20 until December 1 and that the Union notified Respondent the strike was terminated as of December 1, and made an unconditional offer to return to work on behalf of the employees engaged in the strike. Respondent admitted it terminated Harry Holibaugh on November 18 and had not reinstated him, and that the Union on December 10 had requested of it the names and addresses of all bargaining unit employees and it had not honored that request.

Complaint paragraphs 12 through 37, as amended, contain allegations that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by various interrogations, refusals to consider the Union's wage demands and threats to close the plant, conducting direct negotiations with employees, suggesting the formation of a separate union, and seeking resignations from the Union. Many of these paragraphs are nearly identical in language with the exception of a date. Unfortunately, the General Counsel's brief does not designate which testimony he contends supports the individual paragraph allegations, and I have made assumptions that certain testimony was meant to substantiate certain items in the complaint.

[1] Unless otherwise specified, all dates herein refer to the fall and winter of 1976 and the first few months of 1977.

The complaint also alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by unilaterally instituting pay raises and increasing the existing piece rate and bonus without notifying and bargaining with the Union, and that Respondent engaged in a course of bad-faith bargaining. It is further alleged that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike and that Respondent did not reinstate 12 named individuals at the conclusion of the strike and laid off or terminated some of them because they had engaged in a protected strike, in violation of Section 8(3) and (1) of the Act. A separate refusal to bargain is alleged in regard to Respondent's refusal to provide the information requested by the Union in its letter of December 10.

Respondent denies that it violated the Act in any manner. Specifically, it states it had good reason to believe that the Union no longer enjoyed the majority support of the unit employees following the conclusion of the strike and at that time it determined not to further recognize or bargain with the Union. It denies that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike but urges that its inception was economic and that it had reached an impasse with the Union in regard to pay matters and that, when it granted certain raises which it had offered to the Union during negotiations, it was completely within its rights.

In essence, Respondent admits that, when the strike became imminent, it sought information from employees as to whether they would cross the picket line and work since it had decided to stay open during the strike and needed information to determine whether that course of action was feasible. Respondent also admits that, when asked by the employees what wage rates it would pay during the strike, it informed the employees that it would pay the rates it had offered to the Union.

Respondent offered various defenses regarding the 12 employees who were not immediately reinstated. According to it, some of those people quit prior to the strike and some were probationary employees who were not brought back since it determined they would not make good employees. Others were brought back shortly after the strike and some were recalled later, primarily because they were not needed since Respondent's business was down. Although Respondent hired five or six employees before it brought back some of those alleged as discriminatees, it stated that those hired were needed for particular jobs which those strikers were unable to perform. Respondent stated it terminated Holibaugh because he slowed down on the job and refused to perform; it denied that his union activity influenced its decision. Respondent offered various explanations for other allegations and denied it had performed certain actions.

In determining credibility where there are conflicts between witnesses, I have credited Belknap only in areas where he is corroborated by other individuals or testified to an event similar to other credited testimony. Some of Belknap's testimony went considerably further than other General Counsel witnesses and appeared to me to be embellishments on fact or his conclusions rather than direct reporting of events. In deciding to credit Belknap only partially, I noted his denial of a prior felony conviction and am not convinced by his explanation of that testimony. Belknap's rebuttal denial that Lascelles was a supervisor and "in fact I never seen Ron Lascelles or ever heard of him until I went back to work," meaning following the strike, is incomprehensible when compared to his previous testimony that Lascelles was one of the foremen of the Company and that he had heard Lascelles ask Holibaugh to perform certain work. It appears that Belknap completely disregarded his prior testimony in trying to make a point during his rebuttal testimony. Taking all of these matters together, I have concluded that Belknap's testimony is not reliable unless in the circumstances cited above.

I have not credited Holibaugh completely since there were times during his testimony when he seemed to be evasive, and I believe the testimony preponderates against him in regard to his statements about overtime, both for himself and others, and whether he urged slowdowns.

Some of the General Counsel's witnesses who worked during the strike appeared to favor Respondent's version of events and appeared more friendly to Respondent than the Union or the General Counsel. Where they testified to what President Newman or other supervisors said which might be considered violative of Section 8(a)(1), I have credited that testimony. A number of witnesses did not recall events and where opposing witnesses were able to cite what took place and give details, the opposing witnesses have been credited.

In applying Board law to the facts which I hereafter find, I have concluded that Respondent did not engage in a course of conduct, refusal to bargain, which was alleged as violative of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. I did find that Respondent did not have sufficient reason to decide that the Union no longer represented a majority of its employees and that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act in refusing to recognize the Union as the representative of its unit employees and negotiate with the Union following the strike, and further violated Section 8(a)(5) in refusing to give the information the Union requested in its December 10 letter. I have also determined that Respondent, through President Newman, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when he told certain employees, who had said they would work during the strike, that they could form their own union. It was also found that Director of Marketing Miller violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in his conversation with employee Mihuc.

I have found that the strike was an economic strike and that the parties were at impasse over wage rates and that Respondent's paying the rates and amounts which were the same or less than what it had offered to the Union during negotiations was proper and that it did not violate the Act by telling employees who stated they intended to work during the strike that it was going to pay such amounts. Since Respondent had decided it wished to run the Company during the strike and the strike appeared imminent after the last bargaining session, inquiries made of employees as to whether they intended to work during the strike were proper under Board law. Where questions were asked by employees in regard to the possibility of being fined by the Union, I do not find that the answer given by Newman that the employees could resign from the Union to forestall such action violated the Act, nor do I find that Respondent initiated or sponsored the document begun by employee Piper for resignations from the Union.

On the basis of the evidence, I have concluded that Holibaugh was not discharged in violation of the Act. Respondent's explanations for its recall or nonrecall of the 12 named individuals, one of whom the General Counsel agreed to exclude and drop from the complaint, I find have not been rebutted by the General Counsel and I have determined that Respondent did not violate that allegation of the complaint.

Insofar as the record shows, all parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally at the hearing held in this case.

On the entire record in this case, including the exhibits and testimony, and noting the contradictions in the testimony, and on the credibility resolutions I have made, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. COMMERCE FINDINGS AND UNION STATUS

Respondent is an Ohio corporation with its plant and office in Bryan, Ohio, where it engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale of mobile homes. During the 1976–77 period Respondent annually purchased and received, directly from points outside Ohio, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000.

Respondent admits, and I find, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Respondent admits, and I find, that International Union, Allied Industrial Workers, AFL–CIO, and its Local 712, are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Undisputed Facts

Most of the allegations in the complaint concerned Company President James Newman who, together with his wife and daughters, owned and controlled the Company. Newman testified that he was the principal designer of the mobile homes his Company built and, to a large extent, designed and built the building used by the corporation. The original complaint alleged that Steve Miller occupied the position of "supervisor" and was an agent of Respondent acting in its behalf and a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Respondent's answer to the complaint admitted the allegation of the complaint, except it denied that Miller occupied that position. Miller's position, according to Respondent, is that of director of marketing. In regard to the 8(a)(1) complaint allegation about Miller, Respondent took the position that Miller was not a supervisor of the employees in the unit, but that his capacity was head of sales and directing salesmen, and denied that he had been made a supervisor for a day over the employees in the production and maintenance (P and M) unit. From the admissions and from the testimony, it is clear that Miller is a supervisor in the sales department as director of marketing, and whether he had direct supervision or not over the P and M unit employees for a short time is immaterial since he is still a supervisor acting in Respondent's behalf and speaks for the Company in his capacity. Therefore, Respondent is responsible for the remarks I found he made.

The sales department inspected finished trailers to determine that they met Company product standards before accepting them for delivery to customers. Miller and other salesmen would examine mobile homes and mark a "squawk sheet" identifying needed repairs or work. If minor matters were involved, such as puttying over nail holes or removing excess putty, etc., the salesmen or Miller might effect the repair.

Under Newman were Plant Manager Clarence Brannun and Plant Superintendent Ron Lascelles. Respondent in its 10 or 11 departments had senior employees who were designated as group leaders and were paid 10 percent more than regular employees for their work. The parties appear to have agreed that they were not supervisors. According to Respondent, its operation was cut up into a number of subdivisions and there might or might not be a group leader in each of these subdivisions.

Respondent built both single and double-wide homes which would start their journey through the plant at the first station where the frame was placed, followed at other stations by the floor, then the walls and various work done at the stations until the product was ready to be rolled out of the plant at the last station and placed in the yard. Sometimes final finishing touches or repairs were needed after the product left the plant, while it was in the yard.

Respondent did not produce products for inventory but built only for a confirmed order which it tried to fill in 3 weeks.

During the fall of 1976, Respondent had 40 P and M unit employees according to the available exhibits, and they were producing around three single homes a day. Newman said he sought to produce a floor, that is one single-wide product or half of a double-wide home, with the expenditure of 120 man-hours or less.

During the fall Respondent received an order for six double-wide units, which were to be fancier and better finished than its regular products and consequently took more time to complete. But since 12 floors would be only a small percentage of Respondent's production of 3 floors a day over a 2-or 3-month period, this order would not explain the slowdown in production Respondent testified it experienced.

The plant is partially open and apparently it is rather difficult to work in some parts of the plant during cold weather. Respondent stated that usually the winter season brings a slump in orders and for the two winters prior to the 1976–77 period it had closed its plant completely except for a few personnel.

Respondent stated that its orders were low in the winter of 1976–77 and it did not need to replace all of its employees and return to its prestrike complement for that reason; additionally, it sent some employees to prepare and show its product at an annual mobile home show in Louisville, Kentucky, and these employees were gone for several weeks.

The 3-year contract between Respondent and the Union, among other things, contained a checkoff authorization clause and a provision that the employees in the unit were to become members of the Union after 30 days' employment. The contract also provided for a 45 working day probationary period for all employees and contained a clause that either party had to give the other 5 days' notice if it wished to terminate the contract.

Respondent claimed that initially it did not deduct dues since authorization cards were not provided for a period of more than a year after the contract commenced. Eventually dues authorization cards were provided and the employees signed them and dues and initiation fees were thereafter deducted from employees and forwarded on a monthly basis to the Union.

The employees belonged to an amalgamated local union whose offices were somewhere other than in Bryan, Ohio. During the summer of 1976, there was a renewed interest in the Union and regular monthly meetings of Respondent's employees began to be held. The members sought their own local union, petitioned for it, and it was granted by the International. An election was held in August and officers, a bargaining committee, and stewards were elected. William Hamilton was elected president, Harry Holibaugh, vice president, Phyllis Hicks was elected secretary and became the treasurer after the strike commenced following Denny Sanders' resignation from the Union. Employees Piper, Eddy, Paxton, Sheets, and McCloud were trustees.

Respondent and the Union entered into negotiations for the renewal of the contract in October and met on five seperate occasions, the last date being Friday, November 12.

Among the objects which the Union sought were a minimum wage scale of $5 per hour and the elimination or some modification of compulsory overtime. The Company had proposed a wage scale less than what the Union sought and suggested a new pot bonus system which would pay employees, after deducting labor and other costs, 7-1/2 percent of the inventory price of the finished product. It was agreed by Union Representative Campbell during his testimony that the 7-1/2 percent pot bonus figure would be in excess of 10 percent of the employees' wage rates.

At the November 12 negotiation meeting, the parties went through various proposals. Some agreements were made but the main sticking point was wages. After receiving a different proposal from the Company and the Union's rejecting it, the parties left the meeting room. They met outside on the street, conferred further, went back inside and met again, secured agreement on a few other items, and Respondent revised its wage rates to a base in the first year of the contract of $3.65 per hour, with $3.85 for employees with 6 months' seniority, and $4.10 an hour for employees employed longer than a year. Raises for the second and third year appear to average somewhere around 7 to 8 percent. The union negotiating committee again rejected Respondent's offer as insufficient but said it would take it to a meeting of the employees, although recommending against it, and that the meeting would be held on Sunday, November 14.

There were 32 employees at the union meeting on Sunday, November 14, and they rejected Respondent's final contract proposal by 31 to 1. A vote was then taken on whether to strike and the result was 28 for striking, 2 against, and 2 void.

A notice reciting the rejection of the Company's offer and terminating the contract signed by Roy Campbell was delivered to Newman at home by Holibaugh, Belknap, and Eddy who told Newman, when he asked, that the action meant the employees would strike as of midnight November 19-20.

Holibaugh was terminated on Thursday, November 18. A picket line was established at the Company's premises shortly after midnight on Saturday, November 20. It appears that some 13 people who were on dues authorization prior to the strike signed a document resigning from the Union, and most of them worked during the strike. The number of employees who picketed dwindled during the strike and some of the employees who stayed out and did not work did not picket.

The picketing employees held a meeting in the evening of December 1 and decided to terminate the strike. Union Representative Campbell informed his superior of the vote, and his superior said he would notify the Company by letter. Some of the picketing employees returned to work the following day. A letter from the Union, dated December 1, making an unconditional offer on behalf of all striking employees to return to work, was received by the Company between December 2 and December 3. According to the complaint and amended complaints, the 12 people listed in paragraph 39 were not returned to work then and some were never asked to return to work.

On December 10, Union Representative Campbell sent a letter to President Newman requesting a list of all employees with their dates of hire, addresses, rates of pay, and the department in which they were working. The letter also requested the continuation of dues deductions and stated that the Union was prepared to resume contract negotiations on December 21, 22, or 23. Newman's return letter, dated December 14, stated that according to the contract and Respondent's attorney the Company could not deduct dues from the employees but enclosed a list showing the amounts deducted from employees for November. Campbell responded on December 17, saying Newman had not answered his request for further negotiations and for the information sought in his previous letter. On the same date Respondent's counsel wrote Campbell, saying that because of previous commitments he would be unable to meet on the negotiation dates proposed by the Union and suggested that the Union call him after the first of the year to make arrangements for a negotiation date. He stated that the checkoff authorizations expired with the termination of the contract and Respondent would not deduct dues from any of its employees' wages.

There were no further negotiation meetings between the parties, with neither of the parties seeking to get in touch with the other and the Union filing the initial charge in this case on December 27.

B. Events Prior to the Strike

1. Phyllis Hicks was one of the most senior employees at Respondent and built cabinets for installation in trailers. In August 1976, she was elected recording secretary and was a member of the negotiation committee, participating in the five negotiation sessions. During the strike she became the treasurer when the Union replaced members and officers who had resigned from the Union. She testified that after either the second or third negotiation session in late October, while she was in the cabinet shop, Newman said he had offered a fair contract. She said she did not think it was fair because the wages were not much different from those in the prior contract. Newman said he could not afford to pay $5 an hour (base salary) but would have to close his doors because he would go bankrupt. Hicks was asked to name the members of the negotiation committee, she did so, and then was asked if they were present during this conversation, and the transcript shows she said yes. This answer would certainly nullify the allegation.

Hicks testified that on Saturday, November 13, while in the cabinet shop, Newman asked if she would cross the picket line if there was a strike. She said she would but would not bring her car across the picket line and Newman responded that either he or one of the supervisors could bring her through the picket line. She testified Newman said if they did not have the Union he could afford to pay some of them better wages.

She had another conversation with Newman later on the same day in uptown Edgerton, Ohio, in which she again told Newman she would cross the picket line. He said the Company had offered a just and fair contract and they would bring her across the picket line. She stated that Newman said she would have to withdraw from the Union so she would not be fined.

On the following Monday, she saw Newman near the cabinet shop and told him she would not cross the picket line. He told her he would bring her across the picket line, but she repeated she would not cross it.

Newman testified he decided to try to keep the plant open for work in the event the employees struck and he attempted to determine whether enough employees would cross a picket line to make his decision feasible. He agreed that he and Phyllis Hicks talked on and off about the strike for a couple of weeks prior to it and that she told him she wanted to work and he told her he would help her come across the picket line. Newman also stated that some of the employees told him they were afraid to work during the strike because they had been told they could be fined $500 by the Union if they did so. He said he asked his counsel about it and was told that employees could not be fined if they were not members of the Union and he in turn gave this information to a number of the employees. Newman admitted he spoke to Phyllis Hicks about the negotiations and the amount of pay the Union was demanding and stated that what he said to her was the same thing he had said to the entire union negotiating team during negotiations, and Hicks said that was true. Newman said that on Monday Hicks reversed herself and said she was not going to work during the strike; she said she had received some threatening telephone calls and was worried. Although stating at one point that she did not tell Newman on Monday, November 15, about being concerned because of threatening telephone calls, Hicks later said she might have discussed the subject with Newman and acknowledged that she did receive a telephone call and was afraid for her daughter.

The above testimony appears to relate to complaint paragraphs 12 and 13. Complaint paragraph 12 alleges that Newman interrogated an employee regarding the employee's intention to cross the picket line on or about November 13.

It was apparent following the union committee's rejection of Respondent's contract offer on November 12 that the parties were headed for a strike. In these circumstances and considering both Newman's question to Hicks and his later questions to other employees in the following week as to whether they would work during the strike, it appears that Mosher Steel Company, 220 NLRB 336 (1975), controls the situation rather than W. A. Sheaffer Pen Company Division of Textron, Inc., 199 NLRB 242 (1972). The Board has held that inquiries of employees as to their strike intentions are not per se unlawful where the record shows there is a reasonable basis for fearing a strike and respondent seeks information on which to determine whether it can keep its business open during the strike. One caveat is whether such inquiries are coupled with threats or promises. I find that the discussions between Newman and Hicks did not contain threats or promises and that these were questions asked by Newman to determine whether to attempt to keep his business open. I would therefore dismiss complaint allegation 12, finding that it is not substantiated.

Complaint allegation 13 alleges that Newman threatened an employee with plant closure rather than "reasonably considering the Union's wage demands, in order to discourage employees from engaging in a protected strike." Hicks' testimony was that Newman said he could not pay $5 an hour and would have to close his plant doors because he would go bankrupt.

Prior to this time, Respondent and the Union had engaged in five negotiation sessions and Respondent had made three different wage proposals, altering its proposal a second time during the last negotiation session. It is clear that Respondent did consider the Union's wage proposal, made several counterproposals, and rejected the Union's proposal on the ground it could not afford it.

There is nothing in Hicks' testimony that would show Respondent did not reasonably consider the Union's wage demands, and the General Counsel has not demonstrated by any other evidence that Respondent did not "reasonably consider" the Union's position. The lines on pay were drawn sharply with the Union proposing and not backing away or compromising on its $5 position.

The fact that Respondent did not accept the Union's position but argued that having a basic rate that high would bankrupt it is not any proof that Respondent did not consider the Union's position in a reasonable manner.

The testimony falls far short of supporting complaint paragraph 13, and I find, accordingly, that this allegation must be dismissed.

Complaint paragraph 15 alleges that Newman on or about November 13 unlawfully suggested that an employee resign from the Union "in order to avoid engaging in a protected strike and further, to avoid being fined by the Union for failure to engage in an authorized strike." The testimony of Hicks was that Newman said she would have to withdraw from the Union so that she would not be fined after she told him that she would cross the picket line. Newman asserted in his testimony that his response to employees concerning fines was based on their questions to him concerning the issue. It is clear that Newman did not say anything to Hicks about resigning from the Union "in order to avoid engaging in a protected strike." The Board has found violations where an employer urged employees to resign from the union in an effort to undermine union strength or undercut employee support of a strike. This was not the case here. The employee, known by the Company to be a union member and officer, had said she would cross the picket line and physically not support the strike, and the information was given to her on the basis of current rumors that union members who crossed the picket line would be fined $500.

In these circumstances, I would not find that Newman violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act since the threat of fines was being bruited around and this information was given to an employee union member who said she would cross the picket line. There is no testimony that she did not ask Newman about the fines. Accordingly, complaint paragraph 15 is dismissed.

2. Hicks testified that on either November 15 or 16, while in the cabinet shop, Steve Miller asked if she was going to cross the picket line if there was a strike and she told him that she would not cross the picket line.

The General Counsel's brief states that employee Darlene Dangler corroborated that Miller approached Hicks. However, Dangler's testimony is only that she saw Hicks and Miller talking.

Miller denied that he had any conversation with anyone in the cabinet shop and specifically said that he had no conversation with Hicks.

Assuming, without deciding, that Hicks' testimony is correct, I would find it insufficient to support the complaint allegation. There are no accompanying remarks which would threaten or promise anything to Hicks. The issue is whether this, by itself, is unlawful interrogation.

Miller, as the director of marketing and head of sales, had a direct interest in whether trailers were going to be manufactured and produced through an impending strike. Although Miller did not have Newman's responsibility in making the decision whether to operate during the strike, he was a supervisor who could report his findings to Newman. There appears to be no coercion extant or intended in this conversation, and I find that the testimony does not support the complaint paragraph and that paragraph 17 must be dismissed.

3. Jan Piper, who had worked for the Company some 4-1/2 years and was the person with the most seniority, testified that between November 13 and 15 President Newman asked if he would work during the strike and he replied that he probably would.

Assuming that this testimony is meant to support complaint paragraph 16, I find that it does not substantiate it and that complaint paragraph must be dismissed.

As stated above, after negotiations had terminated and possibly after the employees had voted to strike, there was no question but that a strike was imminent, and Respondent, seeking to determine whether it would have enough employees to run the plant during the strike, asked some of its employees if they would work during the strike. This questioning in this manner and for this purpose was proper and not coercive interrogation. See Mosher Steel, supra. Therefore, complaint paragraph 16 must be dismissed.

4. Kenneth Brown testified that after the strike vote had been taken he asked if Newman was going to keep the plant open and Newman said, "Yes, who is going to work?" Brown said he talked to Newman about going to the Edgerton plant (Mini Mansions, a sister corporation) if Newman was not going to keep the Bryan plant open. Dennis Sanders testified that during the week of November 14 Newman asked if he was going to strike, and he said it looked like it and asked Newman if he could work if Newman was going to stay open. Newman said he was going to stay open and Sanders could work if he wanted to.

Presuming that the testimony of Brown and Sanders is meant to support complaint paragraph 19, I find and conclude that these remarks and questions by Newman were proper under these circumstances and I accordingly will dismiss complaint paragraph 19.

5. It is not known what evidence the General Counsel would assert substantiates complaint paragraph 20 which alleges that Newman interrogated an employee during the first 3 weeks of November regarding the employee's opinion as to whether employees would engage in a strike. If the General Counsel was relying on the testimony of Phyllis Hicks or Kenneth Brown, and knowing of no other testimony which might be relevant, I do not feel that such testimony supports this complaint paragraph and I accordingly would dismiss paragraph 20.

6. The General Counsel has not suggested what testimony substantiates complaint paragraph 23. The only testimony which seems to come somewhere near the allegation that Newman interrogated an employee concerning the employee's knowledge of other employees' intentions of engaging in a strike would be Brown's testimony that, after he asked if Newman was going to keep the plant open, Newman said, "Who is going to work?" If this testimony is meant to substantiate complaint paragraph 23, I find that it fails to do so. The context of the conversation would not permit such a strained interpretation. There being no other testimony which I can find which would substantiate this complaint paragraph, I dismiss complaint paragraph 23.

7. Complaint paragraph 18 alleges that Newman threatened employees during the week of November 14 that Respondent would close its plant rather than reasonably consider the Union's wage demand for the purpose of discouraging employees from engaging in a protected strike.

Nile Eddy, who had been with the Company a number of years, was a member and trustee of the Union and on the bargaining committee. He attended three or four negotiation sessions, resigned from the Union prior to the strike, and worked during the strike. At the time of the hearing in this case he was an assistant supervisor and was called by the General Counsel as an adverse witness.

Eddy said he, along with others, rejected the Company's contract proposal and voted to strike and was one of the three who went to Newman's house to give him the message that the Union had rejected the Company's offer and voted to strike. During the week prior to the strike Eddy talked to Newman about the bargaining positions, stating that he thought what the Union asked for was fair and asked why Newman did not want to pay the the $5 base rate. Newman said a lot of people in the factory were not doing their jobs and that he could not pay people who were lazy and stood around doing nothing. Eddy asked why they could not get rid of those people. Newman replied that if they could get rid of the people that did not want to work he could afford to pay a halfway decent wage. During this conversation Newman asked if they were going to strike, and Eddy replied that they were not putting barrels out there for nothing. Eddy said that, though he did not remember it precisely, it is possible Newman said if the employees went out on strike he would probably have to close the plant.

Employee Anthony Paxton, who had been with the Company over 2 years at the time of the strike, said he told Newman while they were conversing in the plumbing department that he would strike for more benefits but not for more money. Newman said he could not pay $5 an hour, that he would close the plant down before he would pay that much because people were not doing their jobs and he would lose money. Paxton said he agreed with Newman that he would lose money at that rate.

There is no testimony or evidence that Respondent would not or did not reasonably consider the Union's wage demand, as noted supra. The statements in the context shown above do not amount to a coercive threat to close the plant but rather appear to be statements of what Newman felt might become necessary if the employees did not work during the strike or if Respondent had to pay a wage rate which it thought would drive it into bankruptcy. Again, presuming that Eddy's and Paxton's testimony is meant to substantiate complaint paragraph 18, I find and conclude they do not do so and I dismiss paragraph 18.

8. Employee Ernest Williams, who was a group leader, stated that on Thursday, November 18, Newman asked if he was going to work on Monday. He told Newman there was a strike vote and there would be a strike and he would be on the picket line.

Complaint paragraph 22 alleges that Newman interrogated an employee on or about November 19 regarding the employee's intention to engage in or refrain from engaging in a strike. Assuming that Williams' testimony is meant to substantiate complaint paragraph 22, and/or complaint paragraph 24 which is phrased precisely the same, I find that the testimony does not substantiate either paragraph and that they should be dismissed on the basis that questioning an employee as to his intention to engage or not engage in a strike where the strike is imminent and respondent is attempting to keep its plant open during the strike is not coercive or violative of the Act as per Mosher Steel, supra, and I dismiss complaint paragraphs 22 and 24.

9. Gary Woodall testified that on November 18 Newman asked what he thought about the whole matter pertaining to the strike and he replied that he did not care and walked away. He said that Newman asked him this question two or three times that day.

Employee Robert Belknap testified he was asked by Newman in one part of their November 18 talk what he felt about the Union and he responded that it was good for both the Company and the employees. Newman said he meant concerning what they were negotiating for. Belknap replied that they were being fair in what they asked for, and Newman replied that they were not, that $5 an hour was not fair because it would break him and that a lot of the employees would slack off and not work if they were getting $5 an hour. Belknap said he replied, "You're the boss and you could weed out those people that won't work and get rid of them and get employees that will work." He said Newman asked what he thought about working under a gentleman's agreement and going nonunion if they went out on strike. He said he replied no, that he had taken an oath when he joined the Union and he felt obligated to the people he represented who had voted him in office. He said Newman said he would make it worth his while if he would stay and he replied no, he could not do it. Newman supposedly then said Belknap was not being fair, and he replied that he could not withdraw "like you want me to." The conversation turned to an injunction the Company was going to get, and Newman was asked whether he had shown Nile Eddy some canceled orders and he responded yes, because he could not fulfill the contracts. Belknap said he asked why Newman did not tell that to the entire committee. Newman supposedly responded he was glad that was brought up, that he could make it worthwhile if they withdrew from the Union, stayed in the shop, and worked instead of going out on strike. He said he told Newman he could not do that and Newman said they were not going to hurt him, he would have a new crew coming into the plant. He also stated that Newman said there would be a piece of paper coming around the shop for people who would stay and work to sign and, if he changed his mind, the paper would be floating around.

Complaint paragraph 21 alleges that Newman unlawfully interrogated an employee regarding the employee's attitude towards the Union and the employee's position on the Union's bargaining demands. If Woodall's testimony is meant to substantiate this allegation, I find that it does not do so.

As stated supra, in view of Belknap's overall testimony and the attack on his credibility, I have determined not to credit Belknap in areas which are not corroborated by other employees or where there is no credible similar testimony. It appears that Belknap embellished his testimony since he retreated from it somewhat during cross-examination.

Newman testified that about 2 days prior to the strike he talked with Belknap concerning whether Belknap would work during the strike; Belknap said he would not and hoped there would not be any hard feelings. Belknap told him that one of the reasons was that the people had elected him and he felt an obligation since he was on the bargaining committee and was afraid of violence. Newman told Belknap there were no hard feelings. Belknap said Newman would not have the trouble if he paid $5 an hour. Newman replied he could not afford to. Newman denied saying anything about Belknap's membership in the Union or withdrawing or resigning from the Union. He also denied that he had a conversation with Belknap about working under a gentleman's agreement. He said he had mentioned those words when he had talked to a group of employees in the sidewall department earlier that week. He stated that at that time Sanders, Paxton, and six or eight other employees had asked if they could work during the strike and he told them that he was going to have the plant open and anybody who wanted to could come in and work. They wanted to know whether they would be under a contract and he replied no, but they could have a gentleman's agreement between them. Newman denied stating anyting to Belknap about a paper going around, saying he did not know anything about any paper until Piper showed him a paper in the lunchroom the day prior to the strike.

As between Belknap and Newman, I credit Newman's version of the events. It appears from the transcript that Newman had a good grasp of the facts and was able to detail what occurred, when, and who was present. Belknap's testimony seemed to be hazy in comparison.

Insofar as complaint paragraph 21 is concerned, I credit Newman's version of the conversation and find that Newman was asked by Belknap what he was going to do during the strike, and he replied that he was going to get some new people if they went out on strike, and that they had a conversation concerning whether Belknap would work during the strike. Accordingly, I dismiss complaint paragraph 21 as not being substantiated by the testimony of either Belknap or Woodall, or of Holibaugh infra , and I do not find any other credible testimony which would tend to support this paragraph.

In regard to complaint paragraph 36, which I assume is meant to be substantiated by Belknap, I find that Belknap's testimony does not substantiate it and that it must be dismissed.

Paragraph 36 alleges that Newman engaged in direct negotiations with employees and sought assistance of the employees in undermining the Union and dissipating its majority status "by coercively suggesting to them that they resign from the Union, draft and circulate a petition among employees for the purpose of soliciting resignation from the Union, form their own separate Union and enter into a separate 'gentleman's' agreement with Respondent governing the employees' terms and conditions of employment."

Belknap was the only witness of all of the General Counsel's witnesses to suggest that Newman said there would be a paper going around the shop for people to sign who would stay in and work. I credit Newman's denial of having any such conversation with Belknap. Newman readily admitted using the term "gentleman's agreement" but stated that it did not occur in any single conversation with Belknap but was mentioned to a group of employees that he talked to in the sidewall department when they had asked if they could work during the strike and wanted to know if they would be under a contract. There is nothing to suggest in his answer that a "gentleman's agreement" meant that they were going to have a separate contract. Newman discussed with employees that he would pay them the amounts which he had offered to the Union during the negotiations. Since there is no reliable testimony to tell us what a "gentleman's agreement" would consist of, I can only assume that the language meant that he would agree to pay them the amounts which he stated and not otherwise alter their terms and conditions of employment, and to that extent that was an agreement between them but not a contract.

There is nothing in Belknap's testimony concerning Newman's suggesting employees resign from the Union as such, other than the statement about a paper going around. Further, there is nothing which would demonstrate that Newman suggested a paper be drafted and circulated to such purpose, and there is no testimony by Belknap that Newman suggested that the employees form their own separate union. Accordingly, on the basis of my credibility determinations and the lack of support for the allegation in complaint paragraph 36, it must be dismissed.

Complaint paragraph 27 alleges that Newman engaged in direct negotiations with an employee "by coercively informing the employee of Respondent's opinion of the Union's wage demands." Assuming that this allegation is meant to be substantiated by Belknap's testimony, I find that the testimony does not substantiate the allegation and I am not completely clear that this allegation sets forth a violation of the Act, in that it is not clear what is meant by "coercively informing." In any event, I find that complaint paragraph 27 is not substantiated by any credible evidence and must be dismissed.

Complaint paragraph 28 alleges that on or about November 18 Newman engaged in direct negotiations with an employee and promised a benefit by informing the employee Respondent would enter into a separate gentleman's agreement with him if he refrained from engaging in a protected strike.

Assuming that this complaint allegation is meant to be substantiated by Belknap's testimony, I note again that I do not credit Belknap completely and do credit Newman's version of the conversation he had with Belknap. Noting again the reference to a gentleman's agreement, I find that this complaint paragraph has not been substantiated by any credible testimony and it must be dismissed.

10. Charles Albertson, who had been with the Company approximately 4 months at the time of the strike, was a welder and a member of the Union. He testified he had a conversation with Newman on the day before the strike in the frame shed in which Newman said he was not going to meet the Union's demands and was planning on taking a trip to Florida and closing the place down in December anyway. According to Albertson, Newman also said that while the employees were out on strike they would not be drawing any unemployment and they could starve as far as he was concerned.

Newman testified that on November 17, which was his birthday, he was in the frame shop with Steve Miller, Albertson, and others, and someone said to Miller that they ought to go to Florida. Newman said the plant would be locked up for the winter anyway and he thought he would go down there and buy a condominium and, turning to Albertson, joked, "Why don't you come down and wash my car and mow my yard?"

With the historical background that the plant had been closed during the two previous winters and, here, a strike was imminent which might possibly close the plant depending on how many people came in to work, and these remarks being made in fun according to both Newman and Miller, I find that there is no violation of the Act as alleged in complaint paragraph 26 because I do not find that these were threats of Respondent's economic reprisals if the employees struck. I further find that there is no substantiation for the allegation that Respondent would not reasonably consider the Union's wage demands as explained supra.

Assuming again that complaint paragraph 26 is meant to be substantiated by the testimony of Albertson, I find that it does not do so and accordingly I will dismiss complaint paragraph 26.

11. Complaint paragraph 14 asserts that on or about November 18 or 19 Respondent assisted employees in the preparation of "a petition" setting forth union members' intentions to resign from the Union and allowed the petition to be circulated among its employees throughout its facility.

Jan Piper testified that he had a meeting with Newman and employees Sanders and Paxton in the office on either November 18 or 19. He testified that they went to the office to tell Newman they wanted to work during the strike because they needed the money. Newman said he was not allowed to negotiate with them. Piper, without attribution, said there was some talk about resigning from the Union and forming their own union and working under a gentleman's agreement where they would look out for each other, but he was not sure that Newman said anything about resigning from the Union. Newman did say something about a gentleman's agreement but Piper could not define it. Piper said Newman might have talked about a 10-percent increase in piecework but was not sure. During the conversation Newman said he would not pay $5 an hour and did not care if they stayed out all winter.

In regard to a "petition" or document, Piper said that he and others in the plant were talking about the possibility of a $500 fine for working during the strike and that this conversation had been going on before they went in to see Newman; he said this might have been brought up during the conversation with Newman.

It seems reasonable from what Newman testified to at various points that, if asked concerning this, Newman would have replied that they could not be fined if they were not members of the Union.

Following the meeting with Newman, Piper went several offices away to Newman's secretary, Mrs. Ellis, and asked her to type something for him. She agreed, and he dictated the folowing: "The following people do not wish to be represented by Roy Campbell or Local 712, Allied Industrial Workers of America." The document contains a typewritten date which appears to be November 18, 1976, and a handwritten 9 over the 8. On the document itself, which is Respondent's Exhibit 2, there are 13 purported signatures. It does not appear that any other employees were with Piper when Ellis typed this paper and an envelope addressed to Union Representative Campbell. Piper said that Ellis had typed other things for him and other employees on occasion. The postage on the envelope appears to be from a postage meter, and Piper testified that he asked someone in the office to put the postage on the envelope. Ellis testified that the postage meter is not in her office and that she was not asked to place the postage on the envelope. She stated that, if she had been asked, she would have charged Piper 13 cents for the postage.

Piper said he took the paper into the plant and gave it to some employees in his department who passed it around and eventually returned it to him, and he mailed it. He agreed that he may have flashed the document in front of Newman but he did not think that Newman looked at it closely, that Newman did not ask to see it but that he showed it when he told Newman that 12 or 13 people would work during the strike.

Newman testified that Piper told him he wanted to work during the strike and that a number of others talked to him about resigning from the Union, including Paxton and Sanders. In regard to the document, he stated that Jan Piper showed it to him the day before the strike in the lunchroom and that he told Piper he did not want it. He testified that he had received advice from his counsel that he should not get involved with anything like that if it went on. He said a copy of it was put in his mailbox on either Thursday or Friday prior to the strike, that it appeared about the same time a group came into his office and told him that they were going to work during the strike and that there were others who would work also.

Newman testified that approximately 2 weeks prior to the strike he was asked by Sanders and others about working during the strike; he told them his attorney had said that if the employees were not members of the Union they could not be fined. Asked if he said anything to a person about not circulating a document when it was shown to him, he said that he did not know that it had been done or when. Newman admitted that on occasions prior to the strike he told some employees that he felt the Union's proposals were unreasonable. He said that a lot of employees had in their minds that they were going to get $5 an hour and that this was unreasonable to him; when he was asked by any of the employees about the negotiations and the amount of pay, he would respond that the Union's demand for that amount was unreasonable.

While the complaint refers to a "petition," it is clear that there was no petition such as to sponsor a decertification or another union that was circulated insofar as this transcript shows. What the General Counsel refers to as a "petition" is actually a statement of resignation from the Union which contains 13 purported signatures.

Complaint paragraph 14 alleges that Respondent unlawfully assisted employees in the preparation of this document, that they knew of it and allowed it to be circulated among its employees in its plant during worktime. To support this allegation, it appears that the General Counsel assumes that Respondent had and enforced in its plant a no-solicitation rule. The transcript and exhibits do not demonstrate that Respondent had or enforced such a rule or that the circulation of a document during worktime was prohibited by Respondent.

Insofar as the testimony demonstrates, there was no participation by any members of management in the preparation or circulation of the document. The only management knowledge demonstrated by the testimony is that it was shown by Piper to Newman at lunchtime. There is no testimony that any supervisor knew or approved of the circulation of the document. Piper testified that originally he had the document prepared and gave it to others to circulate and that, after others had signed it, it came back to him. Thus, there is no evidence as to how many signatures were on it at the time it was shown to Newman. It is just as feasible that the document was completely signed by noontime when Newman saw it, as it is feasible that it was unsigned or partly signed. There is no way of charging Newman with foreknowledge of the circulation of the petition and no way to demonstrate that he knew the petition was circulated in the plant during worktime.

The General Counsel has proved that a secretary for Respondent typed the two-line document on company paper and addressed an envelope with the Union's address. It has not been proven who authorized the expenditure of 13 cents for postage for the envelope.

At best, we have ministerial clerical assistance from Respondent and nothing else proven in regard to the preparation and circulation of this document. On the status of the evidence, the allegations of complaint paragraph 14 have not been substantiated, and I conclude that it must be dismissed.

12. Harry Holibaugh was a member of the negotiating committee both as the vice president and, after President Williams resigned, as the president of the Local. He testified that on November 18, the day he was discharged, while at work Newman asked what it would take to end the strike and he replied it would take what they asked for, $5 an hour. He said Newman replied he could not afford that and at that rate of pay some of the people would not have an incentive and would just goof off. Holibaugh responded that Newman would be surprised how well they would work if he paid them a decent wage. Newman asked again if it would take $5, and he replied yes and the conversation ended.

Holibaugh, after first denying it, admitted on cross-examination that this conversation was practically the same as they had during various negotiation sessions. He agreed that Newman said, if he paid $5 an hour as a minimum rate, there would be no way he could motivate the employees to work.

Newman testified that he had several conversations with Holibaugh concerning the status of the negotiations in the week prior to the strike. He asked Holibaugh if they would ever get things settled and Holibaugh said yes, if they got $5 an hour. He told Holibaugh he could not afford that and testified that this was the same thing they had been saying to one another during the negotiations. Holibaugh stated that maybe they could get some of the men who did not want to work out of the plant but indicated the committee had to have $5 an hour to keep from striking.

It is not known if Holibaugh's testimony is meant to substantiate complaint paragraph 21 which alleges that on November 18 Newman interrogated an employee regarding his attitude towards the Union and his position on its bargaining demands. It is assumed that Holibaugh's testimony is meant to substantiate complaint paragraph 33 which alleges that on November 18 Newman engaged in direct negotiations with an employee in the absence of the negotiating committee by seeking the employee's assistance in settling the strike. Complaint paragraph 34 alleges that during October and November Newman discussed piece rate and vacation pay proposals with an individual and thereby engaged in unlawful individual bargaining. It is not known whether Holibaugh's testimony is thought by the General Counsel to substantiate complaint paragraph 34.

Considering complaint paragraphs 21 and 33 together, the evidence shows that on November 18, less than 48 hours before the strike was due to start, Newman was asking the president of the Union if the strike could be avoided and how. This question was not addressed to Holibaugh as an individual employee, but rather as the principal in-plant spokesman for the Union. If Holibaugh's answer had indicated a change in position, it is likely further negotiations would have ensued. However, his answer demonstrated that the Union was holding fast to the wage demands and was not prepared to compromise it at that juncture. Newman did not indicate his position would change and any prospects for a compromise faded. This conversation was not an effort to circumvent or subvert the Union but rather a question directed by Newman to the Union as to whether some movement could be made at this last minute to avert the strike. Whether the remark was made in a joking or a serious manner is immaterial. I do not find that complaint paragraphs 21 or 33 are substantiated by the evidence. I know of no other testimony which would substantiate the allegations of complaint paragraph 33 and accordingly I dismiss it. Complaint paragraph 21 was considered supra.

If Holibaugh's testimony is meant to substantiate complaint allegation 34, I find that it does not do so for the reasons stated above. Further, there is no testimony that discussions between Newman and Holibaugh took place at any time other than the week immediately prior to the strike.

The next question is whether the testimony of Nile Eddy or Dennis Sanders substantiates paragraph 34. Eddy testified that he told Newman he thought the amount of money the Union asked for was fair. Eddy said he went to Newman's office to talk to him about the status of negotiations and wanted to know why Newman would not agree to the Union's demand. Newman said he could not afford a base rate of $5 when some of the employees would not work. There is nothing in Eddy's testimony about vacation pay. Eddy's testimony will be considered further in regard to complaint paragraph 31 infra.

Sanders testified that during the week prior to the strike he and employees Kenny Brown, Leroy Stantz, Tom Farley, and a few others were discussing what the base rate would be if they worked during the strike. Newman walked by and Sanders asked Newman what the base rate would be if they worked during the strike. Newman said it would be $4.10 for the ones who were there a year, $3.65 for the ones under 6 months, and $3.85 for those between 6 months and a year. They also discussed that instead of the 7-1/2 percent pot bonus on the invoice price they would get a 10-percent wage bonus, which while a higher percentage would be less money than the Company's proposed pot bonus. There is no testimony that anything was said about vacation pay. Sanders' testimony will be considered further regarding complaint paragraph 35.

I do not find that any of these conversations substantiate the allegations of complaint paragraph 34 since the question concerning rates to be paid during the strike was a legitimate question and was asked by the employees of Newman, and Newman responded as both Eddy and Sanders testified. With the subsequent finding that an impasse concerning wages existed prior to the inception of this economic strike and Respondent was free to effectuate the amounts it had offered the Union, it is clear that this was not individual bargaining but an announcement of Respondent's plan. The alteration of the pot bonus was not unlawful, as will be discussed infra.

I do not find that either of these conversations violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and accordingly I will dismiss complaint allegation 34.

Sanders' testimony is assumed to relate to the allegation in complaint paragraph 30 which alleges Newman unlawfully engaged in direct negotiations with employees by offering them Respondent's last wage proposal if they refrained from striking. The testimony does not substantiate this allegation since, as I will find infra, the parties were at an impasse over wages and Respondent, in attempting to work during the strike, could tell its employees what wages it would offer to employees who agreed to work during the strike. Therefore, I will dismiss complaint paragraph 30.

13. Complaint paragraph 32 is very similar to paragraph 30 in alleging that on November 19 Newman negotiated directly with employees by offering them the last wage proposal he had offered the Union in negotiations.

Assuming that Paxton's testimony is meant to substantiate this allegation, I find that it does not and that the paragraph must be dismissed.

Paxton, with fellow employees Beatty and Stantz, was in the plumbing shop on November 19, and they asked Newman if the pay rate during the strike would be the same or different from the rate of the old contract. Newman told them the rate for employees with a year's seniority would be $4.10 plus a 10-percent incentive.

This testimony is similar to that of Sanders in regard to complaint paragraph 30 above and for the same reasons as expressed for its dismissal, I will dismiss complaint paragraph 32.

14. Pat Gentry testified that around November 17 while in the lunchroom, he had a conversatibn with Plant Superintendent Brannun and Director of Marketing Miller. Brannun wanted employees to stay and work overtime, he threatened to fire them if they did not do so, and they were arguing back and forth. The question of the strike was brought up and, according to Gentry, Miller said he would pack up and go to Florida.

Complaint paragraph 25 states that Miller threatened employees on or about November 17 by coercively stating Respondent's intention to close the plant and go to Florida in order to discourage employees from engaging in a strike.

Assuming that Gentry's testimony is meant to substantiate complaint paragraph 25, it does not do so since no threat was made and, according to the transcript, nothing was said about closing the plant. Miller's saying that he would pack up and go to Florida appears nothing more than a statement of what he would do if the plant was struck.

I conclude and find that complaint paragraph 25 is not substantiated by evidence and I will dismiss it.

15. Gwen Mihuc began her employment with Respondent in October 1976. She testified that, while working in the final finish department on November 19, Foreman Lascelles told her that Steve Miller would be acting supervisor that day. She testified that later Miller said the Union was not any good, that the employees should quit it and start their own union because it was costing them money. She testified he said they were going to close the plant down and he and Newman were going to Florida and buy a condominium. Further, she stated Miller said there would be all new people working there in March and none of the people presently working would be there and Respondent had enough people to build trailers without them.

During cross-examination Mihuc said she knew Miller, thought he was the head salesman, and had seen him inspecting trailers and doing some minor repair work. She stated Miller was perfectly serious in his conversation with her and that Miller started the conversation.

Lascelles denied telling Mihuc or anyone else that Miller was to be their foreman for a day. Lascelles stated that on November 19 some of the employees had come to work and then punched out early and he was shorthanded since Respondent was attempting to get as many trailers completed prior to the strike as it could. He asked Miller to stay in the finish department to make sure that things got done right and he told those in final finish to do what Miller wanted to get the coaches properly prepared so they could get them out; but he stated he did not tell the employees that Miller was their acting supervisor.

It would appear, from what Lascelles admitted he told the employees, that some of them may have assumed Miller was their acting supervisor for that day. Whether he was or not, there is no question but that Miller is a supervisor, as Respondent admitted, although he may not have had direct supervision over unit employees. Nevertheless, he is an agent for and speaks for the Company.

Miller recalled a discussion he had at or about that time with employee Vicki Kreischer when Gwen Mihuc and several others were present. Kreischer said there were a lot of rumors going around concerning what might happen and she wanted to work but was afraid to do so, she was going to stay home when the strike started. As to whether anything was said about Florida, Miller said he and Newman had a standing joke about going to Florida and getting a condominium for the wintertime. He said they all laughed about it, including Mihuc. Miller said Mihuc left shortly after that, saying she had a headache and there was a lot of pressure on her.

Respondent, in examining its witnesses accused of violations of Section 8(a)(1), in any number of instances drew direct denials of such testimony from them, in addition to their versions of the conversation. There is no denial from Miller of the direct statements Mihuc attributed to him concerning the Union being no good and that employees should quit it and form their own union because it was costing them money. Accordingly, I find that Mihuc's testimony is undenied and I have no reason not to credit her.

Accordingly, I conclude and find that the allegations of complaint paragraph 29, in regard to unlawfully encouraging an employee to refrain from engaging in a protected strike and from supporting or giving assistance to the Union for the purpose of undermining the Union and dissipating its majority status, and complaint paragraph 37, alleging an attempt to undermine the Union by telling an employee to resign from the Union to form a separate union since it was no good and cost money, are substantiated by Mihuc's testimony. The testimony dealing with the statement about going to Florida and closing the plant during the strike do not come within the ambit of a direct threat according to the bulk of the testimony regarding this statement. Accordingly, I do not find that such a threat was made but, rather, that the words were not meant seriously.

16. Complaint paragraph 31 alleges that Newman on two occasions engaged in direct negotiations with and coerced an employee, informing him that Respondent would pay the requested wage rate, despite the fact that it had been unwilling to pay the rate, if the employee would assist Respondent in undermining the Union and dissipating its majority status.

Presumably this allegation is meant to be substantiated by the testimony of Nile Eddy. As stated above, Eddy went to Newman's office and asked why Respondent could not pay the amount the Union was requesting. Newman replied that a number of people in the plant were not doing their jobs and were lazy and he could not afford to pay people like that if they were going to stand around and do nothing. Eddy testified he said, "Why can't we get rid of those people?" He said Newman replied that, if they could get rid of the people that did not want to work, he could afford to pay a half-way decent wage. Eddy said he told Newman that Newman could weed out and get rid of the people that did not want to work and then Newman could afford the pay raise. Questioned closer by the General Counsel concerning this statement, Eddy said that Newman said, "Well, if we weeded out the bad guys, maybe I would pay the money, if we got the guys that didn't want to work."

The testimony does not substantiate the allegations of the complaint. Apparently, the General Counsel felt that "bad guys" referred to union members, but it is clear that the reference was to employees that Newman felt were not working. Eddy, at that time, was still a union member and a member of the negotiating team. The complaint allegation appears to assert that Newman was attempting to enlist Eddy's aid to somehow help him get rid of union employees and, if successful in dislodging the Union, Newman would pay a $5 base rate. Eddy's testimony will not substantiate such a tortuous reading. The testimony appears to be a discussion between Eddy, a person interested in getting the Union's position across to Respondent that the employees wanted $5, and a response by Newman that he could not afford a base rate of $5 to employees who were not interested in working. The thrust of the conversation is not that Eddy would somehow get rid of the people or the Union, but that Newman should get rid of inefficient or lazy employees. Complaint paragraph 31 is dismissed since I conclude and find that it is not substantiated by any testimony.

17. Complaint paragraph 35(c) alleges that on November 18 Newman engaged in surveillance of union activities at an employee's home in Edgerton, Ohio. Phyllis Hicks testified that an impromptu union meeting of 10 or less employees was held at her home that evening following Holibaugh's discharge. During the time the employees were at her home, she saw a red and white Lincoln Continental driving past her house; she testified that the only person she knows who owns such a vehicle is Newman. However, she could not see or identify the driver of the car nor the license plates of the vehicle. Later, as she was preparing for bed following the union meeting, she saw the car drive past her house again.

Newman testified that he was nowhere near Hicks' house that evening, that he had not known of any union meeting, and that he was home the entire evening because his family gave him a surprise birthday party. Newman said he had a friend who lives in the same community as Hicks, but denied that he had visited the friend that evening.

This allegation must be dismissed since, even crediting Hicks, there is no identification of person or vehicle but only of a red and white Continental. There is not even proof that there are no similar cars in the area.

Accordingly, I dismiss complaint paragraph 35(c).

18. Complaint paragraph 35(b) alleges that Newman attempted to seek assistance of employees in undermining the Union and dissipating the Union's majority status by telling them to resign from the Union.

Employee Paxton testified he asked Newman about union fines, saying he had heard that the Union would fine members $500 if they worked during the strike. Newman replied that the Union could not fine members who resigned from the Union and then worked during the strike.

Belknap testified that Newman told him to withdraw from the Union, but I do not credit this testimony since it is the only testimony attributing such a statement to Newman and, on the credibility resolutions regarding Belknap, I would not credit such testimony. Further, Newman denied doing so.

Newman admitted telling employees who asked him that they could escape from being fined by the Union if they resigned from the Union before working during a strike. He attributed this knowledge to his attorney's advice.

The testimony demonstrates that employees sought assistance from Newman in regard to the subject of fines and he answered their queries by telling them the Union could not fine them if they resigned from the Union prior to working during a strike.

I do not find these statements to be coercive, but merely a response to employees who were concerned about a fine if they did work. While the employer may have been happy to give advice which encompassed resignations from the Union, his answers, based on his counsel's advice, to questions by employees how they could work during the strike without being fined by the Union, are not violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, and accordingly I dismiss complaint paragraph 35(b).

19. Complaint paragraph 35(a) alleges that Newman attempted to undermine and dissipate the Union's majority by suggesting to the employees that a separate union be formed.

Sanders testified that during their conversation Newman said the employees could form their own union. Similarly, Paxton testified that, in his conversation on November 19, Newman said the employees could start their own union and have their representative in the plant.

Newman testified that during the week prior to the strike a number of people talked to him about union membership and fines, saying that they were afraid to work during the strike because Holibaugh was telling them they would be fined $500. He told them, according to his counsel, they could not be fined if they were not members of the Union and that a number of employees spoke to him about resigning from the Union. While denying any conversation with Belknap about withdrawing or resigning from the Union, Newman did not directly deny this testimony of Sanders and Paxton. Newman was asked to deny quite a number of statements attributed to him and he did so on a number of other occasions.

In this instance, I credit the testimony of Sanders and Paxton, who appeared to be, if not completely neutral witnesses, at least favoring the Company to some degree. They were employees of long standing with the Company who had resigned from the Union to work during the strike. Their testimony appears to go against the Company in this instance, and I credit it; I conclude and find that Newman suggested, at least to Sanders and Paxton, that the employees could start their own union in the plant after they had resigned from Respondent and that such statements violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In view of my finding infra that Respondent violated the Act by not continuing to recognize the Union, it is clear that Respondent was not free to do so and certainly was not free to encourage employees to start their own union, since Respondent had a duty to recognize the Charging Party and continue to negotiate and deal with it.

C. Background of Holibaugh's Termination

Holibaugh started with the Company on May 12, 1976. He stated that his job was to unload trucks and supply parts to the various departments as needed, and that he had been told by the person who had the job before him and showed him what to do that was all the job required. He stated that prior to the commencement of negotiations he would unload trucks, empty wastebaskets, and put out materials, and that he had volunteered to clean the lunchroom but he very seldom moved trailers.

Holibaugh became a union member and participated in the August 25 election of officers; he was chosen vice president and a member of the negotiating team. When the president of the Union resigned in mid-October, Holibaugh became president of the Local.

Holibaugh testified that, after he became a union officer, he was told that his duties also included cleaning the lunchroom and the men's room, cleaning up the yard and moving trailers, and cleaning wastebaskets in the sales department twice a day. The thrust of Holibaugh's testimony was that these duties were added to his ordinary duties following his becoming a union officer and concurrent with a change in attitude towards him by Supervisor Lascelles. He said that prior to that time Lascelles was friendly, but afterwards Lascelles' attitude became extremely hard towards him, particularly after he filed grievances against Lascelles. The first grievance he filed was for failure by Respondent to pay him holiday pay (apparently for Labor Day). His grievance alleged that he had worked the 8 hours before the holiday and 8 hours the following workday, but Holibaugh admitted he was late the day following the holiday and felt the withholding of holiday pay was erroneous. He agreed that, when this grievance was presented, Lascelles told him to put it in, that he might win it.

Holibaugh testified that, he prepared two grievances on the evening of October 20 and presented them to Lascelles the following morning. One of the grievances alleged that the Company was in violation of the contract by not posting job vacancies. The second grievance was a strong attack on Lascelles which alleged that Lascelles engaged in "total and unnecessary harassment to employees, continuous badgering to work faster and harder, threatening to fire employees it caught out of department witch [sic] is depriving employees of bathroom rites [sic], threatening employees to work over 8 hours or they will be fired. 'Fits of anger' unbecoming of a plant manager that suggest physical violence to employees."

Holibaugh testified that Lascelles read the grievance and replied that he was going to give Holibaugh a warning. Holibaugh stated that one good turn deserved another, and Lascelles gave him a warning for not staying and unloading a truck. Holibaugh said he explained to Lascelles that he had washed and punched out, and was in his car getting ready to leave when the truck came in and nobody asked him to stay. Lascelles said that he should have come back, punched in, and unloaded the truck.

Holibaugh acknowledged receiving another warning for not staying and unloading a truck, saying he had told Lascelles the day before that he could not work overtime because he had to pick up his wife.

Respondent adduced testimony from employee Piper that he had held the job Holibaugh performed, prior to the time that the individual who trained Holibaugh was employed, and such person remained on the job a very short time. Piper testified that the normal duties of the job included working the towmotor, stocking the plant, unloading trucks, keeping the yard picked up, moving trailers, emptying wastebaskets, and cleaning bathrooms and the lunchroom.

Holibaugh admitted that, when he received a raise in July, Lascelles said he expected a lot more from him and that he would be moving trailers off the end of the line. He said he told Lascelles he did not have enough time to do everything and Lascelles responded that he was sure Holibaugh would find the time.

When pressed on cross-examination as to when his relationship with Lascelles started to deteriorate, Holibaugh said that negotiations started around October 7 and by October 21, when he got that warning, the relationship had certainly changed. Asked if he recalled receiving warnings prior to that time, Holibaugh said he did not recall receiving a written warning from Lascelles on August 27 for missing too much work but acknowledged his signature when shown the warning slip. Asked if he remembered another warning for missing too much work dated September 8, he said he did not recall receiving such from Lascelles. When shown the document, Holibaugh noted that there was no signature or union approval on it and said he did not recollect seeing it. He was asked if he had refused to sign any written warnings and replied that he had; he acknowledged that there would be no signature with a refusal, but he did not recall whether he refused to sign the document.

Holibaugh said he probably disagreed with all the warnings Lascelles gave and added that no excuse was good enough for Lascelles. When questioned as to whether he missed work during those periods, he replied that he had no idea. He was asked concerning other dates on which he allegedly missed work or was late; he did not recollect any but said that there were a few mornings when he was late, and he did not remember when they were.

In regard to working overtime to unload trucks, Holibaugh acknowledged that some trucks came from Indiana and, because of the time difference, did not arrive until late. He stated that sometimes he stayed overtime and sometimes he did not, that it depended on the plans he had, but said he never stated he refused to stay. Holibaugh said that if he had an important appointment or had to pick up his wife he would tell that to Lascelles, but added again that no excuse was ever good enough for Lascelles. Asked if he refused to stay on October 20, he said he did not refuse, but his testimony is unclear as to the reason he did not stay to unload a late truck on that date. The October 21 warning slip states that "the employee refused to work over and stated that he will not work any time past 4 p.m. There are times when overtime is required." There is a purported signature of Niles Eddy and a written statement "but do not go along with it." Another warning slip dated October 29 signed by Lascelles has as its complaint: "Left when he knew truck was here to be unloaded. This must be stopped." There is a notation that Holibaugh refused to sign it.

There is agreement that during the negotiations the Union was attempting to secure the elimination of or restrictions on mandatory overtime. Holibaugh stated that after he became union president he proposed to the Company both inside and outside of negotiations that overtime should not be worked to get trailers completed. He admitted discussing this with other employees, stating that it was his opinion that a person did not have to stay and work 14 or 15 hours a day and have no life of his own. Asked if he had ever had to work 15 hours a day, he sidestepped the question by saying he would not do so. Asked if in the week before the strike he discussed not working any overtime with the employees, Holibaugh said a number of employees, including Schooley, Blankenship, and others, asked if they had to work overtime and he said they could use their own discretion. Asked if he had told Lascelles that the employees did not have to work overtime, he first said he might have done so; he then said he suggested it to Lascelles but Lascelles said that they had to work overtime when it was needed. He said there was one occasion when he told a group of employees in the lunchroom they could use their own discretion, and the employees decided not to work overtime.

Holibaugh was questioned about his second warning for not staying overtime to unload a truck (October 29) and was asked if he had not demanded of Lascelles that he be given a 3-day layoff, as this was his third warning in a 90-day period. He said he did not do so in those terms but he did ask whether Lascelles was going to suspend him for 3 days like he did everybody else on a third warning. He did not recall whether Lascelles said the warning was for corrective purposes rather than for punishment.

This acknowledgment by Holibaugh of one of the two overtime warnings as a third warning in a 90-day period is a contradiction of Holibaugh's testimony that he did not recall the previous warnings for missing too much work in September and August. For this warning to have been his third, one of those prior warnings would have had to be included in the 90-day period.

Asked whether he complained to anybody else that he had not received a 3-day suspension, he answered that he did not recall. He denied saying that he would take the plant out if Respondent gave him a 3-day suspension. When questioned as to whether he complained to Plant Superintendent Brannun that Lascelles had not given him a 3-day suspension, he denied that, but did not deny talking to Lascelles about the suspension and stated that he might have done so.

Holibaugh was also asked about the Respondent's incentive pay system and replied that there was no incentive pay, there was only partiality and discrimination.

Ron Lascelles testified that the job for which Holibaugh was hired included receiving material, putting it away, keeping the yard in orderly fashion, supplying materials to the lines, emptying wastebaskets, cleaning the lunchroom and other rooms, and removing coaches from the line. Lascelles testified that Piper had held that job, and, for a period of some 4 to 6 weeks, a short-time employee held it between Piper's and Holibaugh's tenure. Lascelles testified that he talked to Holibaugh about Holibaugh's attendance problems, emphasizing that it was a small company and they did not have a lot of cross-training and everybody was needed to show up on time.

Lascelles also said he had discussions with Holibaugh concerning the need for employees to work overtime until the trailers were done and moved out of the plant. He told Holibaugh that materials come in from all over the country and there was no way for the truckdrivers to schedule themselves to be there precisely during worktime; sometimes it was required that a person stay late to do the unloading. Holibaugh said he did not want to work overtime and that 1 or 2 weeks before the strike, Holibaugh said he was not going to work overtime any more, that his wife worked elsewhere, they had only one car, and he had to pick her up. Lascelles told Holibaugh that did not fit with the Company's rules and there were occasions when overtime had to be worked. Holibaugh replied that Lascelles could not require him to work overtime.

In regard to October 21, Lascelles said he prepared the warning slip and gave it to Holibaugh before Holibaugh gave him the two grievances. When he gave Holibaugh the October 29 warning concerning not working overtime, Holibaugh said this was his third warning; he asked if Lascelles was going to give him a 3-day suspension and added that, if Lascelles did, he would take the shop out with him. Lascelles said no, that it was a warning, not a discipline, and he wanted to make sure Holibaugh understood what the Company wanted from him, that they did not want to chase him off or cause problems, and therefore he was not giving him a suspension. Lascelles testified that Holibaugh argued he was supposed to receive a suspension and, after saying several times that he was not going to suspend him, Holibaugh said he would see about it and went to Brannun. Lascelles followed, and Holibaugh told Brannun that he had received three written warnings and was supposed to have 3 days off, that Lascelles had given him the third warning and did not suspend him and he wanted Brannun to override Lascelles. Brannun refused to do so.

Lascelles testified that Holibaugh's work got progressively worse and that, when he would talk to Holibaugh about improving, Holibaugh would look at him and smile and say he was doing his best and that he interpreted this behavior as an attempt to needle him. Lascelles noted that during the week prior to the strike production slowed down, material was not being delivered to the areas, and he saw Holibaugh around the shop talking to people, not doing his work.

D. Holibaugh's Termination on November 18

Holibaugh acknowledged that on November 18 he was late to work but said others were late as well; he was the only one who received a warning. He did not testify as to whether the others had the same history of problems he had with lateness and absenteeism. He stated that during that day he was ordered over the loudspeaker system to go move trailers off the line so he got the tractor, went to the end of the line, and spotted them in the yard. Thereafter he went back to his towmotor and found that Newman was using it loading cabinets. Newman asked where he had been, and he replied that Newman ought to ask Lascelles, that he had been moving trailers off the line. Lascelles was present and said that Newman should have seen Holibaugh driving, that he did not think Holibaugh could drive any slower. Holibaugh asked if they wanted him to tear the trailers up, and Newman told him that they were not going to take any more—off of him. Holibaugh asked, "Why don't you go ahead and do it?" Newman said he was acting in a smart-aleck manner. Holibaugh said, "Why don't you go ahead and fire me, that's what you're up to anyhow." Lascelles said that they were not going to take any more—off of him, and Holibaugh replied that he did his job. Newman commented that, if he did his job, why was it that several departments needed one-by-four's and one-by two's. Holibaugh replied it was because they were not in stock.

Holibaugh said that following this, around noontime, Brannun said he was not supposed to be talking about union activities all over the plant. Holibaugh asked if they thought he was a robot, that if somebody talked to him he would reply.

Around 3:40 p.m. while Holibaugh was moving a trailer off the end of the line, Lascelles got on the tractor with him. After he had positioned it in the yard, Lascelles said he thought Holibaugh was harassing him, that Holibaugh had a smart attitude and he thought Holibaugh had just better go home. Holibaugh asked if that meant he was fired, and Lascelles said it did. He punched out and left. Holibaugh complained that he was being paged for jobs all over the plant that day and felt he was being harassed.

Newman testified that on November 18, not finding Holibaugh around, he used the forklift to move some cabinets which were needed. When Holibaugh got back, he told Lascelles and Holibaugh that it was Lascelles' obligation to get Holibaugh straightened out. He told Holibaugh that they had taken all they were going to take, and Holibaugh smiled in reply.

Lascelles said that one-by-four's are the main item they use and while occasionally they might be out of some particular length of one-by-four's, the Company would never be out of them entirely.

Lascelles testified that Holibaugh perceptibly slowed down on the job. On November 18, he paged Holibaugh over the intercom to come to move two coaches. After waiting for some time, he walked to the final finishing department, found Holibaugh and asked him to get his tractor and go to the end of the line and move two coaches. He returned to the end of the line and after waiting for a while, again went back to the final finishing department and told Holibaugh he was waiting for him to move. Holibaugh said he was coming. Lascelles walked back to the end of the line and arrived before Holibaugh showed up driving the tractor. He said he helped Holibaugh back up and hook up to the trailer and watched him move it into the yard. He testified that Holibaugh was moving as slow as it is possible to move and that it took forever for Holibaugh to move the trailer out and park it. When Holibaugh came back, he decided to talk with him about it and again helped him hook up. Lascelles rode on the back of the tractor and asked Holibaugh why the job was not getting done and why he was so slow. He said Holibaugh spoke about the strike and said that Lascelles had better watch out when the strike started because the big boys from the flooring department were going to bust some heads. He asked Holibaugh if that was a threat, and Holibaugh responded by asking, "Did I threaten you?" and saying no, it was not a threat. He told Holibaugh he wanted him to get the work done so the line could move, and Holibaugh replied that he was not going to "bust his fanny" and smiled at him. He told Holibaugh that he might as well go home because he had to get the job done and had to have someone who was going to do it. Holibaugh smiled, said thank you, and left.

In regard to the statement about the boys from flooring, Holibaugh said he did tell Lascelles they had some pretty big boys in the flooring department and, when Lascelles asked what he meant by that, he replied he was just making conversation.

While Holibaugh denied that he had ever refused to work overtime, it appears from his statements that, although he might not have used those words, such was the clear import of what he said.

Respondent also accused Holibaugh of asking employees to slow down in their work during the week before the strike. Holibaugh denied making such statements. Employee Paxton stated that, 1 to 3 days before the strike, Holibaugh told him not to build up the plumbing material ahead of time but to use up what they had built up so that when the strike started the Company would have to build it, and to slow down his work. Paxton also testified that he overheard a conversation between Holibaugh and Lascelles about 3 days prior to the strike in which Holibaugh said it was not his job to unload a trailer and he was not going to do it. Holibaugh denied making that statement.

E. Conclusions as to Holibaugh's Termination

If we consider Holibaugh's testimony and that of a few of the General Counsel's witnesses, it would appear that a prima facie case is made out for Holibaugh in that he asserts he began to be harassed by Lascelles at the time he became a union officer and that the harassment continued and increased. His testimonial description of the discharge and the events leading up to it would show that he was being continually harassed throughout that day by Lascelles, that he was trying to do his job and was terminated by Respondent without just cause to punish him for his union leadership. There is testimony that following his discharge some seven to eight employees gathered at Phyllis Hicks' house and talked about going out on strike early to protest Holibaugh's discharge but were dissuaded from doing so by Union Representative Campbell.

Overbalancing this picture is that which evolves from Respondent's testimony, some admissions from Holibaugh, and the warnings. The evidence is clear that Holibaugh had some problems with attendance and lateness and had been warned concerning them; from Holibaugh's admission, it appears that those warnings preceded the asserted change in attitude towards him by Lascelles.

Holibaugh admitted that he saw a truck come in as he was preparing to leave on the evening of October 20 and that, despite knowing he was the person charged with unloading the truck and what Respondent's policy was towards overtime, he did not respond to that policy but left the premises. This occurred shortly after he became union president and, according to his own testimony, attempted to negotiate with Respondent some restrictions on mandatory overtime, in essence acknowledging that overtime was mandatory for employees. The reasons Holibaugh gave for not working overtime amounted to a refusal to do so despite Respondent's necessity to unload trucks that came to its premises.

I credit Lascelles where there is a conflict between Holibaugh and Lascelles, finding that Holibaugh had a heavy bias against the Company and Lascelles, as demonstrated by Holibaugh's testimony, and that there were some contradictions in his testimony. The details of conversation are glossed over to an extent by Holibaugh whereas Lascelles' testimony is more precise and seems to indicate a finer retention of what occurred.

Basically, Respondent agrees that Holibaugh's name was called a large number of times over the intercom on the day he was discharged but it was not because Respondent was harassing Holibaugh, but rather because Holibaugh was not doing the jobs he was supposed to do, and it was necessary to call him a number of times to try to get him to do those jobs. Lascelles' testimony regarding Holibaugh's delays in responding to his instruction to come to the end of the line and move trailers appears to emphasize that point.

If Respondent sought to punish Holibaugh for his union officership and activities, it could have done so by suspending him on October 29 when it had the opportunity and Holibaugh appeared to be insisting on it. In fact, looking at the number of written warnings Holibaugh had received within a 90-day period, the warning of October 21 was the third warning within a 90-day period and the warning of October 29 was the fourth. Presumably, under such circumstances, Respondent could have suspended Holibaugh on October 21 and possibly have terminated him on October 29. However, as Lascelles explained, he wanted Holibaugh to acknowledge the Company's policy on overtime and to observe it and gave him the warning for that purpose and not to punish him or attempt to get rid of him.

If Respondent wanted to rid itself of Holibaugh on the basis that he was refusing to work overtime and in effect seeking to dictate to Respondent what his hours of employment would be, it apparently could have done so and the Board, on the basis of F. W. Woolworth Company, 204 NLRB 396 (1973), would have found that to be good cause. But Respondent sought to have Holibaugh accede to its wishes concerning overtime and did not suspend or discharge him then.

I credit Lascelles that Holibaugh's activities during the final week, where he appeared to be engaged in and to encourage others to engage in a slowdown of work, added to his refusals to work overtime, created a situation where Holibaugh was not amenable to what was demanded of him in his job, and I find that the discharge was for good cause and that it overbalances any prima facie case of discrimination. Accordingly, I will dismiss complaint paragraph 38.

F. The Unfair Labor Practice Strike Allegation

There is agreement, noted above, that the employees engaged in a strike from November 20 until December 1. Complaint paragraph 10(b) alleges that this strike was caused and prolonged by Respondent's unfair labor practices, and the General Counsel asserts that the discharge of Holibaugh was one of the reasons for the strike and, urging that Holibaugh's discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3), claims that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike giving participants therein rights to reinstatement, which are more particularly alleged in complaint paragraph 39.

Counsel's position is undercut by my finding that Holibaugh was not discharged in violation of the Act. Even if I had found that Respondent had violated the Act in terminating Holibaugh, I would still not find that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike.

There is no dispute that on Sunday, November 14, the employees by an overwhelming vote agreed to strike after refusing to accept Respondent's contract offer. It is clear from the testimony that during most of the following week the employees sought to convince Newman that Respondent should pay the $5 per hour amount which the Union was seeking in these negotiations, and Newman responded that he could not do so. It is clear from the testimony that an impasse had developed concerning rates of pay.

During the week prior to the strike, a second meeting was held at an employee's house and another strike vote taken; again the results were overwhelming in favor of striking. On Thursday, November 18, Eddy, who had become convinced that the employees should not strike, sought another strike vote in the lunchroom, and it is clear that the strike again was supported by a great majority of those present. All of these events occurred prior to the Holibaugh termination.

As noted above, on the evening of November 18 an impromptu meeting was held at Phyllis Hicks' house with eight or nine employees present where sentiment was expressed about going out on strike prior to the strike date because of Holibaugh's termination. Union Representative Campbell told the employees that they must wait until the strike date according to the terms of the contract.

On November 19, a number of employees stayed off from work or came into work and left early, claiming that they were sick, but the purpose of such actions was not demonstrated.

No mention was made of an unfair labor practice origin of the strike on the picket signs and no claim was made to Respondent prior to, during, or after the strike that the strike had been caused at least in part by Holibaugh's termination or any other unfair labor practices, until this case.

The strike lasted from November 20 until December 1, and there is nothing in this record to indicate that the strike was prolonged in any manner by anything that Respondent did or did not do, and such prolongation is only a presumption by the General Counsel with nothing to substantiate it. The 8(a)(1) violations found above were not considered by the strike participants, and I conclude that it was an economic strike.

Accordingly, I find that the strike was not an unfair labor practice strike and that employees who struck are not entitled to reinstatement on that basis as alleged in complaint paragraph 39. I dismiss complaint paragraph 10(b) and that part of complaint paragraph 39 which asserts reinstatement rights based on an unfair labor practice strike. See Romo Paper Products Corp., 208 NLRB 644 (1974).

G. The Pay Raise Allegation

Complaint paragraphs 40 and 41 assert that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by not notifying and bargaining with the Union in regard to the pay raise and bonus rate it paid employees on or after November 22.

Having previously found that the parties were at an impasse concerning pay rates prior to the strike and that Respondent was therefore free to pay employees who worked during and after the strike rates it had offered to the Union, together with Union Representative Campbell's testimony that the bonus rate alleged as violative in complaint paragraph 41 was less than the amount the Company had proposed in its contract offer, it follows that these two allegations are without foundation and, accordingly, I dismiss them.

H. The General Refusal-To-Bargain Allegation and Respondent's Refusal To Further Recognize the Union

Complaint paragraph 45 alleges that all of Respondent's conduct, as set forth in the complaint from paragraph 12 on demonstrated course of conduct, bad-faith bargaining by Respondent with the objective of the avoidance of meaningful negotiations with the Union and avoidance of a contract with the Union, the discouragement of employees from engaging in union or protected activities for the purposes of collective bargaining.

With the exception of complaint paragraphs 29, 35(a), and 37 wherein I have found violations, and with the further exception of complaint paragraph 44 where I do find a violation, the remaining unfair labor practice allegations of this complaint have been dismissed.

The General Counsel has not demonstrated any egregious unfair labor practices concurrent with the negotiations which ceased on November 12 which would substantiate the course of conduct, bad-faith bargaining allegations in complaint paragraph 45. Nor has the General Counsel produced any evidence concerning Respondent's conduct during the negotiations, such as reneging on agreements, surface bargaining, etc., which would support his allegations. In short, there is nothing through the time of the strike which would show other than that Respondent engaged in good-faith bargaining with the intention of reaching an agreement.

Therefore, I cannot find that Respondent engaged in course of conduct, bad-faith bargaining. It appears that any violation of Respondent in its duty to bargain with the Union occurred following the strike, and not during the negotiations prior to the strike.

I do find that Respondent had a duty to recognize and bargain with the Union during and after the strike and that the reasons advanced by President Newman in his testimony, and by Respondent in its brief, for terminating its negotiations with the Union and refusing to recognize it as its employees' bargaining agent on and after December 1, 1976, were insufficient and that, by such termination and refusal to recognize, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

President Newman testified that he got a letter from the Union around December 10 and, at that time, did not believe he had an obligation to continue to bargain with the Union. He based his decision on the following: (1) The Union went out on strike and terminated its contract and they did not have a contract at the time of the hearing; and (2) the strike started out with a few people (meaning pickets) which did not represent 50 percent of the work force and dwindled every day during the strike. He said "Those people came back to work before the strike was over." Asked who did, he named Norma Crow and said several others did. He also testified that a further reason was that he had received a list of employees who had resigned from the Union. The list to which he referred is the lists of 13 employees on the document prepared by employee Piper. The General Counsel urged that two of these people later joined and supported the strike. These are all the reasons given by Newman as to why he felt he had no obligation to bargain further with the Union.

Respondent's brief lists 13 reasons which Respondent asserts warranted it in refusing to bargain further with the Union. Those reasons are as follows:

> 1. The Union was voluntarily recognized in February 1972.
> 2. It did not achieve a collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent until November 1973.
> 3. The collective-bargaining agreement contained a union shop clause providing for mandatory union membership and a dues checkoff provision but no authorizations for dues checkoff were provided to Respondent until June 1975.
> 4. There was insufficient interest by the employees in the Union to support the establishment of their own local union until the summer of 1976.
> 5. Less than a majority of the employees, on the average, attended the union meetings in 1976 during which the local union was established.
> 6. Union officers had to be appointed, rather than elected, because of such lack of interest.
> 7. Four of the seven local union officers resigned from the Union during negotiations or before the strike.
> 8. Thirteen employees, including three of these four officers, executed a written union resignation and gave MHE's president a copy.
> 9. Thirteen or fourteen bargaining union members worked during the strike.
> 10. The strike lasted only 7 workdays and only 10 to 12 employees attended the union meeting terminating the strike.
> 11. The Company had no meetings with and made no concessions to the Union during the strike to warrant its termination.
> 12. Only 14 of more than 40 employees had more than 6 months of service with the Company in November 1976, and almost all of them worked during the strike.
> 13. Respondent's work force historically experiences high turnover and fluctuates widely in number.

The first six reasons advanced by Respondent have to do with the manner in which the Union was first recognized and what occurred on various dates between 1973 and the summer of 1976; although providing some background, they really have nothing to do with the majority status of the Union in 1976. It is true that under the contract provisions employees were to obtain union membership on or after 30 days' employment and to maintain it; that dues deductions were authorized by the employees and the amounts were paid by Respondent to the Union. However, granting that, these first six reasons are not relevant to the question before us.

It appears from the testimony that the president of the Local resigned from the Union during negotiations and apparently left the Company to go into business for himself. There is no allegation that he continued with the Company and his name does not appear on the Company's records. Other officers or members of the negotiating committee resigned from the Union prior to the strike.

On the document prepared by Piper there are 13 signatures. One or two of the employees indicated that they later withdrew these resignations and did not work during the strike, and there may have been several other people who were members of the Union who went in and worked during part of the strike. There is no dispute, as paragraph 10 in Respondent's brief, quoted above, alleges, that the strike lasted only 7 workdays and that the meeting held to terminate the strike was attended by 10 to 12 members.

Paragraph 11 of Respondent's brief, as set forth above, states that the Company held no meetings with and made no concessions to, the Union during the strike to warrant its termination, which only means that the Union did not win the strike but voted to terminate it for the members' own reasons, not because of any concessions made by Respondent. This does no more than tell us that the impasse which started the strike was still extant at the close of the strike.

Respondent's paragraph 12, as set forth above, alleges that of the 40 employees who were union members and had dues deductions during the month of November only 14 of that number had more than 6 months' seniority with Respondent. It appears to be a fact that most of that group worked during the strike, with the notable exception of Phyllis Hicks.

Respondent's last reason is, supra, that its work force historically experiences high turnover and fluctuates widely in number.

All of these reasons, taken singularly or considered together, do not overturn the fact that, in the formal strike vote taken prior to the strike by the Union, the members voted to strike by 28-to-2, with 2 voids or abstentions. The margin was nearly the same in the two other votes which took place on November 17 and 18, with more than a majority of the employees then employed voting to strike.

Even if we were to grant that the 13 resignations were all authentic and continued in force, despite testimony to the contrary on two of them, it would still be mathematically clear that the Union represented a majority of the employees at the time of the strike. There is no evidence which credibly demonstrates a shift of employee sentiment to opposing the Union during or after the strike. The employees who did not resign from the Union must, under the present evidence, be presumed to have continued to support the Union during and after the strike.

In Cantor Bros., Inc., 203 NLRB 774 (1973), Administrative Law Judge Taplitz noted some of the cases which seemed to be controlling in that case and in the present instance. He cited Coca-Cola Bottling Works, Inc., 186 NLRB 1050 (1970), as standing for the proposition that an employer could not rely on the refusal of some employees to go on strike or the return of striking employees to work as a basis for company withdrawal of recognition from the union, since the Board would not presume that failure to support a strike or returning to work during a strike indicated a lack of support for the union. There are any number of reasons why employees would work during a strike even though they supported a union or abandoned the strike while it was still going on.

Here, Respondent seems to equate the number of pickets with the number of employees who support the strike. This is not a reasonable test. The number of pickets merely shows that those pickets are actively engaged in demonstrating their support for the Union. Others may support the Union but not actively demonstrate their support.

The Board has held in Pennco, Inc., 250 NLRB 716 (1980), that strike replacements and new employees are not automatically counted as antiunion. Basically, the Board considers that replacements may support the union in the same proportion that employees did prior to the strike. The Board has stated that there is a heavy burden of proof on an employer since it will not presume the replacements do not support a strike. It stated that to do so would be to overburden the right to strike because, if that were the guide, then an employer could refuse to recognize the union any time there was a strike and replacements. See Cavalier Division of Seeburg Corporation and Cavalier Corporation, 192 NLRB 290 (1971).

Respondent may have presumed that, with the corps of senior employees it retained, most of whom did sign the document resigning from the Union, that it felt the less senior employees had no particular interest in the Company, and that it could refrain from negotiating with the Union based to some degree on the number of replacements and the new employees it would be bringing into the Company as it expanded.

However, if this was its hope, it is unavailing as a defense in this instance because under Board precepts Respondent has produced no credible evidence to demonstrate other than that the Union continued to represent a majority of Respondent's employees. On this basis, it is clear that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act when it refused on and after December 10, 1976, to recognize or negotiate with the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in Respondent's P and M unit, and I so conclude and find. The Union's request for further negotiations contained in its December 10 letter to Respondent was ignored and in essence was refused; the answer of Respondent's counsel on December 17 was nothing more than a palliative smokescreen.

I. Requests for Information

Respondent admits that it received the December 10 letter from the Union which, among other things, requested that Respondent furnish it with a list of all employees which would include their names, addresses, dates of hire, rates of pay, and the department in which they were working. Respondent admits that it failed and refused to provide the Union with such information and says the information was not relevant and necessary to enable the Union to perform its responsibilities as a bargaining representative because the Union no longer represented the employees. However, as noted above, I have found that Respondent's refusal to recognize and negotiate with the Union on the basis of its belief that the Union no longer represented a majority of the employees was ill-founded and, under Board law, was improper and violative of the Act. Since the Union did represent the unit of employees and this information was proper and necessary to its functioning as a collective-bargaining representative, particularly following the strike in this matter, I conclude and find that Respondent's refusal to furnish this information to the Union, as alleged in complaint paragraph 44, was an independent violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

J. The Alleged Refusal Properly To Reinstate 12 Employees

Parnell Smith, one of the 12 named in complaint paragraph 39, apparently did not cooperate in the investigation in this matter, and the General Counsel on the record stated that Smith had failed to appear and agreed to dismiss him from the case. It would appear therefore that based on the transcript Smith should not be considered in this matter.

The remaining question is whether the Laidlaw rights of these 11 individuals were violated in any manner by Respondent's course of offering reinstatement to some and not others.

It is clear from the record that a number of employees who were active in the Union and in picketing, such as Phyllis Hicks, were reinstated immediately after the Union voted to discontinue the strike. This vote took place in the evening of December 1, and Union Representative Campbell requested the Union's director to inform Respondent of the cessation of the strike. In a letter to the Company dated December 1, the Union on behalf of all the striking employees made an unconditional application and offer to return to work and requested immediate reinstatement.

During the strike Respondent had employed employees from a sister corporation, had advertised for other employees, and had hired some people. Roger Simpson was hired during the strike on November 30 as a yardman, presumably to replace Holibaugh.

Respondent stated that it did not hire or recall many people between December and February since it had a few orders; it also had a trailer show in Kentucky and used a number of the people to prepare and set up its trailers for that show. Additionally, because of the strike, Respondent had refused some orders and cut down on some materials and stated it did not have enough orders for a full crew during those winter months. As mentioned, supra, Respondent builds it product solely on order and does not produce for its own inventory.

Respondent admitted it hired some people in the interim and gave its reasons why it hired them and why it did not recall some of the employees who had struck and had not yet been returned to work.

Respondent hired Greg Cantler on January 14, 1977, to work in partition II. It stated that Cantler had worked for the Company previously, was experienced, had left, gone to Florida, and returned, and there was no one else available on the list of people who had gone on strike who could do the job he filled.

Lascelles testified he hired Brenda Walter on January 14, 1977, to work in the metal department because there was no one else to fill the job; he made reference to manual dexterity needed for the job. Asked why he had not brought back either Woodall or Gentry who had worked on roofs, Lascelles testified that was a different type of job and they would not have been able to perform it.

Gary Simpson and Charles Sergent were hired on January 26, 1977, in partition I. Lascelles stated that there were no other people among those who had struck who were able to do the job.

Rita Blazekovitch was hired on February 3, 1977, in the trim department, and again Lascelles stated she was hired because no one else was available who could do that job.

Tom Raub was hired on February 15, 1977, and had worked for the Company previously. He had left several months before the strike and was hired by Respondent as a yardman and swingman since he was a versatile employee who could do a number of different jobs. These were all the persons who were hired before Respondent called back to work some of those listed in paragraph 39.

Asked whether some of the strikers could have been trained for some of these jobs, Lascelles said it would have taken as much training to retrain them from their previous work as it would be to put on new employees, that some of them would not have been as dexterous as the persons he hired and some of those he hired had previous experience with the Company. Most of the 11 had been with the Company only a short time prior to the strike.

Respondent further stated that whether a person had been on the picket line or did not work during the strike had nothing to do with its decision on whether to return that person to work. In regard to the 11 employees, we have the following testimony:

1. Charles Albertson was brought in by the Company during December and worked a half day. Albertson stated that prior to that time he had called the Company and was told he was in a layoff status and that Respondent had sufficient employees at that time. He said that following the half day in December he never heard anything from the Company so he got another job. In March 1977, he was called by the Company to return to work but did not respond since he had another job.

Albertson admitted that he had returned to Terry Industries in Edgerton in January 1977, had worked there for 2 years, and was laid off there when he went to work for Respondent in August 1976. He said he was making more money there than he had ever made at Respondent.

2. Lascelles testified that he called Robert Belknap to come back to work and Belknap said he would do so but did not show up.

On rebuttal, Belknap testified that he did not have any such conversation with Lascelles about returning to work and said that Lascelles was not a supervisor. This testimony of Belknap is incomprehensible, considering Belknap's prior testimony as to the supervisory status of Lascelles and as contrasted against the fact that Lascelles was a foreman who was recalling other employees. In any event, Newman called Belknap around February 6, asking him to return to work, and Belknap said he finally reported back to work around February 14.

3. Don Blankenship stated that he picketed and that following the strike he and employee Schooley talked to one of the secretaries in the office and were given layoff slips. Blankenship said he tried Respondent again in February and March and was told he was still on layoff; he was finally recalled on April 4, 1977.

Lascelles testified that he did not need Blankenship immediately after the strike but attempted to call him several times later and was not able to get him.

4. Schooley testified he called the Company and was told that he was out of a job; he implied that this was at the end of the strike and he did not corroborate Blankenship's testimony. He said he received an offer in February or March and talked to Foreman Lascelles; he did not like what Lascelles had to say and did not go back to work.

Lascelles stated that he was unable to reach Schooley the first few times he called but finally got him and asked him to come to the plant. He told Schooley that he needed him to work but wanted better attendance from Schooley than he had before. Schooley said he was healthy and would be in to work every day and would report the next morning. Schooley never showed up, and Lascelles said he never heard from him again.

5. John Carpenter was a probationary employee when the strike started. He lived some 20 to 25 miles from Bryan, Ohio. He did picket duty about three times but did not know when the strike ended; he did not learn that it had ended until some 2 to 3 weeks later. He said that, about a month after the strike ended, he went to the plant and was told there were no openings.

Lascelles testified that he discussed probationary employee Carpenter with Brannun, and they decided they should not bring Carpenter back to finish out his probationary period since Carpenter had poor attendance and was a sloppy worker and they did not believe he should be kept as an employee.

6. Dale Thomas was a probationary employee who did not testify in this case since apparently he was unavailable out of state. Lascelles testified that Thomas had worked in the ceiling-sidewall area and, when someone was needed in that department, he checked with the people in that department, since he was not familiar with Thomas, and asked them about Thomas' work. He testified that all the people in the department, including the leadman, said they did not want Thomas back, so he did not make any offer to Thomas to return to work but terminated him as a probationer.

7. Pat Gentry stated that early in the strike he called regarding a job and was told that the metal work was being done by the people that had been brought over from the sister company, Mini Mansions. He did not receive a call to return to work until February 16 when he was called by Lascelles, and he reported back on February 17.

8. William Kochenour was a probationary employee who stated that he began with Respondent on October 5. He said he signed the document prepared by Piper since he understood he could keep on working if he resigned from the Union but then did not work during the strike. He said he returned to work about 2 days after the strike was over, worked 2 days, and took a day off work to take his wife to the doctor. He said he called in and was told that he had been fired.

During cross-examination Kochenour stated that he did not know that the contract provided for a 45-working-day probationary period before a person acquired seniority; he had assumed he was over the probationary period when he joined the Union. He agreed that he went back to work around December 3 and, when asked whether he punched in 9 minutes late Thursday, said he did not punch in at all, that his card was not there and he did not recall punching out. Then he testified that he did not work that day. Later he testified that maybe he did punch in that day but he did not recall being 9 minutes late. Asked if he had taken his wife to the doctor on Thursday or Friday, he said he might have punched in 23 minutes late on another day. When asked if his record was that, after being recalled following the strike, he was late the first 2 days and missed the third day, he said that could have been the record but he did not recall it. He also admitted that he had been absent four times in his employment prior to the strike.

Lascelles stated that he had recalled Kochenour to work as a probationary employee because he hoped he would become a good worker. However, Kochenour was late twice and missed a third day and Respondent terminated his probationary employment at that time.

9. Mike Marvin testified that he was not on active picket duty during the strike and, during the strike, began to look for other employment. He said that after the strike he sought to go back to Respondent because he had not yet found a job. He said Respondent had an ad in the paper so he went to the plant and saw one of the secretaries and asked if he needed to fill out an application and she said his application was still current. Marvin said he saw another ad in the paper in April 1977, made an application then, and talked to Lascelles. Lascelles asked if he was working and he said he was, and Lascelles told him that he did not need part-time help and Marvin said he was looking for full-time employment. Lascelles said he did not think Marvin could handle it and they would not need him.

During cross-examination Marvin attempted to evade the question of whether on November 29 he had a discussion with anyone in the Company about quitting as an employee at Respondent. He answered the question by saying he quit active picket duty to go look for work. Asked again whether he spoke to the secretary, Mrs. Ellis, concerning quitting as an employee, he stated he called in and told her that he was not on picket duty any more and was looking for employment and needed to go to work. Asked if he told Ellis he was making an application at another Company and wanted Respondent's records to show him as a "quit," he evaded the question and stated that at that time he had not made an application to the other company. He testified that he was planning to make an application but that nobody knew it and, to his knowledge, he did not tell her of his plan. He denied asking Ellis to tell the other company he had quit at Respondent but stated that he started work at the other company in the first part of December and was still there, working on the third shift.

Ellis testified that Marvin asked her about getting a slip to show that he had quit so that he could get a job with the Arrow Corporation. Lascelles testified that he gave Marvin a quit slip when Marvin crossed the picket line into the plant and asked him for one.

In regard to credibility determinations here, I credit Ellis and Lascelles that Marvin asked both Ellis and Lascelles for a quit slip and procured one from Lascelles. There would be no reason for Marvin to make a call or come to the plant merely to tell someone at the plant that he was not on active picket duty and was seeking a job somewhere else. His April request of Lascelles for a job evidently was taken by Lascelles as an application for a second full-time job, with Lascelles answering that he did not think Marvin could handle a second full-time job and they would not hire him.

10. Lascelles testified that on November 19, the day prior to the strike, he wanted some partitions built because the work was behind, and he spoke to Jeff Schilt and one other person who said they were going home. He asked them to stay and finish building the partition they were working on; Schilt said he would not do so, that he was going to quit because he could not afford to go on strike, he had to get another job and therefore was quitting. According to Lascelles, Schilt resigned at that time and left.

Schilt testified that he did not walk the picket line but stayed home during the strike and did not work. He said he did not receive any message from Respondent about returning to work and denied having any conversation with Lascelles about quitting. He lived about 24 miles from Respondent's plant and said he had not learned that the strike was over when he started work at General Tire on February 9, 1977.

I credit Lascelles that Schilt told him he was quitting. I do not see how Schilt could have had any interest in a job at Respondent or in returning to work there, living a mere 24 miles away and not making any effort to determine if the strike had ended before starting work for General Tire almost 2-1/2 months after the strike ended at Respondent. Schilt's actions were those of a person with no interest in Respondent, and I credit Lascelles that he quit.

11. Gary Woodall testified that he called Lascelles in March 1977 regarding a job and was told to come in. Lascelles offered him a job working in the ceiling department although Woodall had worked in the metal department prior to that time. Lascelles felt that Woodall could do the job. Woodall agreed to do it and went to work in the ceiling department in March.

On the basis of the transcript testimony and my credibility determinations, I have determined that employees Marvin and Schilt quit their jobs before the strike ended and that Respondent need not offer them any employment.

Probationer Kochenour was reinstated shortlv after the strike ended but was thereafter fired for apparent good cause, and I find that Respondent need make no further offer of employment to Kochenour.

Employees Woodall, Belknap, Gentry, and Blankenship were recalled from February on, in 1977. Respondent testified that it had no openings that they could fill prior to that time, and there is no countervailing evidence. I therefore find that Respondent owes no further or prior duty to these employees, and there is no proof that it should have recalled these individuals prior to the time it did.

Schooley was recalled and did not come in after agreeing to do so. I do not find that there is any evidence that he should have heen recalled earlier and find that Respondent owes him no offer of reinstatement at this point since he refused its offer.

Albertson worked for half a day in December but then got a job where he had been previously employed; he was laid off but did not respond to any offer from Respondent. It is apparent that he had a job at the other company early in December and did not intend to return to Respondent, so Respondent owes him no further offer of reinstatement.

Probationers Carpenter and Thomas were not offered jobs since they were considered indequate, poor employees. There is no testimony to demonstrate that their union membership or activitv had anything to do with Respondent's not offering to reinstate them. It would be a futile gesture to say Respondent must make them an offer but would then be free to terminate them as inadequate employees. Accordingly I find that Respondent, under these circumstances, is not obligated to offer them reinstatement.

Accordingly, I dismiss complaint paragraph 39.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth above in section II which have been found to constitute unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, occurring in connection with Respondent's operations as set forth in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and, upon request, bargain collectively in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the unit set forth below in the Conclusions of Law and in the event that an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. Respondent shall be ordered to comply with the Union's request for information concerning the employees in the unit.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. The following employees constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act:

> All production and maintenance employees at Respondent's Bryan, Ohio place of business, but excluding plant clerical employees, office clerical employees, road service employees, truck drivers, and guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. The Union is the exclusive representative of the employees in the aforesaid unit for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.

5. By withdrawing recognition from the Union and by refusing to meet and bargain with the Union on and after December 10, 1976, and by refusing to provide the Union with requested information regarding unit employees, their names, addresses, jobs, rates of pay, etc., Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By the foregoing conduct Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by:

(a) Telling employees that after withdrawing from the Union, they should form their own union.

(b) Telling employees that their union was no good and costs them money and they should resign from it and form their own union.

(c) Urging employees not to engage in a strike and not to support their Union.

8. The aforementioned unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and upon the entire record, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended:

ORDER[3]

The Respondent, Mobile Home Estates, Inc., Bryan, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Refusing to recognize, meet, and bargain with International Union, Allied Industrial Workers, AFL-CIO, and its Local 712, as the exclusive representative of its employees in the following unit:

> All production and maintenance employees at Respondent's Bryan, Ohio place of business, but excluding plant clerical employees, office clerical employees, road service employees, truck drivers, and guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Refusing to provide the Union with requested information concerning unit employees.

(c) Telling employees that, after withdrawing from the Union, they should form their own union.

(d) Telling employees that their union is no good and costs them money and they should resign from it and form their own union.

(e) Urging employees not to engage in a strike and not to support their Union.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Upon request, bargain collectively with said Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in that bargaining unit and, in the event that an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Provide the Union with the information it requested in its December 10, 1976, letter and with any similar information it may request.

(c) Post at its Bryan, Ohio, plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 8, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director for Region 8, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

[3] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided by Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[4] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Peabody Coal Company and International Union, United Mine Workers of America. Case 14–CA–14724

February 4, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On September 25, 1981, Administrative Law Judge John C. Miller issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order, as modified herein.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge, as modified below, and hereby orders that the Respondent, Peabody Coal Company, Stonefort, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the said recommended Order, as so modified:

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(c):

"(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights."

2. Substitute "Stonefort, Illinois," for "St. Louis, Missouri," in paragraph 2(b).

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Administrative Law Judge.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint allegations not specifically found herein be, and they hereby are, dismissed.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and has ordered us to post this notice.

The Act gives employees the following rights:

To engage in self-organization

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection

To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

Accordingly, we give you these assurances:

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with loss of seniority and/or loss of employment if the Union were selected as their bargaining representative, nor interrogate employees about their union sympathies, about their signing of union cards, or as to how they voted in a Board election.

WE WILL NOT solicit employees to withdraw their support for the Union, nor offer the use of our typewriters in preparing letters requesting that negotiations cease.

WE WILL NOT promise employees more favorable consideration on company jobs if they wrote letters stating that they no longer wished to be represented or if they requested that negotiations cease, nor tell employees that we would only give employees what we wanted in negotiations thereby implying that negotiations would be futile.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with International Union, United Mine Workers of America as the duly certified collective-bargaining representative of the warehouse employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

WE WILL, upon request, bargain with International Union, United Mine Workers of

[1] The Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

In sec. II,A,6, the Administrative Law Judge attributed to employee witness Danny Gibbs the testimony about a threat by Supervisor Ronald Menzie. The record shows that employee Phyllis Adler, not Gibbs, testified about the threat. This inadvertent error does not alter our finding of a violation.

America as the duly designated representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

PEABODY COAL COMAPNY

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOHN C. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge: This case was heard before me in St. Louis, Missouri, on May 13, 1981. The complaint alleged various violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act both before and after a representation election which was held on January 9, 1981. The complaint also alleged that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act in refusing to bargain with a certified union. Although the Union has requested bargaining, Respondent continues to refuse on technical grounds although its request to the Board for review of the Union's certification was denied. (Resp. Exh 2.)

Upon the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent Peabody Coal Company is a corporation duly authorized to do business under the laws of the States of Missouri and Illinois. Respondent has maintained its principal office and place of business in St. Louis, Missouri, and also maintains other facilities in numerous States, including the mine facility located at Rural Route 1 in the city of Stonefort in the State of Illinois, hereafter referred to as the Will Scarlet Mine. The Will Scarlet Mine is the only facility involved in this proceeding. It is alleged and admitted that during the year ending December 31, 1980, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, mined at its Will Scarlet surface mine located at Stonefort, Illinois, coal valued in excess of $50,000 of which coal valued in excess of $50,000 was shipped from said facility directly to points located outside the State of Illinois.

On the basis of the above admitted facts, I find that Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

It is further alleged and admitted that the Charging Party, International Union, United Mine Workers of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act and I so find.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The 8(a)(1) Allegations

The numerous 8(a)(1) allegations are treated in chronological order and in the order in which they appear in the amended complaint.

1. It is alleged that Respondent's mine superintendent, Menzie, on or about December 12, 1980, urged an employee to vote against the Union by promising that wages and benefits would increase without the employees' selecting union representation. There is no testimonial support for this allegation even in the employee's account of his December 12 conversation with Menzie. According to Gibbs, an employee, Menzie said, "I'd like to give you my personal opinion about the election coming up. It looks like you would be better off to go ahead and vote the Union down at this time then wait and see what the outcome of Consolidated Coal Company would be." By this, Menzie was referring to a company where a union had recently won the election and where a contract had not yet been negotiated. Menzie cannot conceivably be seen as promising anything in this remark. Therefore, I recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

2. The complaint further alleges that Superintendent Menzie, on or about December 12, 1980, threatened an employee with loss of employment should the employee select the Union as his collective-bargaining representative. Danny Gibbs credibly testified that, in his December 12 conversation with Menzie, Menzie said "there's a possibility that Pit 16 might shut down and those men over there could bump you if you get in the Union because you have no seniority." Thus, if there were layoffs or reduction in force, others would have more seniority because, as a new member of the Union, Gibbs would have little or no seniority. As a result, Gibbs would be placed on a layoff panel and, due to the number on that list, his chances for employment were minimal. Menzie testified that in discussing seniority with employees, he pointed out to them that their seniority depended on what was negotiated by the Union and the Company. He strongly suggested that their seniority date would be their first day of union membership and that hence they would not get credit for any years of prior employment. Menzie's statement was an implicit threat to the employee that he would lose his job should the Union be selected since his remarks linked, in the guise of a prediction, a union victory and loss of employment. See Hinky Dinky Super Markets, Inc., 247 NLRB 1176, 1178 (1980). I credit Gibbs' version and do not credit Menzie in this respect. Accordingly, I find that this threat was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. It is further alleged that, on December 21, 1980, Mine Superintendent Menzie interrogated employee Richardson concerning his signing of a union card and his support for the Union and also threatened Richardson with loss of seniority and loss of employment if the Union won. Menzie admits having asked Richardson if he had signed a union card. He also admits having told Richardson that, if the Union won, negotiations about seniority would result in his placement at or near the bottom of the seniority list and, in a work force reduction, he would be laid off. Menzie subsequently claimed to have merely suggested that a union victory could lead to a layoff, but I credit his earlier account and the account of employee Richardson, who also testified that Menzie asked him, in that same conversation, why he favored the Union. Accordingly, I find several 8(a)(1) violations in Menzie's December 21 conversation with Richardson. See Central Freight Lines, Inc., 255 NLRB 509 (1981).

4. The complaint alleged that on or about January 7, 1981, Menzie threatened an employee with loss of employment should the employee select the Union as her bargaining representative. Lori Wahls, a warehouse clerk and employee of Peabody, testified that on or about January 7, 1981, she had a conversation with Menzie in the warehouse. She testified that Menzie told her that if the Union won the election there would be a layoff and that she probably would never work for Peabody again. Menzie's version was different in that he had simply advised employees that if the Union won the election, when the employees became union members, depending on how their seniority was negotiated, they would probably be at the bottom of the seniority list and that, in any reduction in force, they would be the first laid off. Wahls appeared sincere and credible and I credit her version. Accordingly, I find that the comments attributed to Menzie in January constituted a threat to Lori Wahls that she would be laid off if the Union won the election. I find such a threat to be violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. It is alleged that on January 9, 1981, the date of the election, Mine Superintendent Menzie interrogated an employee as to how the employee voted in the election. Menzie himself admits asking employee Emmons whether he voted for "me" or "them." Accordingly, I find that this interrogation constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. It is alleged that on January 23, 1981, Menzie threatened an employee with loss of employment. Except for the date, the allegation appeared the same as previously discussed in paragraph 4, supra. Preliminarily, I note that, since the allegation was a threat of loss of employment should the employees select the Union and since the union election was held on January 9, it appears that the allegation is at best misworded.

Concerning this allegation, Alder testified that on or about that date Menzie approached her at the warehouse window where she was working and stated he was "surprised in us people wanting to go union, that he had been good to us." According to Gibbs, Menzie also said that he would lay "all of us" off eliminating some of the paperwork or having it done by people from the mines. Alder's testimony does not establish any threat. I credit Gibbs that Menzie said he could lay "all of us" off and use people from the mines. Despite a slight variance from the allegation, I find Menzie's comment to Gibbs, even though it occurred after the election, constituted a threat violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. It is further alleged that on or about February 15, 1981, Menzie threatened employees with loss of seniority because they had selected a union; that Menzie threatened employees with loss of employment because the employees had selected the Union; and that Respondent had created the impression of surveillance of employees' union activities by identifying which employees Respondent believed had voted for and against the Union; and, lastly, that Respondent stated that an employee, believed to have voted against the Union, would be transferred to preserve that employee's job in the event of layoffs.

Danny Gibbs testified that on or about February 15, 1981, Menzie said to him: "You've lost your jobs to the union now." According to Gibbs, Menzie further said, "In the next week or so I'm going to be hiring 11 more men and 3 more the following week for union jobs and that will put you further down the line in your seniority." Menzie further stated that he thought six employees would vote against the Union. When questioned about his conversation, Menzie remembered discussing the hiring of new employees with Gibbs, and telling Gibbs about a 30-day period during which employees could get out of the Union. Menzie further stated that, in regard to seniority, there was no seniority list with respect to the warehouse unit and that the Union has seniority over these jobs. I credit Gibbs' testimony and find that it supports the allegation of a threat of loss of seniority and employment because of selection of the Union. However, I find no evidence to support the latter two allegations involving surveillance and transfer of an employee. Menzie's statement that he thought six employees would vote against the Union does not in my view establish that there was an impression of surveillance. There had been six votes in favor of the Union and one vote against the Union. Since Menzie presumably knew employees' views fairly well, it is not surprising that he would have a view as to how the employees voted and his articulation of that view, without more, does not give the impression of surveillance. Further, I find no testimonial support for the allegation that on or about February 15 Respondent stated through Menzie that an employee would be transferred in order to preserve his job in the event of layoffs. Therefore, as to the specific allegations around February 15, 1981, I find that Menzie did threaten Gibbs with loss of seniority and loss of employment because employees selected the Union as their bargaining representative in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. With respect to remaining allegations, I find no evidentiary support and recommend their dismissal.

8. The complaint alleges that on or about February 23, 1981, Menzie did the following: solicited employees to withdraw their support for the Union by encouraging them to prepare notarized letters requesting that negotiations cease; offered to allow employees to use Respondent's typewriters to prepare such notarized letters; promised that Respondent would give more favorable consideration in awarding jobs to those employees who signed the letter requesting negotiations cease as compared to employees supporting the Union; and implied that union representation was futile by stating that Respondent would only give the employees what Respondent wished.

Phyllis Adler testified, in regard to the first two allegations, that Menzie had told her, as well as Gibbs, that the Union did not really want the warehouse employees as members, but that actually the Union wanted the warehouse jobs to be union jobs. Menzie further told Adler and Gibbs that they could prepare an affidavit, saying they did not want to join the Union, on the supply room typewriter. Adler credibly testified that she had never asked Menzie or anyone else about how to get out of the Union. Gibbs testified, regarding the same conversation with Menzie, that Menzie had called him and Adler into Menzie's office and had told them that some employees had asked him how to get out of the Union. Menzie told Adler and Gibbs that they could write a letter, using a company typewriter, stating that negotiations should cease. They would have to get five people to sign this letter and they would have to get it notarized. Menzie also told them that they would have to do all those things on their own. Gibbs credibly testified that he had never asked Menzie how to get out of the Union. I credit his testimony in this regard over Menzie's testimony that Gibbs had asked him how to get out of the Union. I credit Gibbs' and Adler's testimony in regard to the conversation with Menzie although Adler remembered the date of the conversation as February 27, whereas Gibbs remembered it as February 23. I do not credit Menzie's testimony that Gibbs asked on his own initiative if he could use the company typewriter to type the affidavit requesting that negotiations cease.

Accordingly, I find that Menzie's conversation with Gibbs and Adler violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in that Menzie solicited Gibbs and Adler to withdraw their support of the Union and offered a company typewriter to type an affidavit to that effect.

As to the third and fourth allegations above, Gibbs testified that Menzie had also said during that above conversation that if five people did not sign a letter to stop negotiations with the Union, it would be impossible to get a company (nonbargaining unit) job. According to Gibbs, Menzie then went on to identify George Brouillete (the employee previously identified by Menzie as having cast the one "no" vote for the Union) as the only person who, at that time, could get a company job if he asked for one. Menzie then said that, after five people signed a letter requesting that negotiations cease, so-called company jobs would become available to them. Finally, Gibbs remembered Menzie saying that Peabody was not negotiating at that time but when it did start negotiating it would not give the employees what they wanted, that instead the employees would have to take what Peabody gave them.

I find that Respondent promised favorable consideration for jobs for those who signed a letter requesting that negotiations cease and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. It is not clear whether the comment on bargaining indicated simply his opinion that the Company would take a hard bargaining stance or was, alternatively, implying that negotiations would be futile.

In view of the context in which this occurred, especially his urging employees to disavow the Union, I find the bargaining comment violative of Section 8(a)(1).

9. It is alleged that sometime during the latter part of February 1981 Mine Superintendent Menzie solicited employees to withdraw support for the Union by encouraging the employees to prepare letters informing the Union they no longer wished it to be their collective-bargaining representative. Pertinent to this allegation, employee Richardson testified that Menzie told him and his fellow employees Robinson and Brouillete that Menzie had been approached by three employees who wanted to know how they could get out of the Union. Menzie told Richardson and the others that they could either write a letter individually or they could write a letter collectively saying that they no longer wanted the Union to represent them. Richardson credibly testified that he had never asked Menzie or anyone else how to get out of the Union. Menzie's testimony did not contradict Richardson in regard to this conversation in any significant respect. Therefore, I find Menzie's conduct in soliciting employees Richardson, Robinson, and Brouillete to write a letter saying they no longer wished to be represented by the United Mine Workers to be a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

10. It is alleged that sometime during the latter part of February 1981 Mine Superintendent Menzie solicited an employee to withdraw support for the Union by encouraging the employee to prepare and sign a letter informing the Union that he desired to withdraw from the Union.

Regarding this allegation, employee Don Emmons credibly testified that, in late February 1981, Menzie told him that if he wanted to get out of the Union he could write and sign a letter which said he no longer wanted to be in the Union. Although Menzie testified that he gave Emmons this information because Emmons had previously asked him how to get out of the Union, Emmons credibly denied that he had ever asked Menzie about getting out of the Union. Therefore, I find that in this instance, the information Menzie proffered was tantamount to a solicitation that the employee write and sign a letter saying that the employee wished to withdraw from the Union. Accordingly, I find this conduct to be a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

11. It is further alleged that on or about March 2, 1981, Menzie solicited an employee to withdraw support from the Union by encouraging the employee to prepare a notarized letter requesting the Union to cease negotiations. It is also alleged that he offered to allow the employee to use Respondent's typewriter to prepare such a notarized letter. Regarding these allegations, Lori Wahls testified that on March 2, while she was working in the warehouse clerk's office, Menzie approached her and mentioned that three or four employees had asked him about getting out of the Union and he advised her that she could type an affidavit to that effect. Menzie pointed in the direction of the warehouse typewriter and told Wahls that she could use it to type the affidavit. Wahls further credibly testified that she had never asked Menzie for any procedure about getting out of the Union. In this respect, Menzie did testify that only two persons, Danny Gibbs and Don Emmons, had asked him about getting out of the Union. Menzie admitted that none of the other employees had solicited his advice about getting out of the Union. Danny Gibbs specifically denied that he had ever inquired about the manner of getting out of the Union. I credit Gibbs in this respect. Even assuming that one or more employees did ask Menzie what they should do in order to get out of the Union, I find that he gratuitously volunteered information to others concerning a procedure for getting out of the Union. I credit Wahls' testimony about the March 2 conversation and find that by soliciting her to execute an affidavit withdrawing support from the Union and by offering her the use of a company typewriter, that Respondent in both respects violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

B. The 8(a)(5) Allegations

It is undisputed that on January 9, 1981, a majority of the employees in the warehouse unit selected the United Mine Workers as their collective- bargaining representative and that on January 19 the Regional Director certified the United Mine Workers as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in said unit. It is undisputed that on or about January 29, 1981, the Charging Party by mailgram requested Respondent to recognize and bargain with it as the exclusive representative of Respondent's employees, namely, the warehouse clerk's unit. (See G.C. Exh. 7.) It is further undisputed that by letter on or about February 6, 1981, Respondent denied the request for recognition and bargaining. (See G.C. Exh. 8.) Thus, with respect to the 8(a)(5) allegations, it is admitted that Respondent has refused the certified Union's request for recognition and bargaining. Respondent's counsel alleged that the existing National Bituminous Coal Agreement, introduced here as Respondent's Exhibit 2, is a bar to negotiations and/or certification of the warehouse clerk's unit. Respondent's counsel conceded that he wished to appeal the Board's decision denying review in the representation case and that, therefore, a refusal to bargain was necessary in order to test the appropriateness of the certification, under these circumstances.

In view of the Board's denial of review by mailgram (introduced here as G.C. Exh. 5), I have no alternative but to hold that the certification is appropriate, and that Respondent's refusal to bargain is unwarranted. Accordingly, I find that Respondent's refusal to recognize and bargain with the certified Union is a refusal to bargain within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Peabody Coal Company, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Charging Party, International Union, United Mine Workers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent, through its Mine Superintendent Ron Menzie, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by: threatening employees, on or about December 12, 1980, and January 7, 1981, with loss of seniority and employment should they select the Union as their collective-bargaining representative; interrogating an employee regarding his signing of a union card and his union support; threatening an employee with loss of seniority and loss of employment if the Union won; interrogating an employee as to how the employee voted in the election; threatening an employee, on February 15, 1981, with loss of seniority and loss of employment because employees selected the Union as their bargaining representative; soliciting employees to withdraw their support for the Union by encouraging them to prepare notarized letters requesting that negotiations cease; offering to allow employees to use Respondent's typewriters to prepare such notarized letters; promising that Respondent would give more favorable consideration, in awarding jobs, to employees who signed the letter requesting that negotiations cease; implying that union representation was futile by stating that Respondent would only give the employees what Respondent wished; soliciting employees to write a letter saying they no longer wished to be represented by the United Mine Workers; soliciting an employee to withdraw support for the United Mine Workers by encouraging the employee to prepare and sign a letter informing the Union that the employee desired to withdraw from the Union. The above enumerated conduct on December 12, 1980, January 7, February 15 and 23, and March 2, 1981, all constitute separate violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. Respondent's refusal on or about February 6, 1981, to recognize or bargain with the duly certified Union, herein the United Mine Workers, constitutes a refusal to bargain and is a violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

5. The above enumerated unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of the Act. Except for the unfair labor practices found herein, the remainder of the unfair labor practice allegations are dismissed.

THE REMEDY

The recommended Order will require Respondent to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found. Respondent shall also be required to bargain with the United Mine Workers for 1 full year from the date bargaining between the two parties initially begins.

ORDER[1]

The Respondent, Peabody Coal Company, Stonefort, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Threatening employees with loss of seniority and/or loss of employment if the Union were selected as bargaining representative; interrogating employees about their union sympathies, or their signing of union cards, or as to how they voted in a Board election.

(b) Soliciting employees to withdraw their support for the Union and offering the use of Respondent's typewriters in preparing letters requesting negotiations cease.

(c) Promising employees more favorable consideration on company jobs if employees wrote letters stating they no longer wished to be represented or if they requested negotiations cease; telling employees that Respondent would only give employees what Respondent wanted in negotiations, thereby implying negotiations would be futile.

(d) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the United Mine Workers, the duly certified collective-bargaining representative of the warehouse employees.

[1] In the event no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order herein shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and become its findings, conclusions, and Order, and all objections thereto shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

2. Take the following affirmative action in order to effectuate the purposes of the Act:

(a) Bargain in good faith with United Mine Workers, the duly certified bargaining representative of Respondent's warehouse employees.

(b) Post at Respondent's facility at St. Louis, Missouri, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by it immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by Respondent for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director for Region 14, in writing, within 20 days from the date of of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

---

[3] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

February 4, 1982

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Fanning, Jenkins, and Zimmerman

On March 13, 1981, Administrative Law Judge George F. McInerny issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel and Respondent filed exceptions, supporting briefs, and answering briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge as modified herein.

The Administrative Law Judge found that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the Act in July 1978. We agree for the following reasons. As the Administrative Law Judge found, Respondent tabled Jessica M. Burstein's application for membership in April 1978. In July 1978, it pressured King-Hitzig Productions, a firm which wished to hire Burstein, first, to seek Respondent's approval for Burstein to work on a film as a nonunion employee and, second, to hire a union still photographer in place of Burstein. Respondent thereby interfered with the employment relationship between Burstein and King-Hitzig because she was not a member while it simultaneously refused to admit her to membership. These actions clearly restrained and coerced Burstein in the exercise of her Section 7 rights and caused King-Hitzig to discriminate against her with regard to her employment on a ground other than her refusal or failure to tender union dues and fees. International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers, Local No. 7, AFL (Seattle Construction Council), 92 NLRB 753, 763 (1950). We therefore find it unnecessary additionally to rely, as did the Administrative Law Judge, on his finding that Respondent had discriminatorily refused membership to Burstein.[2]

Amended Remedy

Having found that Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) by requiring that it approve Burstein's presence on King-Hitzig's film set and by subsequently causing King-Hitzig to remove her from its payroll, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. In accordance with our recent decisions in Iron Workers Local 118, International Association of Bridge and Structural Ironworkers, AFL–CIO (Pittsburgh Des Moines Steel Company), 257 NLRB No. 78 (1981), and Sheet Metal Workers' Union Local 355, Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, AFL–CIO (Zinsco Electrical Products), 254 NLRB 773 (1981), we shall require that Respondent (1) make Jessica M. Burstein whole for all losses of wages and benefits suffered as a result of Respondent's discrimination against her from the date of Respondent's unlawful conduct until she is reinstated by King-Hitzig to her former or substantially equivalent position or until she obtains substantially equivalent employment elsewhere;[3] (2) notify King-Hitzig in writing, with a copy to Jessica M. Burstein, that it has no objection to her hiring or employment; and (3) affirmatively request that King-Hitzig hire her for the employment which she would have had were it not for Respondent's unlawful conduct, or for substantially equivalent employment.

[1] Respondent has excepted to certain credibility findings made by the Administrative Law Judge. It is the Board's established policy not to overrule an administrative law judge's resolutions with respect to credibility unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, Inc., 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing his findings.

[2] The Administrative Law Judge concluded that Respondent violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) in April 1978 by discriminatorily denying membership to Burstein. Respondent excepts to this conclusion, relying partly on the fact, as noted by the Administrative Law Judge, that there was no showing that its conduct had an adverse impact on Burstein's employment in April 1978. It also contends that the matter was not fully litigated, and notes that the General Counsel did not allege such a violation until his post-hearing brief. We find it unnecessary to pass on the Administrative Law Judge's finding of this additional violation since, in light of the other violations found herein and Burstein's subsequent admission to Respondent's membership, the finding of such an additional violation would not materially affect our Order.

[3] Loss of earnings, if any, shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Company, 99 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

We recognize that, due to the nature of employment in the film industry, the facts of this case may present issues concerning the proper application of the remedy herein. We leave the resolution of any such issues to the compliance stage of these proceedings. In agreement with the Administrative Law Judge, we also leave to the compliance stage the determination of the effect, if any, of a letter from Herbert Burstein, counsel for Jessica M. Burstein, to the Administrative Law Judge, dated March 19, 1979.

259 NLRB No. 185

We have also found, in agreement with the Administrative Law Judge, that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by maintaining in its contracts union-security clauses which do not provide for the statutory 30-day waiting period before requiring union membership. Since not all of the parties to Respondent's contracts are before us, however, we shall not adopt the Administrative Law Judge's recommendation that Respondent be ordered to revise the union-security provisions of its contracts. Rather, we shall order Respondent to notify each employer with whom it has a contract, by mailing each a copy of the attached notice marked "Appendix" that the provisions found herein to be violative of the Act will be given no further force or effect. See American Guild of Variety Artists, AFL–CIO (Fontainebleau Hotel Corporation, d/b/a Fontainebleau Hotel), 163 NLRB 457, 474 (1967).

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, International Photographers of the Motion Picture Industries, Local No. 644 of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving Picture Machine Operators of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO, New York, New York, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall:

1. Cease and desist from:

(a) Causing or attempting to cause King-Hitzig Productions to cease paying Jessica M. Burstein for her work or otherwise discriminate against her because of her nonmembership in Respondent.

(b) Requiring King-Hitzig Productions to obtain permission from Respondent before allowing employees of King-Hitzig Productions on its sets or filming locations.

(c) Maintaining in its contracts with producers of feature films and commercials union-security provisions which do not provide the statutory 30-day waiting period before requiring union membership.

(d) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Make Jessica M. Burstein whole for all losses of wages and benefits suffered as a result of its discrimination against her in the manner set forth in the "Amended Remedy" herein.

(b) Notify all employers with which it has a collective-bargaining agreement, by mailing each a copy of the attached notice marked "Appendix," that the union-security provisions, found herein to be violative of the Act, will be given no further force or effect.

(c) Post at its offices and meeting rooms copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being duly signed by Respondent's representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for 60 consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Deliver to the Regional Director for Region 2 signed copies of the notice for posting by King-Hitzig Productions, if willing, in places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(e) Notify the Regional Director for Region 2, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has taken to comply herewith.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

Following a hearing at which all parties had an opportunity to present evidence and cross-examine witnesses, the National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act, and has ordered us to post and distribute this notice. We intend to abide by the following:

WE WILL NOT cause or attempt to cause King-Hitzig Productions to cease paying Jessica M. Burstein for her work or otherwise discriminate against her because of her nonmembership in Local No. 644.

WE WILL NOT require King-Hitzig Productions to obtain permission from Local No. 644 before allowing employees of King-Hitzig Productions on its sets or filming locations.

WE WILL NOT maintain in our contracts with employers union-security provisions which do not provide the statutory 30-day waiting period before requiring union membership.

---

[4] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make Jessica M. Burstein whole, with interest, for all losses of wages and benefits suffered as a result of our discrimination against her until she is either reinstated by King-Hitzig Productions to her former or a substantially equivalent position or until she obtains substantially equivalent employment elsewhere.

WE WILL affirmatively request that King-Hitzig Productions hire Jessica M. Burstein for the employment which she would have had were it not for our unlawful conduct, or for substantially equivalent employment.

WE WILL notify all employers with which we have collective-bargaining agreements that the union-security provisions found by the Board to be violative of the Act will be given no further force or effect.

INTERNATIONAL PHOTOGRAPHERS OF THE MOTION PICTURE INDUSTRIES, LOCAL NO. 644 OF THE INTERNATIONAL ALLIANCE OF THEATRICAL STAGE EMPLOYEES AND MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA, AFL-CIO

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE F. MCINERNY, Administrative Law Judge: On July 25, 1978, the charge in this case was filed by James F. Maher.[1] The charge alleged that International Photographers of the Motion Picture Industries, Local No. 644 of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving Picture Machine Operators of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO, herein referred to as the Union, Local 644, or Respondent, had discriminated against Jessica Burstein in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A), 8(b)(2), and 8(b)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. 151, et seq., herein referred to as the Act.

Thereafter, on September 13, 1978, the Regional Director for Region 2 of the National Labor Relations Board, herein referred to as the Board, issued a complaint alleging that the Union had discriminated against Jessica Burstein by denying her the opportunity to be employed by King-Hitzig Productions, herein referred to as King-Hitzig or the Employer, and by maintaining an initiation fee which in all the circumstances is excessive and discriminatory. Respondent filed an answer in which it denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to notice accompanying the complaint herein, a hearing was held before me in new York, New York.[2] The hearing opened on February 27, 1979. At that time it appeared that the parties had arrived at an informal settlement of the issues. The hearing was accordingly adjourned until April 2, 1979. In the meantime the Union and Jessica Burstein worked out their differences. Miss Burstein was given full membership rights in the Union and, in a letter to me dated March 19, 1979, from her attorney and father, Herbert Burstein, stated that she waived any remedy which the Board could ultimately award. In addition, Mr. Burstein requested that I permit the instant charge to be withdrawn either in its entirety or, alternatively, those portions of the charge alleging violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the Act. On March 22, 1979, counsel for the Union wrote me a letter setting forth a similar description of the agreement between Miss Burstein and the Union, and requesting that I permit the charges in this case to be withdrawn. The General Counsel, in turn, sent me a telegram voicing his opposition to the proposed withdrawal on the basis that the informal settlement did not settle "questions of closed shop practices" affecting "more than just an individual filing a charge at the Board." In addition, the General Counsel mentioned that another charge had been filed with the New York Regional Office[3] which might be consolidated with the instant case.[4]

The hearing resumed on April 2, 1979. At that time I denied the requests of the Union and the Charging Party to withdraw the charges (and to dismiss all or part of the complaint).

The hearing was then adjourned, sine die,[5] to allow the Union to appeal my ruling to the Board. On July 20 the Union addressed a letter to the Board requesting permission to appeal from my decision. The General Counsel duly filed an opposition to this request. The request was denied in a telegram from Associate Executive Secretary George A. Leet.[6]

Following receipt of the Board's ruling, and by agreement of the parties, the hearing resumed on September 7, 1979, at which time I reviewed with the parties subpenas issued by the General Counsel to Respondent and a petition to revoke the subpenas filed by Respondent. I made a number of rulings on these matters and at the close of the day adjourned the hearing, again sine die to allow the General Counsel to appeal those rulings, in the instances adverse to him, to the Board, and to move in the United States district court to enforce a subpena requiring Jessica Burstein to appear and testify in this matter.[7] The [4] This did not happen. I am unaware of the disposition of Case 2-CB-7742.

[5] At that time it seemed probable that an informal settlement between the parties could be reached. It did not, however, work out.

[6] The telegram noted that then Board Member Murphy would have granted the appeal and approved the settlement.

[7] Miss Burstein had notified the General Counsel that she would not appear voluntarily and testify in this proceeding.

Union filed an opposition to the General Counsel's appeal of my rulings. That appeal was denied, again telegraphically, over the signature of Associate Executive Secretary Enid Weber, under date of November 9, 1979.

On March 21, 1980, the General Counsel filed an "Application for Order Requiring Obedience to Subpoena ad Testificandum" in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York (Case M-18-304). As a result of this application, the court (Canella, J.) issued a consent order on March 31, 1980, ordering that Jessica M. Burstein appear before me in this hearing.[8]

After this, the hearing resumed on May 27, 1980,[9] continued on May 28, and concluded on May 29. At the hearing all parties had the opportunity to present testimony and documentary evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. Following the hearing the Union and the General Counsel filed briefs, which have been carefully considered.

Based upon the entire record in this case including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The jurisdiction of the Board over the Employer herein is not in question. I find that the Employer, King-Hitzig Productions, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees (IATSE) is a union established along craft lines, with jurisdiction over technical craft and support phases of the motion picture, stage, and television industries. The record in this case shows that IATSE comprises 38 crafts, trades, and occupations organized into separate locals.

Those employees who are members of IATSE and who actually engaged in photography, whether on tape or film, and auxiliary equipment necessary for the operations of cameras are gathered into three locals in the United States. Local 659, located in Hollywood, is the largest of the three, representing about 3,000 employees, and has jurisdiction over the western States. Local 666 is headquartered in Chicago. It is the smallest of the three, and has jurisdiction over 22 States in the central part of the country. Local 644, Respondent here, has something over 800 members, and has jurisdicton over the east coast from Maine to Georgia. Local 644 is based in New York City and much of the work its members do is performed there, although the record indicates that camera crews who are members of Local 644 may be dispatched to other parts of the United States, or abroad, with some frequency.

Local 644 has collective-bargaining agreements with a number of companies engaged in the production of films produced to be shown either in theaters or on television. The contract in effect during the times material here contains a union-security provision requiring:

> 2(c) All cameramen in the employ of the Producer on the date hereof, and all cameramen hereafter hired shall, as a condition of continued employment, be or become members of Local 644 not later than the 31st day following the beginning of their first employment as hereinafter defined, or the effective date of this sub-paragraph, whichever is later, and all such cameramen, upon being or becoming members of Local 644 as aforesaid, shall be required, as a condition of continued employment, to maintain such membership in good standing during the life hereof.
> (d) "First employment" as referred to in subparagraph (c) hereof shall (unless and until determined by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, the Board, or a court of competent jurisdiction) mean the first such employment for producers under contract with Local 644 on or after the execution of this agreement, within any of the classifications covered hereby.[10]

Article 7 of the contract is a general provision covering, among other matters, crew size and composition on feature films.[11] Article 7(j) provides:

> "On all features (theatrical or television) and on production of Television Series, the photographic working crew shall consist of a First Cameraman, Operative Cameraman, First Assistant Cameraman and Second Assistant Cameraman."

Section (n) states:

> On all feature productions (theatrical or television) a Still Cameraman shall be a mandatory part of the crew when all or a major (at least two-thirds) portion of the production is being photographed within the jurisdiction of Local 644. If less than all or a major portion of the feature is being photographed in Local 644's jurisdiction, the Still Cameraman shall be a part of the crew so long as the shooting continues with any featured member of the cast. In all other cases where still photography of any kind

[8] Judge Canella's order required Miss Burstein to appear at this hearing which was then scheduled for April 7, 1980. Due to a transit strike in New York, the matter was postponed by agreement of all parties until May 27, 1980, at which time Miss Burstein did appear and testified.

[9] David Kapelman, who had been serving as counsel for the General Counsel, resigned from the Regional Office in April 1980. He was succeeded at these last 3 days of the hearing by Carole Sobin.

[10] Substantially the same provisions govern employment under a separate agreement between Local 644 and producers of television commercials.

[11] King-Hitzig Productions is a joint venture organized to produce a feature film for television under an arrangement with the American Broadcasting Company (ABC).

is used in connection with a production, a Still Cameraman shall be a part of the crew.

Section (i) of the same article states:

> "Operation of still cameras shall be performed only by Still Cameramen represented by Local 644."

By way of explanation, the record in this case shows that feature films consume anywhere from 3 weeks to several months in actual filming time. Still pictures (as opposed to the moving pictures which are being taken as part of the production) are used to record the actors' makeup, as well as the arrangement of the set, at the end of each day, so that uniformity of appearance and arrangement can be maintained. Still photographs are also used for advertising and publicity purposes.

The collective-bargaining agreement also sets out wage scales and classifications for the period covered by the facts in this case as follows:

Director of photography (first cameraman)	$249 per day
Operative and additional cameraman	$195 per day
Assistant cameramen	$115 per day
Second assistant cameraman	$91 per day
Still cameraman	$146 per day

It should be noted further that the contract specifically permits individual employees to negotiate better terms and conditions than those set out therein. It is manifest from all the testimony on the subject herein that Local 644 perceives itself as an elite organization, made up of members possessing unique and precious artistic talent. Thus, Respondent's business representative, Darwin Deen, testified that directors of photography, entitled under the terms of the contract to $1,245 per week, average $6,000 for the same period in Local 644's jurisdiction (and $15,000 a week in the Hollywood Local 659). Most other classifications, according to Deen, similarly negotiate arrangements at varying amounts above the scales set out in the contract.

This fortunate state of things is more than offset by chronic and severe unemployment in the industry. According to the testimony of Darwin Deen, and in communications from Deen and Union President Larry Racies to the membership printed in the Union's bulletin, the problem, caused in part by the employment of aliens on films made in the United States, the use of nonunion crews, and the incursions of a rival union, Local 15 of the National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians, AFL-CIO (NABET), affected the majority of Respondent's members.[12] The attitude of Local 644 and its officers toward Local 15 NABET as expressed in Local 644's bulletins, and in Deen's comments at the hearing, was one of unremitting hostility.

Aside from these external causes for the serious unemployment among Respondent's members, the membership and the leadership recognized another, internal, cause; namely, the number of members on Local 644's roster. The perception of the membership in the spring of 1978 was that there were too many members, and that to process more applications and admit more new members would work to the disadvantage of the existing membership by further reducing opportunities for work. This view was opposed by President Racies and Business Representative Deen, at least as reported in the Union's bulletin, but on March 27, 1978, the Union's executive board voted to table all applications for membership until a membership policy committee appointed to recommend a new policy acceptable to the executive board and the membership did so. The committee report was due by May 15, 1978, but apparently no mutually acceptable plan was forthcoming until October 1978 when the bulletin for that month announced that at a meeting in September a new membership policy was adopted. This policy required prospective applicants to be issued an "information sheet" rather than an application. This sheet would then be screened by union officials to ascertain if the member was qualified to receive an application. In addition, the new policy tied the reception of new members to the percentage of current members unemployed during a given period.

This new policy was adopted despite the vehement objections of President Racies as expressed in the June 1978, summer 1978, and October 1978 bulletins, and remained in effect until at least the first half of 1979.

Meanwhile, Jessica M. Burstein, on whose behalf the charge in this case was filed, had been employed in the late 1970's by the National Broadcasting Company (NBC) as a still photographer. While she was employed at NBC, Burstein participated in a union organizing campaign. In this campaign both Local 644 and Local 15 NABET were competing for the loyalties of the employees. Burstein was approached by representatives of Local 644[13] both as a member of the employees' group, and individually, in efforts to persuade her to support Local 644. But she declined and instead threw her support to NABET, which became the representative for the employees involved, including Burstein.[14]

In March 1978 Jessica Burstein had started working for herself as a photographer. In pursuance of her career objectives she went to the offices of Local 644 to apply for membership. There she spoke with Business Representative Darwin Deen. According to Burstein's testimony, which I credit and which was corroborated by Deen, he told her that her membership application would not be processed at that time. She mentioned her experience at NBC and Deen replied that the fact that she had worked for NBC in a unit sought by Local 644, and that the unit had rejected Local 644, might hurt her chances for getting into Local 644. He said "people" in the Union were angry about the NBC situation. Burstein was not admitted into membership at that time.

[12] In a letter to Senator Daniel P. Moynihan of New York, reprinted in the June 1978 edition of the bulletin, Deen estimated that unemployment at 75 percent but revised that figure downward in his testimony. There is no dispute that the unemployment rate was inordinately high.

[13] Since those representatives were not identified in the complaint, nor alleged to be agents of Local 644, I have not considered statements attributed to them by Burstein, but I do credit her testimony, which was credible and undenied, that she was approached by those representatives.

[14] Further details of the relations between this group of employees of NBC are not important to the issues in this case. Apparently there was an unsuccessful strike and, possibly as a result, Burstein left NBC in the early spring of 1978.

It is in this context that the facts in this case developed.

B. The Alleged Discrimination Against Jessica Burstein

During her employment with NBC Jessica Burstein had met, and apparently impressed, Rupert Hitzig, president of Rupert Productions and a film producer of some 15 years' experience. Sometime in the spring of 1978 Hitzig formed a joint venture with Alan King Productions, Inc., which took the name of King-Hitzig Productions (King-Hitzig). One purpose of the joint venture was to produce a film to be shown on ABC television and to be entitled "How To Pick Up Girls." Despite the title, this was to be a serious effort by a number of presumably talented individuals and budgeted at $1,100,000. Actual production was to start on July 10.

Toward the end of June, Hitzig and Jessica Burstein discussed her employment on the film as a still photographer. Beyond the usual requirements for the still photographer on this production, the script called for a principal character, who was himself a photographer, to use photographs taken on the set as a part of the plot. Thus, a portion of the still photographer's work product would become an integral part of the film. As the result of these discussions between Hitzig, Burstein, and King-Hitzig's production manager, Bruce Pustin, Burstein was hired on June 30 as the still photographer for "How To Pick Up Girls" at the Union's scale which was then $146 per day.

There was some conversation between Pustin, Hitzig, and Burstein concerning the fact that she was not a member of Local 644. It is clear from Hitzig's testimony that Burstein was hired as the still photographer on the set; that he was aware that she was not a member of Local 644; and that Local 644 required that a still photographer be on the set of a feature film.[15] Hitzig's motivations in all of this are not so clear. For example, he testified that the film, "How To Pick Up Girls," was budgeted for only one still photographer. Then, on July 6, he wrote to Darwin Deen requesting permission to use Burstein as "a still photographer" on the set, and setting out the "unique situation" present in this film and Burstein's ability to fill these production needs. He closed with the statement that he understood the matter would have to be discussed with the Union's executive board, and that King-Hitzig would have "a Local 644 still photographer on the set as well." Burstein testified that Hitzig told her he would back her right to be on the set, and would be supportive of her as long as the Union did not pull its crew off the set. She further stated that Pustin told her to go and check with Deen to find out whether she could actually work on the film.

After this last conversation Burstein did call Deen and asked him if she would be prevented by the Union from working. Deen told her that "by law we can't prevent you from working" and told her the matter of whether she could come on the set as a nonunion person with a standby would have to be decided by the Union's executive board.[16]

It is thus evident that Burstein knew what she wanted to do—to be the still photographer on the set of "How To Pick Up Girls." Hitzig's motivations are not so clear. On the one hand he assured Burstein that she was to be the still photographer on the film. On the other hand he stated in his letter to Deen that he understood that he would be required to hire a Local 644 member as still photographer for the file. At the same time Hitzig knew that he was budgeted for only one still photographer.

Burstein reported for work on July 10 at the beginning of the production and she worked, alone, as the still photographer on the set.

On that same evening the Union's executive board met and considered King- Hitzig's request regarding Burstein's employment. Dean testified that he had gained the impression that Hitzig's request and Burstein's call indicated that what they wanted was for Burstein to be a "special" photographer on the film. Special photographers were described in the record as people possessing special, even unique, talents and who may be used to perform specific functions on a set. However, Dean's testimony was contradicted by an excerpt from the minutes of the Union's executive board for July 10. The minutes submitted in evidence show that the board considered a request from King-Hitzig to "use applicant[17] Jessica Burstein as Still Cameraman and has requested permission for her to work . . . ." The minutes went on to record that the board voted to "get a full five man crew and allow Ms. Burstein to do actor's point of view pictures only." I accept the executive board minutes as accurately reflecting what occurred at the meeting, and I reject Deen's testimony that Burstein was actually seeking to be a special photographer on the film.

The next morning another still photographer, Curtis Kaufman,[18] reported to the set. According to Hitzig, they had to hire Kaufman because they were required to have a still photographer on the set when shooting a union film. He added that Burstein was not a member of the Union so they had to hire Kaufman. If Burstein had been a union member it would not, according to Hitzig, have been necessary to hire another still photographer. Bruce Pustin informed Burstein on July 11 that since she was not a member of Local 644 the Company had to put a union person on the set. Pustin told Burstein that Kaufman had to be paid, but she was not, since they could afford one still photographer.

Burstein continued to work on the film even though she was not paid until the filming was concluded, a period of 4 weeks. The evidence shows that she did receive a check for 1 week's pay, but that she returned that money to King-Hitzig. Kaufman was paid for 5 full weeks. There was no evidence on what either Burstein or Kaufman actually did during the filming.[19]

[15] The actual agreement between King-Hitzig and Local 644 was not executed by Hitzig until July 5, 1978, and by the Union on July 26, 1978. However, Hitzig is a producer with 15 years' experience. I infer and find for that reason that he was aware of local 644's contractual requirements.

[16] This was substantially corroborated by Deen.

[17] An excerpt from the executive board minutes of April 10, 1978, shows that Burstein's application had been tabled.

[18] Respondent maintains that there is no evidence that Kaufman is a member of Local 644. However, he was identified as such by Hitzig, and an exhibit prepared by Local 644 and received in evidence herein shows that Curtis H. Kaufman was initiated as a member of Local 644 as a still photographer on July 1, 1976.

Reviewing these facts in consideration of the several allegations of the complaint, I first will consider the question of Respondent's refusal to grant membership to Jessica Burstein in March 1978. While this is not alleged in the complaint as discriminatory, the General Counsel does claim in her brief that this action by Respondent was discriminatory and did violate Section 8(b)(l)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the Act. The matter was fully litigated at the hearing and I feel in the circumstances there is no prejudice to any party in my deciding the issue.

The facts on this point are clear and undisputed. Jessica Burstein went to Respondent's offices and spoke to Business Representative Deen. Deen informed her that her chances for getting into the Union were not good, and he mentioned that her past affiliation with Local 15, NABET, and her concurrent rejection of overtures by Local 644 would be held against her. Deen's own hostility to NABET was manifest in his demeanor while testifying, and the feelings Respondent President Racies as expressed in the columns of its newsletter I find accurately reflect the views of Respondent toward NABET.

Respondent maintains that Burstein's failure to gain membership resulted from its policy, uniformly applied from March 27, 1978, on, to table and refuse to act on all applications for membership. However, the list submitted in evidence listing new members of Respondent shows that from March 28, 1978, the day after the executive board voted to table all membership applications to July 10, 1978, when Burstein began working for King-Hitzig, 23 people were accepted into membership. From July 10 until the end of 1978 10 more members were accepted.

Because of this contradiction between what Respondent says and what the evidence shows, and the undenied existence of a discriminatory motivation, I find the action of Respondent in denying union membership to Burstein at the executive board meeting of April 10, 1978, to be a violation of Section 8(b)(l)(A) of the Act. There is, however, no evidence in this record that Burstein sought employment anywhere else between April and her talks with Hitzig in late June. Thus, I cannot find a violation of Section 8(b)(2) in this matter in that time period.

Based upon the facts outlined above, there is no question but that Jessica Burstein was hired by King-Hitzig to be the still photographer on the film "How To Pick Up Girls" in late June 1978. The film was budgeted for one still photographer and the check and the payroll slip entered in evidence show that Burstein was on the payroll, and was paid, for 1 week. On July 5 there was a conversation between Darwin Deen and King-Hitzig's production manager, Bruce Pustin. There is no direct evidence on this conversation. Deen did not mention it during his extensive testimony, and Pustin was not available as a witness during the hearing in May 1980. The substance of the conversation can, nevertheless, be reconstructed from documents in evidence and from other testimony. For example, it appears from Rupert Hitzig's letter of July 6, 1978, to Darwin Deen that the letter was written as a result of that conversation. It further appears that Deen required that the letter be written as a formal request from the Employer to be permitted to use Jessica Burstein as the still photographer on the film "How To Pick Up Girls." Thus, I infer and find that Respondent, acting through Deen, required King-Hitzig formally to request permission for Burstein to work on the film.

The last paragraph of the July 6 letter likewise furnishes an insight into the substance of the conversation of July 5 between Deen and Pustin. In that paragraph Hitzig wrote, "It is our understanding that this matter will be discussed by the Executive Board and, if approved, we will also have a Local 644 still photographer on the set as well [sic]." This agreement to employ a Local 644 still photographer runs contrary to the testimony of both Burstein and Hitzig to the effect that Burstein was to be the only still photographer on the set. The film was budgeted for only one still photographer. There was no indication from the reported conversations between Hitzig and Burstein that a standby photographer was to be hired. But both knew that Burstein was not a member of Local 644, and Hitzig had assured Burstein that he would back her until the Union started to pull the crew off the set. Therefore, even in the absence of direct testimony, I infer and find from the hostility shown to Burstein by Deen because of her former association with NABET; the fact that Hitzig had hired Burstein with the warning that he would not back her, i.e., continue her employment, if he were threatened with a walkout by Respondent; and the statement in the July 6 letter, contrary to Hitzig's prior statements, that a Local 644 still photographer would be hired; that this shift resulted from pressure applied by Deen in his conversation with Pustin on July 5. The natural and probable result of such a conversation was exactly what happened; Burstein was advised that she would not be paid for her work.

In accord with these findings and inferences, I find that Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) by requiring that it approve the presence of Burstein on the set. International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers, Local No. 7, AFL (Seattle Construction Council), 92 NLRB 753 (1950). Respondent's arguments that it is responsible for keeping the set or filming area free from "papparazzi"[20] or other unwanted intruders rings hollow. There is no indication in the collective-bargaining agreement, or elsewhere in the record, that the Union has any right or obligation to ensure the tranquility of an employer's set or filming location.

I find further that Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) in that it caused King-Hitzig to remove Burstein from its payroll, since Respondent had, as I have found, discriminatorily refused to admit her to membership. Western Gillette, Inc., 201 NLRB 662 (1973).

[19] Hitzig testified that the photographs which he had hoped would be an "integral part of the film" in the end were not used at all.

[20] Papparazzi are freelance photographers whose business consist of taking photographs of celebrities which they may later sell to newspapers or magazines.

C. Respondent's Union-Security Clause

The General Counsel maintains that the union-security provisions, quoted above, in the collective-bargaining agreement between King-Hitzig and Respondent are unlawful and discriminatory within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

In evaluating this allegation, I am not unmindful of the problems which the Union faces due to the transient nature of the film production business; the woeful level of unemployment among its members; the fact that many of those members may make individual arrangements with employers both in terms of compensation and periods of employment; and intense competition for jobs with NABET, with foreigners, and with nonunion producers. The evidence here shows that employees may work for a number of different employers over the course of a year. Some of these employers maybe, as King-Hitzig apparently was, established for the purpose of making only one or two films. The evidence further shows that the shooting of a feature film usually lasts for only 3 to 5 weeks. It is thus understandable that the Union would take steps to assume continuity in membership and to preserve its integrity as a factor promoting and preserving the interests of its members in the industry.

The Union is not entitled to take measures which tend to interfere with the rights bestowed by the Act on employees and those who seek to be employees alike. Here, the definition of "first employment" contained in section 2(c) and (d) of the collective-bargaining agreement, requiring the accumulation of 31 days, even if that time is spent in working for different employers, and thereafter requiring union membership, clearly contravenes the statutory intent of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act governing such agreements.

There is no indication here, as in International Photographers of the Motion Picture Industries, Local 659 of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving Picture Machine Operators of the United States and Canada (MPO-TV of California Inc., Y-A Productions, Inc.), 197 NLRB 1187 (1972), of the existence of a multiemployer bargaining unit which might, even in the absence of continuous employment, provide some theoretical basis for legality to Respondent's union-security provisons. Here, even if there is a multiemployer unit, it is evident that King-Hitzig signed the contract as an individual employer. In this case, if an employee came to work for King-Hitzig with, say, 10 days of experience with another producer covered by the contract, he or she would be required to join Respondent no later than the 21st day of employment with King-Hitzig. Thereafter, this hypothetical employee could not go to work for any producer unless he or she continued as a member in good standing, through the duration of the contract or as long as this clause was perpetuated from contract to contract.

In the light of these conclusions I find that, by entering into and maintaining these union-shop provisions, Respondent has violated and is violating Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. Convair, A Division of General Dynamics Corporation, 111 NLRB 1055 (1955). Indeed, with respect to any employee who, during the tine such provisions are in effect, has completed 31 days of employment with any employer subject to its provisions, the provision constitutes a closed shop and a bar to employment unless that employee continues to remain a member of the Union in good standing. American Guild of Variety Artists (Fontainebleau Hotel), 163 NLRB 457 (1967).[21]

D. Respondent's Initiation Fee

The constitution and bylaws of Local 644, as revised on March 1, 1971, set the initiation fee for admission to membership in any classification[22] at four times the highest regular weekly scale for that classification.[23]

The General Counsel alleges in the complaint that the fee is excessive and discriminatory within the proscription of Section 8(b)(5) of the Act. Section 8(b)(5) reads, in pertinent part, as follows:

> [It shall be an unfair labor practice] "to require of employees covered by an agreement authorized under subsection (a)(3) the payment, as a condition precedent to becoming a member of such organization, of a fee in an amount which the Board finds excessive or discriminatory under all the circumstances . . . .

In construing this subsection, the Board has defined the applicability of the subsection "to situations only where a valid union shop contract covering the employees is in effect." Ferro Stamping and Manufacturing Co., 93 NLRB 1459 (1951).

Since I have already found that the union shop provisions of the contract here are invalid, this condition is not met. Accordingly, I can find no violation of Section 8(b)(5) and I need not consider the other arguments put forward by Respondent and the General Counsel on this issue.

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Having found that Respondent discriminated against Jessica Burstein on April 10, 1978, when its executive board voted to table her membership application, not admitting her to membership until March 21, 1979, I shall recommend that her admission be backdated to April 10, 1978, the date of the discrimination against her.

Since I have found that Respondent's actions discriminated against Jessica Burstein by denying her the wages due her in her employment with King-Hitzig Productions, I shall recommend that Respondent make Burstein whole for any loss of earnings suffered by her by reason of the discrimination against her.[24] Loss of earnings, if any, shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[21] Sec. 7(i) of the contract, quoted above, would also lead to the conclusion that Respondent maintained a closed shop, at least for still photographers, but this portion of the contract was not litigated and it may be that its intent is quite different from its tenor. I make no findings on this sec. 7(i).

[22] The Union admits members in the several classifications noted in the wage scales quoted above.

[23] There are exceptions to this applicable to children of members, who pay only 25 percent of the fee, and in cases where new classifications are being organized, upon a vote of two-thirds of the members at a regular or special meeting.

Having further found that Respondent has maintained invalid and unlawful union-security clauses in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2), I shall recommend that it cease and desist enforcing such clauses, and that it immediately revise those union-security clauses to conform to the strictures of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Further, I will recommend that Respondent notify all producers with whom these contractual provisions are in effect[25] of the terms of this order together with revised language conforming the union-security provisions of the contract to the law.

The General Counsel has requested that I order the reimbursement of union dues paid under the unlawful union-security provisions. In this case, however, the evidence shows that many members had held their membership for years[26] and there was no evidence to show that any member was coerced or had not acted voluntarily in affiliating themselves with the Union. Thus, I will not recommend that Respondent be ordered to reimburse dues. Local 60, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO [Mechanical Handling Systems] v. N.L.R.B., 365 U.S. 651 (1961).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Local 644 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. King-Hitzig Productions is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. By denying Jessica Burstein union membership because of her activities on behalf of another labor organization, Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. By requiring Jessica Burstein's employer to obtain permission of the Union to enter upon the employer's premises or filming location, Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

5. By causing Jessica Burstein's employer to cease paying her wages, Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

6. By maintaining union-security provisions which do not allow the statutory 30-day waiting period, Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

[24] I leave for the compliance stage of the proceedings the effect, if any, on this recommended order of the letter from Herbert Burstein, Esquire, to me, dated March 19, 1979, copies of which are in evidence in this case.

[25] This will include all producers of feature films and commercials, since it was stipulated that the latter contracts contain union-security provisions substantially identical to those in the feature producers' contracts.

[26] Note the length of service of many members mentioned in the Union's newsletters in evidence.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS FANNING, JENKINS, AND ZIMMERMAN

On May 14, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Clifford H. Anderson issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent filed an answering brief.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended Order.

Unlike our dissenting colleague, we agree with the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging casual truckdriver James Haynes, Jr., on December 18, 1979. Thus, we agree with the Administrative Law Judge's findings that the General Counsel has not demonstrated that Respondent's termination of Haynes was motivated by its desire to defend against the EEOC charge that had been filed against the Company by employee Black rather than by its desire to enforce its legitimate rules regarding accidents. And, in so finding, we point out, as did the Administrative Law Judge, that Haynes admitted that he had been involved in a vehicle accident which was preventable by him. Furthermore, we emphasize that it is undisputed that Respondent, at all relevant times, maintained unambiguous written rules which provided for the immediate termination of a casual truckdriver involved in an accident which was preventable by that driver.

As found by the Administrative Law Judge, there is clearly no evidence to establish that Respondent had a pattern of granting exceptions to its accident rules and that, under the circumstances, the failure of Respondent's agent, Carl Johnson, to report Haynes' accident in accordance with Respondent's rules does not denigrate from this finding. Thus, with the exception of Johnson, the record is devoid of evidence that Respondent has ever declined to report or condoned, forgiven, or otherwise failed to act upon any accident which was preventable by a casual driver. Additionally, as noted by the Administrative Law Judge, Chetkauskas, Respondent's terminal manager, and Kentros, Respondent's chief of terminal operations, testified without contradiction that they both acted according to company procedures on all accidents and that they knew of no unreported or ignored accidents. As further noted by the Administrative Law Judge, Chetkauskas credibly testified that he would have acted as he did upon learning of Haynes' accident even if he had not discovered the pending EEOC charge. We further note that there is no evidence that Johnson's conduct in failing to act upon Haynes' accident was either pursuant to any real or apparent authority from Respondent. To the contrary, and as noted by the Administrative Law Judge, Johnson had for several months prior to the termination of his employment with Respondent displayed inattentiveness to his work and had generally been negligent in following Respondent's procedures regarding personnel matters, including accident recording. Therefore, unlike our colleague, we emphasize, as did the Administrative Law Judge, that substantive weight should not be accorded the fact that Johnson failed to report Haynes' accident as required by Respondent's rules.

Furthermore, contrary to our colleague, we do not regard as significant Chetkauskas' discussion with employees Walters and Westbrook wherein they alleged that Haynes had been involved in an accident. In this regard, we note Chetkauskas' position that he took no immediate action concerning the allegations of these employees since they made it clear that they had not witnessed the event and they further refused to reveal the identity of the person who they claimed had been a witness thereto. Under these circumstances, the allegations of Walters and Westbrook amounted to nothing more than rumor and we can draw no adverse inferences from Respondent's decision not to institute an investigation based thereon.

Finally, our dissenting colleague relies heavily on his view that the EEOC charge was "on [Chetkauskas'] mind" during the meeting with Union Business Agent Barton which was arranged for the purpose of discussing Haynes' termination. In this respect, our colleague emphasizes the fact that, during this meeting, Chetkauskas mentioned the EEOC charge more than once.[2] Even were we to find that the EEOC charge was, in fact, on Chetkauskas' mind during this meeting, that finding would not be controlling since it is undisputed that it was Respondent's investigation of the EEOC charge which prompted Haynes to admit his involvement in an accident and any discussion of Haynes' termination would therefore necessarily include some reference to the EEOC charge. Such a finding, however, would be insufficient to establish that Respondent acted unlawfully in discharging Haynes.

[1] Since we agree with the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that Respondent terminated James Haynes, Jr., because he violated Respondent's uniform rules against retaining probationary or casual drivers who have been involved in preventable accidents, we find it unnecessary to pass on the Administrative Law Judge's additional finding that James Black's action in filing an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission charge constituted protected concerted activity within the purview of the Act.

259 NLRB No. 166

In sum, while we recognize, as did the Administrative Law Judge, that there exists some circumstantial evidence tending to discount the reason asserted by Respondent for its discharge of Haynes, such evidence cannot serve as proof of a violation. Rather, the General Counsel has the burden of establishing unfair labor practices by a preponderance of all the relevant evidence. Based on the record as a whole, we agree with the Administrative Law Judge that the General Counsel has not met his burden here.

ORDER

Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board adopts as its Order the recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge and hereby orders that the complaint be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

MEMBER JENKINS, dissenting:

Contrary to my colleagues and the Administrative Law Judge, I find that the facts surrounding Respondent's discharge of employee James Haynes, Jr., establish that the motivating cause for Haynes' discharge was the protected concerted activity of another employee, John Black. Accordingly, I find that Haynes' discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. A full analysis of the facts reveals the following:

Respondent, the operator of a truck terminal, asserted that its policy is that all employees involved in vehicle accidents must report them to management, who in turn report them to the Company's safety office. Pursuant to Respondent's rules, a determination by its safety office that an accident was preventable by a casual truckdriver results, inter alia, in that driver's immediate termination.

In May 1979,[3] James Haynes, Jr., a white employee employed as a casual truckdriver, reported to Respondent's then chief of terminal operations, Carl Johnson,[4] that he had been involved in an accident which was preventable by him. Apparently, Johnson never reported the accident to any other official of Respondent. On December 10, Respondent hired Haynes as a permanent employee. In contrast, on or about October 12, John Black, a black employee who was also employed by Respondent as a casual truckdriver, was involved in an accident which Respondent classified as preventable by him. On October 15, Respondent, pursuant to its rule, discharged Black.

On December 12, 2 days after Haynes started full-time employment, two of Respondent's permanent drivers, Walters and Westbrook, told B. J. Chetkauskas, Respondent's terminal manager and the highest ranking management official at the plant, that there was a witness to Haynes' accident and that it was unjust for Respondent to have terminated Black, a black man, when Haynes, a white man, was retained despite the fact that both men had been involved in similar accidents. Chetkauskas admitted that he became "irate" at Walters and Westbrook because they had taken company time to alert him to a matter "that was [not their] concern . . . ." Chetkauskas testified that he then specifically told Walters, the employee who had done most of the talking, that the matter "didn't concern him . . . it was none of his business . . . [and] he had better get back to work." Chetkauskas did not investigate or take any other action concerning the report given by these employees.

Later that same day, Black filed a charge of race discrimination with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) against Respondent. The charge alleged that Black was terminated because of his involvement in an accident while an unnamed white employee who had a similar accident was not terminated but, rather, was being considered for a permanent position.

Respondent was first notified of the existence of this charge on December 17 when Chetkauskas received a copy. While the charge did not mention Haynes, Chetkauskas immediately gave instructions to have Haynes report to his office "as soon as possible." Haynes, however, was absent from work that day and did not meet with Chetkauskas until his return to work the following morning. Although apparently not considered by the Administrative Law Judge, Chetkauskas admitted at the hearing that, soon after receiving notice of the pending EEOC charge, he telephoned Respondent's corporate office to discuss the EEOC charge.

[2] We are constrained to note that, during this meeting, Chetkauskas also specifically stated that Haynes' discharge resulted from his involvement in a preventable accident.

[3] All dates hereinafter refer to 1979.

[4] At the hearing, Haynes identified Johnson as his immediate supervisor and the Administrative Law Judge found that Johnson was Respondent's agent.

Upon reporting for duty on the following morning, Haynes was again summoned to Chetkauskas' office where the latter asked him, inter alia, if he had ever had an accident while working for the Company. Haynes hesitated but then admitted, and related, the circumstances of his accident in May. The Administrative Law Judge found that Respondent's chief of terminal operations, Kentros,[5] who was also present, then attempted to coach Haynes into modifying his account of the accident by suggesting to him that he claim that the accident had occurred while he was working for another company. However, Chetkauskas interrupted and reminded Kentros that Haynes' report could not be changed because the meeting was being tape recorded. (The conversation had been recorded on a tape recorder that was prominently displayed.) Chetkauskas then discharged Haynes.

Later that day, Chetkauskas and the Union's business agent, Barton, met to discuss Haynes' termination. The record indicates that Chetkauskas immediately explained the facts surrounding the EEOC charge that had been filed by Black against the Company. While Chetkauskas told Barton that Respondent's rule on accidents was the ground for Haynes' discharge, Chetkauskas also told Barton about the discussion that he had had with Walters and Westbrook 6 days prior to receiving notification of the pending EEOC charge wherein they had reported Haynes' involvement in an accident. The Administrative Law Judge omitted entirely from his discussion the further testimony that during this meeting Chetkauskas revealed to Barton that only recently an EEOC charge filed by another employee against the Company had been resolved in favor of that employee. Furthermore, Chetkauskas agreed with Barton that Haynes' discharge was unfair. In this regard, Chetkauskas testified that he told Barton, inter alia, that, if he were Haynes, he would file NLRB charges and "scream it to the highest rooftop." The Administrative Law Judge also apparently failed to consider the evidence that in his report to his superior, dated December 18, Chetkauskas explained the circumstances surrounding Haynes' termination and additionally described the December 12 discussion that he had with Walters and Westbrook wherein they had, in essence, accused Respondent of race discrimination. Further, Chetkauskas attached a copy of the EEOC charge to this report.

The General Counsel contended that Respondent's discharge of Haynes violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. He argued that Respondent's termination of Haynes was motivated by its desire to defend against Black's EEOC charge rather than because of any legitimate interest in enforcing its rules regarding accidents. Although the Administrative Law Judge found that the Act would protect Haynes from any discriminatory action by Respondent motivated by the EEOC charge filed by Black, or by any discrimination intended to improve Respondent's defense to that charge, he declined to find that the discharge was for either of these reasons. In so doing, the Administrative Law Judge reasoned that, with the exception of Johnson, the evidence did not establish a pattern on the part of Respondent's agents of granting exceptions to its rules on accidents, and that Respondent should not be held bound by Johnson's decision to ignore or forgive Haynes' accident. He further found that Respondent's accident rules were uniformly applied since Chetkauskas and Kentros testified that, unlike Johnson, they acted consistent with company procedure whenever and however they learned of an accident. Further, the Administrative Law Judge apparently credited Chetkauskas, whose testimony was elicited in response to a leading question asked by the Administrative Law Judge, that he would have acted as he did upon learning of Haynes' accident on December 18 even if he had not discovered that Black had filed an EEOC charge. The Administrative Law Judge therefore concluded that Respondent had not violated the Act.

After considering the entire set of circumstances surrounding the discharging of Haynes, I am convinced that the reason asserted by Respondent for his discharge was pretextual and that the discharge was unlawful. Simply stated, Respondent's position that Haynes' discharge was based entirely upon the enforcement of its accident rules is contradicted by the evidence. Thus, the record is devoid of support for the Administrative Law Judge's finding that substantial weight should not be accorded Johnson's decision not to report Haynes' accident. Haynes identified Johnson as his immediate supervisor and, as found by the Administrative Law Judge, Johnson was an agent of Respondent. Indeed, Respondent admitted at the hearing that, as chief of terminal operations, Johnson was the second highest ranking official at the terminal. Moreover, undisputed testimony established that Respondent had delegated to its chief of terminal operations, inter alia, the specific task of receiving accident reports from employees. Neither Board law nor the law of agency requires that an employer expressly authorize its agent's specific conduct. Thus, it is sufficient that, at the time that Johnson decided that Haynes' accident did not warrant further action, Johnson was an agent for whose conduct Respondent was responsible.

[5] Johnson, who voluntarily resigned on August 2, was replaced by Kentros as chief of terminal operations.

Respondent's position is additionally undercut by the fact that Chetkauskas declined to take action in response to the reports by Walters and Westbrook that Haynes had been involved in an accident. Indeed, Respondent was spurred to action only after being notified of the pending EEOC charge. Moreover, in light of the evidence that Respondent had direct knowledge that Johnson had on prior occasions been lax in enforcing its rules, it is significant that Chetkauskas, despite the report by Walters and Westbrook, not only failed to investigate the matter, but also irately told the employees that the matter was none of their business. Had Chetkauskas been genuinely concerned with acting in accordance with company procedure, as he contended, he undoubtedly would have been more receptive to the information offered by Walters and Westbrook and he certainly would have initiated some investigation in response thereto. This he did not do. Furthermore, any lingering doubt about Respondent's true motive is dispelled by the fact that, even after Haynes admitted to Chetkauskas and Kentros that he, in fact, had been in a preventable accident, Kentros attempted to coach him into retracting that admission. And this from an employer who claims that it strictly adheres to company procedures on all accidents and that it would have terminated Haynes upon learning of his accident irrespective of its knowledge of a pending EEOC charge.

Finally, the fact that the EEOC matter was very much on Respondent's mind is clear from the Administrative Law Judge's finding, which both the majority and I have adopted, that at the meeting immediately after Haynes' termination which was arranged for the purpose of discussing that termination with the Union, Chetkauskas, rather than dealing with Haynes' accident, spent an extraordinary amount of time telling Barton about the pending EEOC charge, the unrelated EEOC charge that had recently been resolved against the Company, and the earlier report from Westbrook and Walters concerning Haynes' involvement in an accident. Moreover, during that meeting, Chetkauskas agreed with Barton that Haynes had been unjustly discharged and encouraged Barton to protest that discharge by filing an unfair labor practice charge with the Board. Under the circumstances, the only explanation consistent with the facts is that Respondent's asserted reason for discharging Haynes was contrived and that Respondent is attempting to hide its true motivation for the discharge. Indeed, the true reason for the discharge is evident from the timing and manner in which it occurred. As detailed above, the record is replete with substantial and credible evidence that Respondent's discharge of Haynes was motivated by the race discrimination charge filed by Black with the EEOC and its desire to defend against that charge. I therefore conclude that Respondent's discharge of Haynes was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and I dissent from my colleagues' failure to so find.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

CLIFFORD H. ANDERSON, Administrative Law Judge: This matter came to hearing before me on February 12, 1981, at Phoenix, Arizona, pursuant to a complaint and notice of hearing issued by the Regional Director for Region 28 of the National Labor Relations Board on August 7, 1980, based upon a charge filed by Transport and Local Delivery Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers, Local Union No. 104, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, herein the Union, on January 10, 1980, against Transcon Lines, herein Respondent.

The complaint, as orally amended at the hearing, alleges that Respondent terminated its employee James E. Haynes, Jr. and thereafter refused to reinstate him because of his and other employees' protected concerted activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, herein the Act. Respondent admits the discharge and subsequent refusal to reinstate Haynes but denies that Haynes or any other employee or employees were engaged in protected concerted activities or that Haynes' discharge was for reasons other than the consistent application of permissible rules of employee conduct.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate at the hearing, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file post-hearing briefs.

Upon the entire record herein, including briefs from the General Counsel and Respondent, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following:

FINDINGS OF FACT[1]

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is now, and has been at all times material herein, a California corporation with an office in Phoenix, Arizona, where it is engaged in the business of interstate and local transportation of linehaul freight and other commodities. Respondent annually enjoys gross revenues in excess of $50,000 resulting from the transportation of freight and other commodities from the State of Arizona directly to points outside the State.

---

[1] The facts were largely undisputed. Except where otherwise noted, these findings are based on the pleadings, admissions, stipulations of the parties, or uncontradicted credible testimonial or documentary evidence.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Events

1. Background

Respondent operates a terminal in Phoenix, Arizona, from which it picks up and delivers freight by truck. At all relevant times B. J. Chetkauskas was Respondent's terminal manager. Until August 1979, when he left Respondent's employ, Carl Johnson was chief of terminal operations—second in charge of the terminal. On August 2, 1979, Peter D. Kentros replaced Johnson and thereafter served as chief of terminal operations.

At all relevant times the Union has represented Respondent's terminal drivers and has entered into a series of collective-bargaining agreements with Respondent covering these employees. Respondent maintains a complement of permanent drivers. As its needs require, Respondent utilizes casual drivers who are procured through the Union's hiring hall. Although such employees may be repeatedly utilized, they are employed on a short-term or temporary basis. When a driver is hired as a full-time or permanent employee, he or she is subject to a probationary period. Probationary employees have lesser rights under the contract and under Respondent's rules of conduct than permanent employees who have completed their probationary period.

Respondent's policy is that all vehicle accidents must be reported by employees to management, who in turn report them to their safety office. Respondent has a separate office located in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, which evaluates reported accidents and classifies them as preventable or not preventable by the driver. Striking a stationary object, absent mitigating circumstances, is a preventable accident. A determination that an accident was preventable results in the driver-employee being "charged" with the accident. Respondent's rules provide for differing actions against an employee charged with an accident: A nonprobationary permanent employee receives a warning letter stating that additional chargeable accidents may require greater discipline; a casual employee or a probationary employee is immediately terminated.[2]

2. The actions of Haynes prior to his termination

James E. Haynes, Jr., was employed by Respondent as a casual truck driver commencing in May 1979.[3] Save for the accident asserted as the cause of his termination, there is no dispute that throughout his employment with Respondent Haynes was considered an excellent employee and was highly regarded by Respondent.

In the latter part of May, while driving a truck for Respondent, Haynes scraped the top of his trailer against the eave of a building doing no apparent damage to the building but making a slight scratch in the skin of the trailer. Haynes immediately notified the appropriate agent of the building owner at the site, who after inspecting the eave told Haynes the incident was of no consequence and to forget it. When Haynes returned to the terminal he reported the accident to Johnson who inspected the trailer with Haynes and told him the matter did not warrant further action. Apparently Johnson never reported the incident to any other agent of Respondent. There is no contention that Haynes' conduct following the accident either in reporting to the building agent or to Johnson was other than in full accord with Respondent's required procedures.

Haynes was informed on December 7, 1979, that his work was good and that he was to be made a permanent employee on December 10. Commencing on December 10 until his termination on December 18, 1979, Haynes worked without event as a full-time employee for Respondent although in his probationary period.

3. The EEOC allegation, its investigation, and Haynes' termination

John D. Black, a black man, had been employed as a casual employee by Respondent. Apparently on or about October 12, he had an accident involving the separation of his tractor from its trailer which Respondent classified as chargeable against him. Respondent discharged Black on October 15 for that reason and did not thereafter reemploy him. Black contacted David M. Barton, the Union's assistant business agent, regarding his discharge; however, the Union after contacting Respondent determined nothing could be done on Black's behalf.

On or about December 12, soon after the commencement of the work shift, Chetkauskas was approached in his office by two of Respondent's employees who told him it was unjust for Respondent to have fired Black, a black man, when Haynes was retained even though Haynes, a white man, had had an accident similar to Black's accident. The men professed to have a witness to Haynes' accident whose name they would not divulge. Chetkauskas told the employees the matter was none of their concern and, since they were talking to him on company time, they should return to work. Chetkauskas took no immediate action on the matter.

That same day Black filed a charge of discrimination with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) against Respondent alleging his discharge in October was because of his race. The charge contained the following assertion:

> My accident on October 12, 1979, was mechanical while a similarly situated White employee had the identical accident through negligence on October

---

[2] Respondent produced substantial credible and essentially unchallenged testimony and documentation of the existence of the rules and their application to reported accidents.

[3] All dates hereinafter refer to 1979 unless otherwise indicated.

15, 1979, and was allowed to complete his 30 days probation to be considered on a permanent basis.

A copy of this charge was received by Chetkauskas on December 17. It was his first notification of the existence of the charge. Chetkauskas, thinking the charge reference to the similarly situated employee referred to Haynes, tried to talk to Haynes that same day but Haynes could not be reached. The next morning, December 18, Haynes was summoned to Chetkauskas' office where he spoke with Chetkauskas and Kentros. Their conversation was openly recorded on Respondent's tape recorder. Chetkauskas asked Haynes if he had ever had an accident involving a separation from a tractor. Haynes said no. Chetkauskas then asked Haynes if he had ever seen anybody damage Respondent's property. Haynes said no. Chetkauskas then asked if Haynes had ever had an accident with Transcon. Haynes said no, hesitated a moment, and then related the circumstances of the May events described above.

Chetkauskas told Haynes that company policy provided that if a casual employee has an accident that employee cannot thereafter be employed by Respondent. Kentros asked Haynes if the accident had perhaps occurred when he was driving for another company. Before Haynes could answer Chetkauskas told Kentros—pointing to the running tape recorder—that Haynes' remarks were on tape including the statement that he had reported the accident to Johnson. Chetkauskas told Haynes that Respondent could not use him anymore and that he was terminated. The meeting ended.[4]

4. Post-termination events

Haynes left Respondent's premises after his termination and reported the events to Barton at the union office. Barton phoned Chetkauskas and a meeting was arranged for that afternoon. Chetkauskas, Barton, and Haynes met at Chetkauskas' office. Almost immediately Haynes was asked to step outside and did so. Barton and Chetkauskas continued the meeting alone.

Chetkauskas told Barton of the EEOC charge, the two employees who had earlier confronted him regarding the matter, and his meeting with Haynes in which Haynes had admitted he had had an accident. The two men disagreed on the propriety of Haynes' termination. Barton asserted that Haynes was being used as a "sacrificial lamb" and that "the whole thing stinks." Chetkauskas agreed that it might be unfair but that the matter was out of his hands. Barton several times claimed the discharge was not because of the accident. Chetkauskas rejoined on each occasion that casuals who had accidents could not be used by the Company and that this rule was the reason for Haynes' discharge.

Barton again asserted that Haynes was being denied his rights and that charges would be filed against the Company with the NLRB and EEOC Chetkauskas responded that he did not disagree with Barton's assertions of injustice and that, if he were Haynes, he would file NLRB charges and "scream it to the highest rooftop." Chetkauskas suggested Barton try and secure other employment for Haynes but Barton asserted he would obtain the return of Haynes to his employment with Respondent. The conversation then turned to Haynes' work qualities. Chetkauskas made reference to the uniformly good attributes of Haynes and offered to recommend Haynes for employment elsewhere. Haynes was brought in to the meeting at this point. Barton explained his own position regarding the dispute and that he was going to file a grievance on Haynes' behalf and inquire into the possibility of EEOC and NLRB charges. The meeting ended.[5]

On January 24, 1980, the State of Arizona's department of law, civil rights division issued a no cause order on Black's charge after investigating the matter pursuant to the deferral procedures of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The order stated there was no reasonable cause to believe an unlawful employment practice had occurred as alleged and dismissed the charge.

A grievance was filed by the Union concerning Haynes' discharge which came before the Joint State Committee for the Trucking Industry of Arizona and New Mexico (the Committee)—the dispute resolution forum established under the contract—on or about January 28, 1980. The minutes of those proceedings reflect that the Union presented the argument to the Committee that Haynes was discharged because he was a union member and because of "reverse discrimination due to the circumstances surounding his termination." In support of its argument the Union presented to the Committee the factual background resulting in Haynes' termination. Respondent asserted that in investigating the merits of the EEOC complaint it first determined Haynes had had an accident and then applied its firm policy not to employ casuals who had had a chargable accident. The Committee decision minutes contain the following resolution:[6]

> The motion was made and seconded that there is no violation of Article 41; therefore, the termination of Mr. Haynes is proper. The motion carried.

[4] These findings are a composite of the essentially corrobative versions of each participant in the conversation. Two points were in dispute. First, Chetkauskas and Kentros testified that there was a break in the meeting during which time Haynes was asked to leave the room and Chetkauskas consulted by telephone with his Los Angeles based industrial relations department. Haynes did not recall such a hiatus. Each witness exhibited a sound demeanor. The telephone call is not implausible for Chetkauskas may well have sought guidance in this unforseen situation. Such an occurrence is not likely to be incorrectly recalled by an honest witness. Since Haynes may have simply forgotten the interruption, I credit Chetkauskas and Kentros and find that the telephone call occurred as they described. Second, Haynes denied that he ever told Respondent's agents in this meeting that he knew of a company rule that an accident by a probationary or casual employee required his discharge. While this remark was attributed to Haynes by Kentros, Chetkauskas does not corroborate Kentros on this point nor does the written statement of Chetkauskas' or Kentros' own minutes of this meeting.

[5] These findings are based upon the credited testimony of Barton. Barton had a sound demeanor and demonstrated a detailed recollection of events. Chetkauskas had essentially no recollection of the details of this conversation but what he did recall generally corroborated Barton. While there is some evidence Kentros was present briefly at the conclusion of the conversation, he did not testify concerning this conversation.

[6] Insofar as the record reflects, the minutes are the only written record of the Committee's ruling or the basis of its decision.

Article 41(a) of the current collective bargaining agreement states in part that during an employee's probationary period:

> [H]e may be discharged without further recourse, provided however, that the Employer may not discharge or discipline for the purpose of evading this Agreement or discriminating against Union members.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The threshold issue—deferral to the determination of a contractually established grievance resolution procedure

Respondent urges deferral of the instant case to the ruling of the contractually established Committee under the Board's doctrine established in Spielberg Manufacturing Company, 112 NLRB 1080 (1955). The General Counsel opposes such deferral. Each party argues its position is consistent with the Board's holding in Suburban Motor Freight, Inc., 247 NLRB 146 (1980). In that case the Board, overruling prior law, stated:

> In specific terms, we will no longer honor the results of an arbitration proceeding under Spielberg unless the unfair labor practice issue before the Board was both presented to and considered by the arbitrator. In accord with the rule formerly stated in Airco Industrial Gases,[7] we will give no deference to an aribration award which bears no indication that the arbitrator ruled on the statutory issue of discrimination in determining the propriety of an employer's disciplinary actions.

In the instant case the minutes of the Committee's decision state only that Haynes' discharge was not in violation of article 41 of the collective-bargaining agreement, which article only protects against employer discrimination based on employee union membership or discrimination based on contract evasion. Neither subject is the specific issue herein. The decision does not indicate that the protected concerted activity theory of the General Counsel advanced in the instant case was in any way considered by the Committee. There being no evidence that the Committee ruled on this statutory issue,[8] it follows that no deference may be paid to its holding. Accordingly, I decline to defer to the award and shall turn to the merits of the case.

2. The discharge on its merits

The General Counsel's case may be roughly divided into two elements. The first element is the legal argument that Haynes was protected by the Act from discrimination against him intended to improve Respondent's defense to Black's charge. The second element of the General Counsel's case is the factual argument that Respondent discharged Haynes not because of his accident but rather because of Black's EEOC allegation. The elements and Respondent's defenses thereto are considered separately.

a. Do the protections of the Act apply to single employees who file charges with the EEOC and, if so, do these protections extend to other employees to protect them against employer discrimination motivated by the EEOC charge?

The General Counsel argues that the filing by Black of the EEOC charge is protected concerted activity under the Board's recent articulated constructive concert doctrine which attributes a collective or concerted purpose to single employee actions in dealing with governmental agencies concerning employment regulations.[9] The General Counsel then analogizes such protected activity to the situations where an employer illegally discriminates against otherwise uninvolved employees in an attempt to conceal other discrimination against union activity. A second discharge to hide an initial illegal discharge is also illegal.[10] The General Counsel also calls attention to the Board's decision in Sioux City Foundry, 241 NLRB 481 (1979), as persuasive of his position. Following the General Counsel's theory here the Board found in that case that an employer discharged two employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when it fired them for the purpose of avoiding or defending against an unrelated job applicant's threats to file charges with the EEOC. The Board found the single job applicant's threat to file sexual discrimination charges with the EEOC constructively concerted and hence protected activity. That protection extended to the two individuals whose terminations were undertaken by the employer in an attempt to meet the threatened EEOC charges.

Respondent defends against the General Counsel's argument by noting the statement by the General Counsel at the hearing that the Government's theory is dependent on the continuing vitality of the constructive concert theory of Alleluia Cushion and its progeny. Respondent notes that this Board doctrine has been rejected by various courts of appeals including the Ninth Circuit in whose jurisdiction this action lies. Thus, argues Respondent, the General Counsel has conceded his case rests on a doctrine specifically rejected by the Ninth Circuit. Second, Respondent notes that the protections which may arguably extend to Black in filing his charge with the EEOC do not necessarily attach to Haynes who did not himself engage in or have any connection to conduct protected by the Act. Nor, in Respondent's view, would employee Section 7 rights be chilled were discrimination of the type contended by the General Counsel to have occurred. This is so, Respondent asserts, because the person whose activities are to be protected—the filer of the EEOC charge—has "no common interests or sympathies" with those who might be adversely affected by the employer. Thus, here, Black is not aligned in interest with Haynes.

[7] Airco Industrial Gases—Pacific, a Division of Air Reduction Company, Incorporated, 195 NLRB 676 (1972).

[8] Respondent argued that the fact that the Committee, contrary to normal practice, met several times during the hearing of the dispute, supports the inference that the General Counsel's theory was considered. I reject this view. I rely only on the decision itself and decline to infer from circumstances that a particular argument was considered, and ruled on, sub silentio, by the Committee.

[9] See the fountainhead case, Alleluia Cushion Co., Inc., 221 NLRB 999 (1975), and its progeny.

[10] The General Counsel cites: Jack August Enterprises, Inc., 232 NLRB 881 (1977); Armor Industries, Inc., 227 NLRB 1543 (1977), and Haynie Electric Co., Inc., 225 NLRB 353 (1976).

For the reasons hereinafter stated, I agree with the General Counsel that the protections of the Act extend to shelter uninvolved employees from discrimination by employers motivated by discrimination charges filed with government agencies by single employees alleging discrimination based on race.

I reach the above result guided by the general principles contained in the cases cited by the General Counsel and, more particularly, due to the holding of the Board in Sioux City Foundry, supra. The legal theory of that case differs from the theory asserted by the General Counsel in the instant case only in that (1) the initiating protected action was a threat to file a discrimination charge by a job applicant, not the actual filing of a charge and, (2) the discrimination allegation involved sex rather than race. These differences are of no legal consequence. The filing of a charge with a government agency is no less protected than the threat to do so. Employees and job applicants are equally protected by the Act. Finally, the Board makes no distinction between racial and sexual discrimination but finds the protest of each to be protected activity in appropriate situations. Without addressing Respondent's assertions regarding the degree of acceptance of the Board's constructive concert theory in the courts of appeals, it is sufficient to note that as an administrative law judge I am bound to follow Board precedent which has not been reversed by the Supreme Court. Iowa Beef Packers, Inc., 144 NLRB 615, 616 (1965). Accordingly, it is appropriate to turn to the second element of the General Counsel's case, the issue of Respondent's motive in terminating Haynes.

b. Was Haynes' discharge motivated by Black's EEOC charge?

In examining the evidence adduced by the General Counsel in support of its discharge allegation, it is important to note what the General Counsel is not arguing. It is undisputed that Respondent fired Haynes based upon its interrogation of him as part of its investigation of the EEOC charge filed by Black. It is reasonable to believe that Respondent would not have learned of Haynes' May accident as opposed to the contended later accident had it not been for Black's charge and the subsequent investigation. If the General Counsel were arguing that information gained in the investigation of an EEOC charge could not be the basis of actions against other employees, i.e., some form of immunity, then the General Counsel would be arguing for an automatic violation here irrespective of Respondent's motives.[11] Rather the General Counsel is arguing that Respondent took the action it did, not because of any legitimate interest in enforcing its rules regarding accidents, but rather because of Black's charge. The General Counsel's theory then depends on a finding that the motive of Respondent in discharging Haynes was to defend against Black's charge rather than other legitimate business reasons such as enforcing its rules concerning employees who have accidents. Respondent argues that its discharge of Haynes was based entirely upon its uniform enforcement of permissible rules of employee conduct.

Respondent at all relevant times had unambiguous rules concerning employee vehicle accidents. Its Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, safety division evaluates accidents reported to it by Respondent's various terminals and renders a judgment on whether they are "chargeable" to the driver because they were preventable. There is no doubt and I find that Respondent's rules, which require the termination of casual and probationary employees who have chargable accidents, are not impermissible rules of employee conduct. It follows therefore that if Respondent terminated Haynes because of his violation of the rules and not because of Black's EEOC charge, his discharge is not impermissible.

The General Counsel's argument does not challenge the validity of Respondent's rules but rather disputes their application to the Haynes events. In his brief counsel for the General Counsel calls Haynes' accident "extremely minor" and adds:

> Such an "accident" could not seriously be envisioned by the Respondent as the type of accident which would constitute a dischargable offense.

The General Counsel buttresses his argument by noting that when the accident was reported to Johnson, Respondent's admitted agent, he told Haynes no further action was warranted and did not require Haynes to fill out an accident report. The General Counsel further argues that Respondent's concern on December 18 was the EEOC charge rather than the May accident. He notes that Chetkauskas dismissed the report by the two employees of the occurrence of a preventable accident by Haynes without even a cursory investigation at a time when he had not yet had notice of the EEOC charge. It was only when the charge was received, the General Counsel argues, that Respondent became interested in an accident by Haynes.

Respondent introduced evidence showing it has regularly enforced its rules regarding accidents. Each accident declared preventable by Respondent's Oklahoma City office in recent times was the basis of subsequent employee discipline consistent with Respondent's rules. Some of these accidents were relatively minor in terms of physical damage to vehicles. No written rule addresses the question of minor accidents. While the Oklahoma City office did not have an opportunity to rule on the Haynes accident, for Chetkauskas fired Haynes immediately upon learning of the accident from him, the record is clear and I find that any accident involving striking a building[12] would have been classified by Oklahoma City as a preventable accident and that Chetkauskas so knew when he fired Haynes.

[11] Nor would such an argument if made have prevailed. The Board has specifically ruled that even testimony in an unfair labor practice hearing may provide the basis of not otherwise improper adverse action against a wrongdoing employee. Los Angeles County District Council of Carpenters, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO; Electronic and Space Technicians Local 1553, AFL-CIO (Hughes Helicopters, Division of Summa Corporation), 224 NLRB 350 (1976).

[12] No issue of mechanical failure was raised.

To meet the General Counsel's arguments that Haynes accident did not rise to the level of a reportable accident Respondent introduced two types of evidence. First it elicited uncontradicted evidence that Johnson, during the period from May, the month of Haynes' accident, until his separation from Respondent in August, was lax and inattentive to his work particularly as to paperwork and procedure. Respondent also demonstrated that Johnson had not followed approved procedures as to personnel matters such as attendance recordkeeping and accident reporting. I find this evidence persuasive of the proposition that Johnson was negligent in following Respondent's procedures and that no substantial weight should be accorded the fact that Johnson did not report Haynes' accident consistent with procedure. Johnson was not doing what was required by Respondent. No pattern of granting exceptions to the rules is thus established. Second, Respondent showed its accident rules were uniformly applied. Repondent's agents Chetkauskas and Kentros testified without contradiction that each reported and acted according to procedure on all accidents they learned of by whatever means and that they knew of no unreported or ignored accidents. Chetkauskas also testified that he would have acted as he did on learning of Haynes' accident on December 18 irrespective of the circumstances of the discovery—EEOC charge or not.

It is not implausible that an employer's agents would let pass unreported minor transgressions which violated the letter but not the spirit of a company rule. This may be particularly true where the rule, if invoked, could be foreseen as requiring a draconian punishment out of all apparent proportion to the transgression. If such is the case here, i.e., Haynes' accident was a minor matter not worthy of formal treatment which would cause Haynes' discharge, Respondent's later invocation of the accident rule during the EEOC investigation would indicate the asserted reason for the discharge was pretext. Such an overreaction to an event earlier forgiven would not be a normal or customary act but rather the exaggerated and defensive manifestation of an employer determined to defend itself against an EEOC charge by creating, post hoc, a strict, invariable rule against accidents, however minor. The General Counsel's evidence, noted supra, tends to support this view. So, too, do the statements of Chetkauskas to Barton immediately after Haynes' termination that Chetkauskas too would protest the termination in similar circumstances. Further, Chetkauskas spent a great deal of time telling Barton about the EEOC charge rather than dealing exclusively with Haynes' accident, thus revealing the EEOC matter was much on his mind.

It may also be argued that Chetkauskas did not fire Haynes because of a motivation to defend Respondent against the EEOC charge, but rather because Haynes' report of the accident was made at a time when his remarks were being recorded on tape and, presumably, the tape would be subject to review by higher officials in other locations as part of their investigation of the EEOC charge. Minor matters could perhaps be forgiven at the local level, but Respondent's agents outside the terminal could not with confidence be expected to be forgiving to either the driver or the agent who failed to rigidly apply the rules. Chetkauskas thus would feel compelled to fire Haynes because the accident report was not subject to be ignored with the confidence that no one outside the terminal would ever learn of the matter. Under this analysis, it was the presence of the tape recorder and the official nature of the EEOC inquiry which caused Haynes' accident to be treated as a rule violation rather than ignored or forgiven—Haynes was fired because he had the misfortune to speak at the wrong time. This scenario is supported by Chetkauskas' remarks to Kentros in the termination meeting. Kentros attempted to coach Haynes into modifying his earlier report of the accident by claiming the accident occurred while working for another employer. Chetkauskas interrupted and, pointing to the running tape recorder, noted that Haynes' report could not be changed because it was on tape. Such a motive by Chetkauskas would explain his remarks to Barton in which he agreed with Barton's protestations of injustice in Haynes' discharge but asserted the matter was out of his hands.[13]

What is critically lacking in the General Counsel's proof as to either discharge theory, however, is even a scintilla of evidence that any accident, however minor, was condoned, forgiven, or otherwise unreported or not eventually acted upon by Respondent's agents save Johnson. Respondent has done all it could to prove the negative proposition that it allowed no exceptions in the application of its accident rules other than unwillingly and unknowingly through the unreliable Johnson. Respondent's witnesses credibly testified that they knew of no exceptions allowed under the rules. Respondent produced substantial documentation showing that its accident reporting procedures are regularly utilized and the rules uniformly applied. Thus, while the General Counsel has adduced some circumstantial evidence tending to discount Respondent's assertions, the General Counsel offered no direct evidence of exceptions to the accident reporting and rule enforcement procedures other than through Johnson. If Repondent has condoned or forgiven accidents by employees of the type Haynes described to Chetkauskas, employees or other witnesses or records should have been produced by the General Counsel to so indicate. Evidence of a minor accident ignored or forgiven would have been direct evidence of a de minimis or threshold standard required to trigger Respondent's enforcement of the rules. Without such evidence, on this record, I cannot but find that Respondent has established by a preponderance of the evidence that its rules were uniformly enforced and that Chetkauskas would have taken the action he did in firing Haynes under any circumstances whether or not the EEOC charge had been filed against Respondent. The General Counsel's circumstantial evidence does not meet Respondent's evidence here. Even assigning the burden of proof to Respondent on this issue, I find that Respondent, through Chetkauskas, would have terminated Haynes upon learning of the accident as Haynes reported it to him on December 18, 1979, even if Black had never filed his charge with the EEOC.[14] I find therefore that the termination of Haynes was not because of the protected concerted activity of Black. Thus, no violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act has occurred as alleged in the complaint. Accordingly, I shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

[13] Since this latter view of the facts was not argued by the General Counsel, it is not clear whether the General Counsel's theory of a violation includes the situation where Haynes was terminated not because of the contentions of the EEOC charge but rather because his disclosure of the accident occurred during the investigation of the EEOC charge and therefore was treated formally and was not excused or forgotten as it would have been if the accident was revealed in another context. In view of my additional findings, infra, it is unnecessary to decide if such a factual resolution supports a violation.

C. Summary

I have considered Respondent's motion to defer this matter to the Committee decision rendered under the contractually established grievance resolution process. I have declined to defer because of my determination that the Committee decision did not indicate on its face that the Committee had considered the statutory issues here presented in reaching its decision. I have determined that Black's action in filing an EEOC charge constitutes protected concerted activity within the purview of the Act which protection extends to all those who might suffer discrimination motivated by Respondent's desire to defend against the charge. Such protection applies to protect Haynes from discrimination by Respondent motivated by Black's charge. Notwithstanding all of the above, I have also found that Respondent fired Haynes because he violated Respondent's permissible and uniformly enforced rule against retaining probationary or casual drivers who have had a preventable accident. Therefore, I have found the allegations of the complaint are without merit and should be dismissed.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact and the entire record herein I make the the following:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent did not commit any unfair labor practices as alleged in the complaint.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the entire record herein, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I issue the following recommended:

ORDER[15]

The complaint shall be, and it hereby is, dismissed in its entirety.

---

[14] Such a determination precludes the necessity of deciding if the General Counsel's evidence rises to the level of a prima facie case of illegal motivation. This is so for, even if such a case is made, a subsequent conclusion that Respondent would have taken the action it did even in the absence of the protected activity requires a finding that the activity was not illegal. Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

[15] In the event that this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."
